MIDDLE EAST RECORD

VOLUME TWO • 1961

Editor: YITZHAK ORON

MIDDLE EAST RECORD (MER) presents factual information on current Middle Eastern political affairs. MER is the first reference work of its kind in the English language, and is more comprehensive than any other publication in its field.

MER is a fully documented chronological record, arranged according to topics, based on extensive research. In compiling MER, more than 200 newspapers, periodicals and official publications in Middle Eastern and other languages were regularly scanned, and many additional publications were consulted.

Care has been taken to present all relevant viewpoints on every question.

The material is presented under three categories:

1. A record of political developments in the region, comprising quoted material only, and including official interpretation of these developments and comment from within and without the area.
2. Views and Policies—as expressed by government leaders on both internal and international affairs.
3. Factual summaries of the above categories, correlating the different aspects and outlining the pattern of developments, while refraining from judgment.

Many topics are presented in maps and tables. Extensive background notes, cross references and indexes have been included. The area covered extends to Turkey in the North, Iran in the East, Cyprus and Libya in the West, and in the South, to Ethiopia, Somalia and Sudan.

While the scope of Volume II is the same as that of its predecessor, a number of innovations have been introduced.

A detailed subject index has been added for both the first and the present volume. In addition to the more obvious subjects, the index encompasses such themes agitating the Middle East as Democracy, Social Equality, Welfare Society, Classes, Leadership, Ideology, National Unity, the Enemy, Peace and War, Subversion.

The economic surveys have been expanded to include more statistical information, in some cases covering demographic and social subjects. The voting record of ME countries at the United Nations General Assembly has been prefaced by a synopsis of voting behaviour and analytical tables. The chapter on the Arab-Israel conflict has been extended to include a section on the arms race.

PREFACE TO VOLUME ONE

MIDDLE EAST RECORD (MER) is an annual account of the politics and international relations of the countries of the Middle East. It is a development of the survey that has appeared during the past 13 years in Hamizrah Hehadash (The New East), the Hebrew quarterly of the Israel Oriental Society.

There is now an extensive and ever-growing coverage of Middle East affairs. In addition to the numerous books, there are specialized periodical and other factual surveys—particularly on economic affairs, oil and education. In the field of politics, however, systematically presented factual information is not easily obtainable. The student of Middle East politics has at his disposal a wealth of analysis, comment and judgment, but singularly little sober fact is readily available by which to check them. In order to construct even a skeleton framework for research, the analyst or historian has to conduct a preliminary survey of numerous and varied sources which are not always easy to come by.

It was this state of affairs that prompted the Israel Oriental Society to enlarge the political section of Hamizrah Hehadash and make it available in English.

The aim of this work is to present the facts in full detail and from the widest possible variety of sources. Where the facts are disputed—and that happens frequently enough in the Middle East—all available versions are quoted, precedence being given to official statements. When it is a matter of underlying motives and causes, or the significance and consequences of events, both official statements and unofficial comment are treated as facts to be recorded.

In compiling MER, over 200 newspapers, periodicals and official publications have been regularly scanned and many additional publications consulted. As far as possible, official publications have been used, but the overwhelming majority of items included are press reports and monitored broadcasts. For maximum accuracy, these have been cross-checked as far as possible and early reports have been corrected by later, more accurate ones.

MER comprises three categories of material: a general record; views and policies on internal affairs and international relations, as formulated by government leaders; synopses and economic surveys.

The general record is arranged according to topics, with extensive cross-references. Dates are prefixed to headings to establish the chronological sequence. The record consists of quotations from, or summaries of, specified sources. Where background notes have been found necessary, they are indicated by square brackets. Sources are as a rule quoted for each item separately. In translated material the original terms for institutions, parties, etc., are generally added in parentheses.

"Views and Policies" have been compiled on the basis of all published pronouncements of government leaders during the year. Care has been taken not only to present all relevant views but also to present them in proper balance. To avoid the risk of quoting out of context, passages have often been given at considerable length. As far as possible, English translations issued in the country concerned have been used. These have generally been compared with the text in the original language, but so long as they convey the general meaning they have been left unchanged. Where exact terms might be of importance or interest, the words concerned have been given in the original, in brackets.

The synopses are based solely on the source material given, to which they serve as a guide.

The economic surveys are intended to provide the necessary background for the understanding of political developments.

The area covered extends from Turkey in the north and Cyprus and Libya in the west to Iran in the east and Ethiopia, Somalia and Sudan in the south. It has not been possible to include special sections on Ethiopia, Iran, Libya and Somalia, which are treated only in connection with certain aspects of international relations. In the case of Turkey, international relations have been only partially covered, and internal affairs have not been dealt with in the section on Israel. It is hoped to correct this in future volumes. Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia are included in the survey of inter-Arab relations.

MER, though continuing a well-established tradition, is a new venture, and as such can no doubt be improved upon. Criticisms and suggestions will be most welcome. The lessons learned in editing this first volume will be applied in the next one, now in an advanced stage of preparation. In particular, the publication date will be progressively advanced.

A major test of a work of this kind is its objectivity. The editor hopes that MER reflects the efforts made in this respect.

Although MER is the work of many hands, the responsibility for its contents rests entirely with the editor.

PREFACE TO VOLUME TWO

While the scope of the present volume is the same as that of its predecessor, a number of innovations have been introduced.

A detailed subject index has been added for both the first and the present volume. In addition to the more obvious subjects, the index encompasses such themes agitating the Middle East as: Democracy, Social Equality, Welfare Society, Classes, Leadership, Ideology, National Unity, the Enemy, Peace and War, Subversion.

The economic surveys have been expanded to include more statistical information, in some cases covering demographic and social subjects. The voting record of ME countries at the United Nations General Assembly has been prefaced by a synopsis of voting behaviour and analytical tables. The chapter on the Arab-Israel conflict has been extended to include a section on the arms race.

Several changes have been made at the suggestion of readers: "Views and Policies," which appeared separately in MER 1960, have, in most chapters, been incorporated in the general record of events; they have, however, been given special attention in the synopses and may be located with the aid of the index. Relations between Middle East and Communist countries have been included under country headings.

Because US policy statements on the ME during the year related principally to the Arab-Israel conflict, they appear in this chapter instead of in the chapter on The Western Powers and the Middle East as in MER 1960.

Many additional sources have been utilized in this volume, in particular African and Asian newspapers. More extensive use has also been made of official documents.

It is regretted that because of various temporary difficulties the publication of MER 1961 has been considerably delayed. Every effort is being made to ensure the timely publication of future volumes.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Synopses, background notes and all items indicated by square brackets have been provided by the editor.

Where no year is specified, the date is always 1961.

In the indexes and cross-references, the letters a and b after the page-number indicate the left-hand and the right-hand column respectively.

In the synopses, references are generally given only to sections other than the one immediately following.

The spelling of place names is that of generally accepted English maps.

In quotations the spelling of Arabic, Hebrew and Turkish names has been changed, where necessary, to comply with the system adopted by MER. Likewise, in some cases terms have been abbreviated.

Because of the sometimes contradictory and fragmentary information available on trade and economic aid, complete accuracy cannot be guaranteed.

NOTES ON transliteration

Arabic: The transliteration is meant to aid the reader who has no knowledge of Arabic to arrive at comprehensible pronunciation. Currently used names have been rendered in the form generally accepted, e.g. Gamāl Abdel Nasser. For the pronunciation of other names some simple rules should be observed:

1. A vowel above which the sign $\cdot$ appears is pronounced long, e.g. Rafiq = Rafeeq.
2. In the case of a double consonant both consonants are pronounced, e.g. Muhammad = Muham-mad.
3. The sign $\cdot$ preceding a consonant and the sign $\cdot$ preceding a vowel are pronounced like a catch in the throat.

4. Pronounce dh as th in 'father'

gh as the French 'r'

kh as the Scottish 'ch' in 'loch'

(In indicating the sources the long vowel is not marked.)

Hebrew: There is no accepted transliteration; we have adopted the one used by The Jerusalem Post daily. Generally, the last syllable is stressed.

Turkish: The Turkish standard spelling has been adopted; it should be noted that ç is pronounced as ch in English, c as j, ğ as ih.

VOTING RECORD OF ME AND NORTH AFRICAN COUNTRIES AT THE UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(1) General. This section comprises:

(a) The detailed voting record of ME and North African countries at the second part of the 15th session and at the whole of the 16th session of the UN General Assembly. The votes recorded are all the roll calls at the plenary, the First Committee and the Special Political Committee. (For the voting record at the first part of the 15th session, see MER 1960, p 14 ff.);

(b) Tables of summary and comparison, accompanied by a synopsis.

(2) Tables of Summary and Comparison. The purpose of these tables is to provide a quantitative survey of the voting patterns of ME and North African countries during the two sessions (Sept 1960-June 1962).

The system employed is as follows. The subjects voted on have been categorized and the UN members classified into politically meaningful groups. The coincidence has then been established of each ME and North African country voting with the great powers and with the majority of countries in each group of countries, both in regard to the various subject categories and in regard to the general voting. (The keys to classification appear immediately below these notes.)

The general voting record covered in this survey totals 270 votes of which 220 have been categorized under these five headings: cold war issues, colonialism, the Congo question (15th session only), disarmament, and the Arab-Israel conflict. The remaining 50 votes dealt with a wide variety of issues which could not be meaningfully grouped under comprehensive subject headings.

The UN members have been classified as follows: the three Western powers; other NATO, pro-Western Commonwealth and European countries; Communist countries, Latin American countries; African and Asian countries excluding ME and North African countries; ME and North African countries in general; Arab countries; non-Arab ME countries.

The ME and North African states have been excluded from the Afro-Asian category so that their voting might be juxtaposed with that of the majority of other Afro-Asian states. The Afro-Asian majority appears in two additional columns—once with the USA and once with the Communist countries. This threefold classification is designed to gauge: (a) the impact of the great power orientation upon the voting coincidence between the Afro-Asian countries on the one hand and the ME and North African countries on the other; and (b) the impact of the Afro-Asian orientation upon the voting coincidence between the ME and North African countries as a group and each of the two great powers.

Both the subdivisions of the ME and North African countries (Arab and non-Arab states) add up to even numbers (12 and 6), and on altogether 14 occasions the votes of either one of these subdivisions were equally divided. Since it was the object of the computation to correlate the voting behaviour of individual countries with that of a "majority" of other groups of countries, all these instances have been excluded from the two columns: Arab and non-Arab ME countries.

(3) This presentation of political facts can be no more than a rough quantitative guide to the political attitudes of the countries concerned towards the various questions which occupied the two UN sessions. It disregards qualitative differences among the votes, attaching equal weight to each vote, whether given in a Committee or in the Plenary, or whether dealing with a relatively inconsequential procedural point or with a major policy issue. Also, the need to condense the statistical information to manageable proportions has necessitated correlation with simple "majorities" only, without any indication of the size of the "majority" in question.

The synopsis below reviews the main characteristics of voting behaviour; the material presented in the various tables will enable the researcher to establish independently its intricacies.

SYNOPSISVOTING BEHAVIOUR OF ME AND NORTH AFRICAN COUNTRIES

The ME and North African Countries in Relation to the World Powers. As is seen from Tables 1 and 2 below, the ME and North African countries as a group voted more often with the Communist countries than with the US at both UN sessions. At the 16th session, however, voting coincidence with each of the two world powers dropped in roughly equal measure. In the case of the US the decline was largely due to a fall of approximately 50% in the voting coincidence on colonialism. In addition, at the 15th session the Congo vote, on which the average voting coincidence between all ME and North African countries and the US was almost 7% higher than the average for all issues, served to raise total voting coincidence with the US to some extent; at the 16th session the Congo was no longer a major voting subject. On the other hand, at the 16th session, the average voting coincidence with the US on disarmament increased nearly twofold, and on cold war questions by one-third. Voting coincidence with the Communist countries decreased at an approximately equal rate on the three issues of colonialism, disarmament and the cold war. On cold war questions at the 16th session, the rate of voting coincidence with the Communist countries was below that with the US.

As to individual countries the vote of Turkey, Israel, Iran and Cyprus at the 15th session and of the first three only at the 16th session coincided more often with the US than with the Communist countries. The vote of all other countries, including all the Arab countries, coincided more often with the Communist vote. The highest coincidence with the latter was recorded by Morocco, Iraq, the UAR and Yemen at both sessions.

Turkey and Iran. The two CENTO states showed a considerable divergence in their voting records. Turkey of all ME countries maintained the highest voting coincidence with the US; Iran voted much more often with the Communist, Afro-Asian and Latin American countries. At the 15th session Turkey's voting coincidence with the US was (in round figure) 75% of the total votes cast as against 34% with the USSR, while for Iran the figures were 47% as against 42%. Also, on over half of the subjects on which Turkey voted with the USSR, the latter and the US voted identically. The divergence was even more considerable at the 16th session when the figures for Turkey were 81% as against 17.6%, and for Iran they were 52% as against 32%. The divergence was especially pronounced on the issue of colonialism, when Iran's vote coincided more often with that of the Communist countries than with that of the US. Iran's rate of voting coincidence with the Communist countries, however, was the same as her rate of coincidence with the vote of the Communist countries + the Afro-Asian majority; in other words, this was primarily an "Afro-Asian vote." On straightforward cold war issues and disarmament, Iran's pro-Western alignment reasserted itself and the divergence with Turkey almost disappeared.

At both sessions—though in a different order—Iran's highest voting coincidence was with the majority of ME, Latin American and Afro-Asian countries; Turkey's highest voting coincidence was with the US and the majority of NATO and pro-Western and Latin American countries.

Israel. Israel's highest voting coincidence at the 15th session was with the US (63.5%—second only to that of Turkey), closely followed by non-Arab ME, NATO and pro-Western, and Latin American countries. At the 16th session, Israel's highest voting coincidence was still with the same groups of countries, though in a different order: first place was taken by Latin America, followed by NATO and pro-Western countries, the UK, the US and the non-Arab ME countries.

At both sessions Israel's voting coincidence with the Afro-Asian majority fell just short of half the total votes—47.6% and 47.4% at the 15th and 16th sessions, respectively—and was in excess of her coincidence both with the Communist countries' vote (29% and 17.6%) and with France (40% and 44.8%). Generally, there was a considerably higher voting coincidence with the majority of Afro-Asian countries when they voted with the US than when they voted with the Communist countries. This tendency was especially pronounced on cold war and disarmament questions, and the Congo. But while Israel's voting coincidence with the US on cold war issues remained relatively stable—59.4% at the 15th session and 63.6% at the 16th—her coincidence with the Afro-Asian majority's vote rose from 40.5% at the 15th session to 59.1% at the 16th session, when it exceeded that with France, which was 54.5%. On colonialism, on the other hand, Israel voted considerably more often with the Afro-Asian majority as well as with the Arab states—and at the 15th session also with the Communist countries—than with any of the Western states.

The only issue on which Israel found herself largely isolated from the Afro-Asian majority at both sessions was the Arab-Israel conflict. Here too, however, Israel's vote with the Afro-Asian majority increased from one out of eight at the 15th session to two out of nine at the 16th, while the average vote of the Arab countries with the Afro-Asian majority fell from six out of eight to approximately five out of nine. At both sessions Israel's main support on this issue came from the Western states, whereas the Arab countries recorded their highest voting coincidence with the Communist countries.

Cyprus, Ethiopia and Somalia. The voting coincidence of Cyprus, Ethiopia and Somalia was predominantly with regional and wider Afro-Asian groupings; Ethiopia and Somalia, however, were aligned more often than Cyprus with the Eastern bloc.

Cyprus' highest voting coincidence at both sessions was with the non-Arab ME majority, followed by the Afro-Asian majority and the Latin American countries; the world powers came far behind.

Cyprus changed her voting from a slight alignment with the US at the 15th session to a similar one with the Communist countries at the 16th. The higher voting coincidence with the Communist countries was most pronounced where the Afro-Asian vote coincided with that of the Communist countries, notably in regard to colonialism. At the same time there was a considerable fall from the 15th to the 16th session in the coincidence of voting with both the US and the Communist bloc on this subject. On disarmament, too, Cyprus voted more often with the Communist countries than with the US, but there was a substantial increase in the pro-US coincidence at the 16th session. On cold war issues Cyprus voted more often with the West than with the Communist countries at both sessions, but the preponderance of the Western alignment was substantially reduced at the 16th as compared with the 15th session.

Ethiopia's highest voting coincidence at both sessions was with the ME majority, followed by the majorities of Arab, Afro-Asian and non-Arab ME countries. These groupings were followed after a considerable gap by the Communist countries while the Western and Latin American countries fell far behind. Voting coincidence with the Communist countries was relatively high on issues on which the two world powers were brought into direct confrontation. Thus, Ethiopia voted 17 times with the Communist countries on cold war questions at both sessions as against three times with the US. On colonialism, coincidence with the US fell by more than half from the 15th to the 16th session.

Somalia's highest voting coincidence at both sessions was with the majorities of Afro-Asian and ME countries. Like Ethiopia, Somalia voted predominantly with Communist rather than with Western states. While voting coincidence with the US dropped from 31.7% at the 15th session to 20% at the 16th, voting coincidence with the Communist countries remained stable at 51.7% and 51.2%, respectively. Within the ME, Somalia voted more times with the Arab than with the non-Arab majority—on cold war issues more than twice as many times. The sole exception to this pattern was the Congo vote at the 15th session which constituted also the only issue on which Somalia voted more often with the US than with the Eastern bloc.

The Arab Countries. At both sessions all Arab countries recorded a higher voting coincidence with the Communist countries than with the West. Average voting coincidence of the Arab countries with the Communist countries was 63.6% at the 15th session, falling to 56.3% at the 16th session; with the US 24.3% at the 15th and 20% at the 16th session.

Three Arab groupings can be distinguished along the East-West continuum, with Morocco, Iraq, the UAR and Yemen showing the highest voting coincidence with the Communist countries, Tunisia, Jordan, Mauritania and Lebanon voting relatively often with the West, and Saudi Arabia, Libya, Syria and Sudan placed approximately half way between the two extremes.

At the 15th session Morocco had the highest coincidence with the Communist countries (109) and the lowest coincidence with the US (28) of any Arab state. Yemen shared the lowest coincidence with the US (28) but voted ten times less often with the Communist countries than did Morocco. At the 16th session the picture changed somewhat. Yemen still showed the lowest voting coincidence with the US (17), but highest in the frequency of voting coincidence with the Communist countries was Iraq (88), with Morocco (80) dropping to third place behind the UAR (84).

At the 15th session Tunisia had the highest voting coincidence with the US (51) and the lowest with the Communist countries (76) of any Arab state. Mauritania had the highest alignment with the US at the 16th session.

At the 15th session all Arab countries voted more often with the US than with either the UK or France. At the 16th session, however, while the coincidence rate between Arab and French voting remained more or less unchanged, that between the Arab countries and the UK rose; in some cases it equalled the voting coincidence with the US and in others (Sudan, the UAR, Yemen) exceeded it. With the exception of Mauritania, however, the Arab states voted more often with the other NATO and pro-Western countries than with the US at both sessions.

The highest voting coincidence with the Afro-Asian countries at both sessions was that of Tunisia (108, 89), the lowest at the 15th session that of Jordan (86) and at the 16th of Mauritania (69). Generally, the Arab states showed a far higher voting coincidence with the Afro-Asian countries when the latter voted with the Communist countries than when they voted with the US. There were, however, some divergencies from this pattern on individual issues. Thus at the 15th session Tunisia, Saudi Arabia, Libya, Lebanon and Jordan all voted on the Congo more often with the US+Afro-

Asian majority than with the Communist countries+Afro-Asian majority. On the other hand, as regards disarmament, at the 15th session no Arab state voted with the US+Afro-Asian majority save for a single vote by Sudan; at the 16th session all Arab states cast some votes in alignment with the US+Afro-Asian majority, but all retained a considerably higher voting coincidence with the Communist countries+Afro-Asian majority. Iraq and the UAR recorded a higher total coincidence of votes with the Communist countries than with the Afro-Asian majority at both sessions; Morocco, Saudi Arabia and Yemen recorded such a coincidence pattern at the 15th session only.

The coincidence of the Arab vote with the Afro-Asian majority's vote—some 65% at both sessions—dropped substantially in respect of cold war questions to 44.1% at the 15th and 50.8% at the 16th session. At the 15th session Iraq, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, the UAR and Yemen voted on cold war issues more often with the Communist countries than with the Afro-Asian majority; at the 16th session Iraq alone did so.

On the Arab-Israel conflict, too, the Arab vote coincided more often with that of the Eastern bloc than with that of the Afro-Asians, especially at the 16th session.

Inter-Arab conformity was high with exceptions. At the 15th session Saudi Arabia had the highest rate of conformity with the Arab majority, with 133 votes out of a total of 145; she was closely followed by the UAR, Yemen, Libya, Sudan and Iraq. Morocco and Lebanon followed farther behind while the lowest rates of conformity were recorded by Jordan (109 votes) and Tunisia (96). At the 16th session Yemen had the highest rate of conformity with 107 votes out of a total of 125; she was closely followed by the UAR, Sudan, Syria, Morocco and Libya; Iraq and Tunisia were not far behind (97 votes each), while Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Lebanon—the last with 88 votes—closed the list. A certain correlation could be noted between voting coincidence with the Arab majority on the one hand and with Communist countries on the other. Thus Jordan and Lebanon had a relatively low coincidence rate with both the Arab majority and the Communist countries while that of the UAR, Syria, Yemen, Iraq and Morocco was relatively high with both. Tunisia, which at the 15th session was last in voting coincidence both with the Communist and the Arab countries, preceded Jordan and Lebanon in both aspects at the 16th session.

On individual issues certain Arab countries recorded a higher voting coincidence with non-Arab states or groups of states than with the Arab majority. Thus, on the Congo issue at the 15th session Tunisia voted twice more with the Afro-Asian, and Morocco five times more often with the Communist countries than with the Arab majority. Tunisia also voted 21 times with the Afro-Asian majority as against 12 with the Arab majority on cold war questions. At both sessions the voting of the UAR, Morocco and Iraq coincided on colonialism one time more with that of the Communist countries than with that of the Arab majority. At the 16th session Tunisia and Mauritania voted more often with the Afro-Asian than with the Arab majority on disarmament; and on cold war questions Mauritania's voting coincidence with Western countries was four times higher than with the Arab majority. Jordan, too, voted on cold war issues more often with Western powers than with the Arab majority, while Lebanon voted more often with the Afro-Asians. The inter-Arab alignment was complete, or almost complete, only on the Arab-Israel conflict; only Jordan at the 15th and Iraq at the 16th session failed to cast their vote with the Arab majority on one occasion.

THE MIDDLE EAST IN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES AND GROUPINGS

SYNOPSIS

Middle East countries participated in a number of international political conferences and groupings. In general, they belonged to the loose, informal Afro-Asian group, which emerged from the Bandung conference of 1955. The great differences inside this group grew wider during 1960-1, after a number of African countries achieved independence, and as a result of the Congo crisis which served as a catalyst in African politics.

The veteran international organization in the area was the Arab League (est. 1945), which by the end of the year comprised twelve independent Arab-speaking Muslim countries. In the North, the two non-Arab ME Muslim countries, Iran and Turkey, together with Muslim Pakistan and the United Kingdom, belonged to the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO) which began as the "Baghdad Pact" in 1955; this Western defence organization was strongly tied to the US. Other international organizations represented in the area were NATO, of which Turkey was a member, and the British Commonwealth, which was joined by Cyprus in 1961.

During 1961 the African countries—including six member states of the Arab League—divided into two groups: (a) The Casablanca group, established at a conference in Casablanca in January, which comprised two Arab countries—the UAR and Morocco, as well as the Algerian Provisional Government—and three sub-Saharan countries—Ghana, Guinea and Mali; (b) the Monrovia group—formed at a conference in that city in May, which comprised the twelve countries of the Union Africaine et Malgache as well as Ethiopia, Liberia, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Togo and Tunisia. The Casablanca group countries were pro-Lumumbist in the Congo and took a neutralist anti-Western line; those of the Monrovia group were more moderate, supported the established order, and the majority of them had strong ties with the West. The African Arab League countries were thus split between the two groups, with Libya and Sudan endeavouring to take a neutral line.

The Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (September) brought Yugoslavia, a European country, and Cuba, a Latin American one, into an otherwise Afro-Asian forum in which Muslim countries predominated. The division between "non-aligned" and "aligned" countries again cut across the Arab League—Kuwait, Libya and Jordan being absent from the meeting. On the other hand, Ethiopia, Somalia and Tunisia of the Monrovia group joined with the countries of the Casablanca group at this conference.

The UAR was the country most involved in these groupings. She was a principal member of the Arab League and the Casablanca group, a prime mover in convening the Belgrade Conference, and at the centre of the activities of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization and the All-African Peoples' Conference, both non-governmental, strongly anti-Western, bodies. The UAR was also active in the Islamic sphere. The Islamic tie in foreign relations was emphasized even more by Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

At the other end of the scale was Israel, the only country in the ME which did not belong to any of these groupings, as a result of the influence that the 12 Arab League countries exercised in Afro-Asian councils and international politics in general.

Notes on Maps: (1) "Algeria" stands for "Algerian Provisional Government," established by the Algerian insurgents. (2) The predominantly Muslim Soviet republics and the Chinese autonomous region of Sinkiang have been included in the map as "Muslim Countries." (3) The population of Lebanon was assumed to consist of approximately 50% Muslims and 50% Christians. (4) Syria seceded from the UAR on September 28.

AFRO-ASIAN AND AFRICAN CONFERENCES

AFRO-ASIAN PEOPLES' SOLIDARITY ORGANIZATION (AAPSO)

Cairo Meeting on Congo. The AAPSO, in an extraordinary session held in Cairo on Jan 21-22, adopted a resolution on the Congo which i.e. invited the governments which had announced the withdrawal of their troops to put them at the disposal of the "legitimate government of Stanleyville." (NCNA, Jan 23 [25])

Fourth Session of AAPSO Council. [The fourth session of the Council took place in Bandung from April 10 to 13. The Council was the highest body of the AAPSO, functioning between general conferences of the organization.] (For second conference, see MER 1960, p 22)

Fifty-two nations were represented at the conference. The UAR delegation was headed by Muhammad Fu'ad Galil. The conference was opened by President Sukarno; the main theme of his speech was the struggle against imperialism (Manila Bulletin, April 11). In the declaration at the closing session, it was stated that neo-colonialism was the greatest threat to African countries. It was a subtle form of domination by political, economic, social, and military or technical means, perpetrated by the US, West Germany, Israel, Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands, South Africa, and France. The Afro-Asian peoples were also warned of the "anti-national blocs," NATO, SEATO, and CENTO, which were all "headed by US imperialists." Other resolutions called on Sudan to lift the blockade it had imposed on the "legitimate government of Congo"; and supported the Algerian struggle for independence, declaring that the Sahara was an integral part of Algeria; individual resolutions were passed on all non-independent territories in Africa and Asia. (Ahrum, April 8, 21; BBCM, Part III, Nos. 612, 613, 614, 615)

On his return from the conference, AAPSO SG Yusuf as-Siba'i declared as the main results of the conference (a) a decision to hold a conference of the peoples of Africa, Asia, and Latin America, to link the struggle against imperialism on the three continents; (b) the conference showed up Israel's aggressive and imperialist role in the ME and in Africa and Asia. (Hayat, April 30)

A report on the conference in the Jewish Observer and Middle East Review said that the role of the UAR as a neutral pacemaker for Soviet and Chinese Communism was effectively demonstrated at the conference. The Russians and Chinese kept themselves in the background during the public sessions and it was left to the UAR to keep the discussions "on the Communist rails." Siba'i and Galil had engineered a resolution calling on Afro-Asian countries of the British Commonwealth to withdraw from the Commonwealth unless Britain gave up its "colonialist policies." It was Siba'i too who set the tone of the conference from the outset with an attack on "US neo-colonialism" and on the UN. Siba'i said that the neo-colonialists of the US were using the UN, and Hammarskjöld was "a corrupt politician and a traitor." (Jew. Obs. April 28)

Conference of the AAPSO Executive Committee in Gaza. [The committee met in Gaza from Dec 9 to 11. Representatives from 27 countries, including all Asian Communist countries and Morocco and Tunisia, participated. Observers from East European Communist countries also attended. The host delegation was the "Palestine Committee for Afro-Asian Solidarity." The organizers intended to focus attention on the Palestine problem, and this subject was given special prominence both in the discussions and resolutions, and in activities outside the conference hall.] The UAR delegate, Fu'ad Galil, was elected chairman of the conference. (R. Cairo, Dec 9-10, Dec 10)

In his opening speech, SG Yusuf as-Siba'i said that the choice of Gaza as the venue of the meeting expressed the Palestinians' desire to couple their energies and activities with those of the Afro-Asian peoples who stood by them in their just struggle against the Israeli invaders and their imperialist masters. Siba'i also charged that there was cooperation between imperialism and reaction in countries like Jordan, Iran, and Turkey, and said that Guatemala and "Chiang's gang" supported the Syrian secession. Speaking of the struggle against imperialism, he denounced the intervention to restore in South Vietnam a regime hated by the people, and denounced the US Peace Corps members as agents of imperialism. He said that only a united anti-imperialist front of the African, Asian, and Latin American peoples would be able to thwart the imperialist conspiracies. (MENA, Dec 9, 10 [12])

The "Palestinian" delegation forwarded a detailed memorandum on the Palestine question, and on Dec 10 the delegates visited the demarcation line and a refugee camp. The conference adopted 24 resolutions. It confirmed earlier resolutions on Palestine, denounced Israel as an "aggressive entity established by imperialism," and supported the "legitimate right" of the Palestinian Arabs to "liberate their homeland and return to it." Other resolutions concerned the holding of the projected Afro-Asian-Latin American conference; condemnation of reactionary forces in the Arab world; a denunciation of the European Common Market, and individual resolutions in support of various countries and territories in their anti-imperialist struggle. (MENA, Dec 11 [13]; Ahram, Dec 11, 12)

Women's Conference. Jordan, Lebanon and the UAR, among others, were represented at the first Conference of Afro-Asian Women, which opened in Cairo on Jan 11. The conference was opened by Kamal ad-Din Hussein. President Abdel Nasser, in a message, emphasized the role of women in the struggle for freedom in Africa and Asia (Falastin, Hayat, Jan 14; Akhbar, Jan 15, 16); he also received the delegates.

THIRD CONFERENCE OF UN ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR AFRICA

(Addis Ababa, February)

Speaking at the conference, Mahmud Riyad, the head of the UAR delegation, warned African countries against economic colonialist domination. He called for a common transport system among African countries. He said that the African continent had contributed greatly to the development of the metropolitan powers, and this had now resulted in the African countries lacking capital to develop their resources and raise the standard of living of their peoples (R. Addis Ababa, Feb 9 [11]). The UAR and seven other African states demanded the withdrawal of non-African states from membership in ECA. (Hayat, Feb 16)

On a resolution moved by Riyad the commission stood in silence for one minute in tribute to Patrice Lumumba. (R. Addis Ababa, Feb 14 [16])

On Feb 7 Mauritania was admitted as a member of the ECA. The UAR was one of the two countries which voted against Mauritania's admission. Following the vote, Morocco's delegation walked out of the session. (R. Addis Ababa, Feb 7 [9]; R. Rabat, Feb 14 [16])

THIRD ALL-AFRICAN PEOPLES' CONFERENCE (AAPC)

(Cairo, March)

Synopsis. The third conference of the All-African Peoples' Organization was held in Cairo from March 25 to 31. Similar to the Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization, which had its headquarters in Cairo, the AAPC was a "peoples' organization," in which not governments but parties, movements, unions, and exiles were represented. The organization was set up on the initiative of Ghana, in which country it held its first conference, in December 1958. The second conference was held in Tunis in January 1960 (see MER 1960, p. 23). The Cairo conference primarily attacked imperialism, identified with the West, and French colonialism in Algeria, supported Gizaiga in the Congo and criticized the UN role in that country, and attacked the UAM (or Brazzaville group) countries.

Participants. Seventy organizations and movements were invited to the conference. Figures regarding participants varied: 300 delegates representing 61 organizations, 200 delegates from 54 organizations in 31 African countries, 207 delegates representing 57 organizations. Arab delegations represented the UAR, Algeria, Morocco (Mahdi Ben Barka, the exiled opposition leader), and Tunisia. The UAR delegation was headed by Muhammad Fu'ad Galal, Vice-President of the National Assembly.

The following independent African countries were represented by political exiles or opposition leaders: Niger, Mauritania (Shaykh Sidch of the Independence Party [which supported the "return" of Mauritania to Morocco]), Cameroun, Sierra Leone, Congo Leopoldville. (Ahram, March 9, 21, 26, 28; NCNA, March 26 [28]; NYT March 27; MENA, March 28 [29, 30])

Proceedings. The conference was opened by Fu'ad Galal, who was elected chairman of the conference. In the opening speech President Abdel Nasser spoke of imperialism in Africa, especially in the Congo, of French nuclear tests in the Sahara, and of Israel as a tool of imperialism in Africa and the ME. (Ahram, March 26)

Five committees were set up to deal with the following subjects: (1) Liberation of non-independent states; (2) neo-colonialism and the UN; (3) reorganization of the African social and political structure and liquidation of colonialism; (4) economic, social, and democratic development; (5) African unity and solidarity. (MENA, March 28 [30]; Ahram, March 28)

A clash occurred between the Somali and Ethiopian delegates. The UAR chairman intervened several times and requested the Somali delegate to cease speaking. The Somalis accused Ethiopia of aggression, and attacked the chairman for being biased and pro-Ethiopian (R. Addis Ababa, March 28 [30]). During discussions in the committee on liberation, the Somali delegates left the conference as a protest against the committee's refusal to call for the liberation of "Somali territories under British, French, and Ethiopian rule." (Ahram, March 30)

Delegates visited the Cairo broadcasting station and the Gaza strip, where they were shown refugee camps. (Hayat, March 31; Ahram, April 1)

Addressing the delegates at a reception he gave at the end of the conference, President Abdel Nasser said that moral forces were now more effective than atomic weapons and stressed that national unity was an essential factor in the struggle for independence. He assured his audience of the unflinching support of the people of the UAR for the African peoples' struggle. (Africa on the March—All-African Peoples' Conference, UAR Information Dept., Cairo, 1961; R. Cairo, April 2 [5])

Resolutions. The conference adopted detailed resolutions on the topics dealt with by the committees. It called for stronger action in the struggle for independence and issued individual resolutions on all non-independent countries in Africa, as well as on Congo and Cameroun. According to some sources, the conference included Israel among the countries which they considered the principal neo-colonialists active in Africa, the others being the US, Germany, Belgium, Britain, France, Holland, and South Africa. (R. Cairo, March 30 [April 4]; Ahram, March 31; Monde, April 1)

AFRICAN RADIO CONFERENCE

(Cairo, April)

[An African Broadcasting and Television Union was set up in Rabat in May 1960; it decided to set up a technical committee in Cairo. See MER 1960, p. 23.]

On April 22-27, a conference on the technical aspects of African radio and television took place in Cairo. Thirteen states participated: Tunisia, Niger, Nigeria, Guinea, Somalia, Libya, Ivory Coast, Ghana, Mali, Morocco, Upper Volta, Dahomey and the UAR.

The conference was opened by Abd al-Qādir Hātim, UAR Minister of State. He stressed the importance of the propaganda media in the struggle of African peoples. He dwelt mainly on the tasks of the "African broadcasters in the battle of African liberation." The UAR Deputy Director of Broadcasting was elected chairman of the conference.

The representative of Nigeria, an Englishman, left the conference when it was decided that Africans only would take part.

A Cairo weekly alleged that the Tunisian representative had tried—in vain—to obstruct the conference. He had made his address in French; the Libyan representative had demanded that he should not be heard unless he spoke in Arabic.

The following were the main points of the conference resolutions: (1) To set up a training institute of the African Broadcasting and Television Union; (2) to set up a technical centre in Cairo to deal with the technical aspects of the Union, to supervise the use of wavelengths, and to suggest ways of avoiding radio disturbances; (3) members were to intercede with the International Broadcasting Union to put pressure on European states to refrain from using wavelengths which were being used by African stations; (4) the conference denounced radio stations in Africa operated by "imperialist states" and which interfered with African stations.

The chairman said the conference denounced the use of the African continent as a base for foreign stations; member states would work to remove such stations. He also denounced the imperialist states for appropriating frequencies allocated to Africa. (MENA, April 26 [28]; Ahram, April 22, 28; Ruz al-Yusuf, May 1)

ALL-AFRICAN TRADE UNION FEDERATION (AATUF)

(Casablanca, May)

[The conference of the AATUF was held in Casablanca from May 25 to 30, on the initiative of the AAPC Council and in particular of the "Casablanca Charter" states—Ghana, Guinea, Mali, the UAR, Morocco, and Algeria. The representatives of these countries together with those of the Tunisian Union Générale Tunisienne du Travail (UGTT) and the Guinea-based Union Générale des Travailleurs d'Afrique Noire (UGTAN), constituted the preparatory committee. The founding member-unions issued the invitations and guided the proceedings of the conference. They aimed at an all-African federation, in which the Casablanca states would have a dominating influence, and whose members would follow a policy of non-alignment and disaffiliate from any other international trade union body.] (See also MER 1960, p. 23.)

African trade union leaders meeting in Brazzaville sent a protest to the preparatory committee of the Casablanca conference against discrimination in invitations to the conference and the invitation of non-representative unions and delegates. (Le Courrier d'Afrique, May 18)

The conference was attended by "delegates of 45 trade union organizations representing 38 African states" (R. Rabat, May 24 [26]). Representatives of trade unions from Communist and Western countries attended the conference as observers. (BBCM, May 27-June 2)

The conference was opened by King Hasan II and ended a day later than originally planned, following a crisis over the issue of disaffiliation from other international unions. The representatives from the Casablanca group countries, among others, demanded disaffiliation in order to enhance the unity and authority of the African federation. This demand was opposed by the representatives of unions affiliated to the ICFTU, among them Tom Mboya, the leader of the Kenya Federation of Labour, and Ahmad Tlili, SG of the Tunisian UGTT. (BBCM, May 27-June 2; BBC in Arabic, May 28-1MB, May 29; Hayat, May 30)

Charter and Resolutions. On May 30 the conference ended with the approval of a charter of the AATUF, and a set of resolutions. The charter laid down the political principles of non-alignment and struggle against imperialism and reaction, and demanded non-interference by foreign organizations with the trade unions of Africa. The Charter stipulated that the federation was composed of independent trade union organizations which must not be affiliated to international trade union organizations. A ten-month limit was allowed for the disaffiliation of member unions. The federation headquarters would be at Casablanca. (NCNA, June 2 [6]; Jer. Post, May 31)

Mahjub Ben Saddiq, SG of the Union Marocaine du Travail was elected President of the Federation. As'ad Rājih, SG of the Federation of Arab Workers, representing the UAR, was one of the six secretaries of the Federation; the others were from Ghana, Guinea, Morocco, Mali, and Kenya. (BBCM, June 2; MENA, June 2 [6])

The conference was attacked and termed a failure by trade union leaders of Kenya, Tunisia and Nigeria who had been outvoted at the conference, and by the SG of the ICFTU in Brussels. The organizers were criticized for being Communist sympathizers, and for employing undemocratic politics at the conference. (Dépêche Tunisienne, May 31, June 1, 18; Daily Times, Lagos, June 5; R. Israel, June 1 [6])

Plan for Rival Conference. [A rival conference of African trade unions was scheduled for July 30 in Dakar, but took place only in Jan 1962, when the All African Trade Union Federation was formed.] Al-Ahram attacked the ICFTU and the Federation of Christian Workers in Africa for planning an imperialist plot against free African trade unions by calling for a conference of trade unions in Dakar to which the Casablanca Charter states had not been invited (Ahram, July 16). (The Tunisian, Nigerian and Kenya unions, among others, subsequently joined the Dakar group.)

THE CASABLANCA CONFERENCE

SYNOPSIS

The Casablanca conference met in the Moroccan city after which it was named from Jan 3-7. It was called by King Muhammad V of Morocco, and attended by the heads of state of Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Morocco and the UAR and the PM of the "Algerian Provisional Government" (the FLN)—who constituted the Casablanca group—as well as by representatives of Libya and Ceylon.

The conference was called on short notice to deal with the Congo crisis. Those invited were all the African and Asian countries which had contingents in the UN force in the Congo, with the exception of Tunisia. But as India and Indonesia failed to attend, the conference which eventually issued an "African Charter" became "African" by default. Only three countries of the group belonged to "Black Africa"; the other three were Arab.

The participants had been brought closer together by the Congo crisis which served as a catalyst in African politics. The countries represented at Casablanca were pro-Lumumba in the Congo, and took a neutralist, anti-Western line in their foreign policies; some of them were of a "revolutionary" character, in particular the UAR, which was also the most powerful and influential member of the group. The heads of state of Ghana, Guinea and Mali had met on the eve of the conference in Conakry, and resolved to unite their countries.

The Casablanca conference was preceded by a conference of the 12 UAM countries (former French colonies) at Brazzaville (Dec 15-19 1960) which constituted a first attempt to create a bloc of African states. This step taken by African pro-Western states was one reason—in some opinion the foremost reason—for the Casablanca meeting which, in turn, underlined the political division in the continent. This division was further institutionalized by the Monrovia conference (May 8-13) in which the UAM countries were joined by seven others, with Tunisia as the only participant from north of the Sahara. All independent African countries had been invited, and only the Casablanca group countries as well as Libya and Sudan failed to attend. The minority character of the Casablanca group in African politics was thus emphasized. The Monrovia resolutions on African issues were more moderate than those of Casablanca, and supported the established order. Consequently, the Casablanca group denounced the Monrovia group as "imperialist inspired." The Monrovia conference was followed by a conference of the same group, at Lagos, in Jan 1962.

The differences between the Casablanca and Monrovia groups resembled those between the UAR and the other members of the Arab League, and it was thought that this fact was primarily responsible for the absence from the group of Tunisia, Sudan and Libya—the remaining three Arab countries in Africa. Tunisia and the UAR had been politically at loggerheads for years (see: Inter-Arab Relations), and lately Tunisia had also fallen out with Morocco as the only Arab country to oppose Morocco's claim for sovereignty over Mauritania.

A specific motive of the UAR in attending the conference was thought to have been her quest for African leadership. Observers commented in this connection that the UAR's efforts to rally the Arab countries behind her had been blocked; the UAR, on the other hand, emphasized that the African and Arab "circles" were interconnected. King Muhammad of Morocco was thought to have been motivated by a wish to prove to the strong leftist opposition at home that he too was anti-imperialist, and by the wish to canvass support for his claim on Mauritania.

The Casablanca conference adopted resolutions on the Congo, Algeria and Ruanda Urundi, supported Morocco's claim on Mauritania, condemned racial discrimination and the French nuclear tests in the Sahara, and denounced Israel as an instrument of imperialism in Africa and elsewhere. The conference also proclaimed an "African Charter" which provided for the establishment of institutions which were to serve as the basis for the further cooperation of the group.

The stands taken by the conferees during the debate had, however, not been unanimous. On the Congo question, President Nkrumah and King Muhammad were rather more moderate than Presidents Abdel Nasser, Touré and Keita; the resolution was regarded as a compromise. The Palestine resolution was adopted only at the behest of Abdel Nasser; it did not accord with the ties which actually existed—and which continued after the conference—between Israel and Ghana and Mali. (The resolution was acclaimed in the UAR as a great Arab victory over Israel; this was, however, disputed by President Abdel Nasser's antagonists. In Israel there was a feeling that a certain set-back had been suffered.) Similarly, the resolution on Mauritania did not accord with the recognition of that state by Ghana and Mali. There was unanimous support for Algeria but King Muhammad, in his opening speech, laid claim to a section of the Sahara which was generally considered to be part of Algeria. The "African Charter," especially the Joint Command scheme, was thought to be expressive of President Nkrumah's pan-African aspirations, while President Abdel Nasser—if not at the conference then elsewhere (see p 675)—demonstrated a rather guarded approach to African unification schemes.

The conference was praised by the Communist countries and criticized by the Western press.

The "African Charter of Casablanca" provided for the setting up of an African Consultative Assembly, an African Political Committee comprising the heads of state, African Economic and Cultural committees at ministerial level and an African Joint High Command comprising the chiefs of staff. Except for the first, all these institutions were established during the year.

In Feb, following the murder of Lumumba, the Political Committee, at the level of foreign ministers, met in Accra to discuss the Congo situation. A "conference of experts" to draft a protocol to the "African Charter" met in Accra in April. The protocol was signed in a conference of foreign ministers which met in Cairo in May. The conference encountered difficulties and had to be prolonged, mainly, it was reported, because Ghana was again out of step with the majority.

In July, the Economic and Cultural committees and the "Command" met in Conakry, Tangier and Cairo respectively. The Economic Committee adopted far-reaching resolutions and recommendations on economic cooperation, and warned against the "danger" of African countries joining the European Common Market. The Political Committee met in Cairo at the end of August, on the eve of the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries. As Presidents Nkrumah of Ghana and Sekou Touré of Guinea failed to attend, the meeting was held at the level of foreign ministers. In addition to dealing with current international issues, the Committee discussed the reports submitted by the "African Command" and the Committees. The communiqué made no reference to either the location of the headquarters of the "Command" or its chief, and it was reported that no agreement had been reached on these points.

Further meetings of the above-mentioned institutions were scheduled for 1962. By the end of the year cooperation within the framework of the "African Charter" was still limited to the exchange of views in the political sphere—the Charter not having provided for binding resolutions—and to the charting of plans by the committees. No joint venture had actually been set up nor had the "African Command" yet taken any practical form.

THE CONFERENCE

PARTICIPANTS

On Dec 22, 1960, it was reported from Rabat that King Muhammad V of Morocco had invited the heads of states of the following countries to a conference on the Congo: the UAR, Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Ethiopia, Liberia, Nigeria, Sudan, Ceylon, India and Indonesia. (All had contingents in the UN force in Congo.) The same report said acceptance had been received from the Presidents of the four first named. Somalia and Togo were invited to send observers. Later it became known that Libya and the Algerian Provisional Government (APG) had also been invited as participants, and the "legitimate [Congo] government of Lumumba" as an observer.

No invitations were extended, a UAR source emphasized, to President Bourguiba, despite Tunisian reports that he had declined an invitation, nor to Mauritania, the member states of the French Community or the "Mobutu [Congo] Government." However, Tunis Radio itself said at the time of the conference that Tunisia had not been invited, possibly due to her attitude over Mauritania.

Ethiopia, Liberia, Nigeria and Sudan as well as India and Indonesia informed that they regretted not being able to attend the conference.

The names of the participants were officially announced in Rabat on Dec 30, 1960. The announcement said that in view of the aggravation of the situation in the Congo and after consultations with the heads of the African states directly interested in the Congo problem, King Muhammad V had proposed to hold a conference at the highest level.

The following heads of state took part in the conference: King Muhammad V of Morocco (Chairman), Presidents Gamāl Abdel Nasser of the UAR, Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Sékou Touré of Guinea and Modibo Keita of Mali. Other participants were Ferhat Abbas, PM of the APG, Abd al-Qādir Allām, FM and representative of the King of Libya, and Alwin B. Pereira, Ambassador, representing the PM of Ceylon. (Eg Gaz., Dec 24, 1960; R. Rabat, Dec 30, 1960 [Jan 2, 1961]; BBCM, Jan 6; Casablanca Conference, Information Department [UAR], no date)

A delegation of Lumumba representatives and another of the "Senegalese opposition" also attended. (MENA, Jan 3 [6]; R. Rabat, Jan 3 [7])

MOTIVES AND AIMS

Generally, the Casablanca conference was considered a step in the crystallization of African political groupings which had been set off by the Congo crisis.

"Brazzaville Led to Casablanca." "Brazzaville led to Casablanca," wrote Colin Legum, a close observer of the African scene. (The Brazzaville conference of the 12 UAM countries had taken place from Dec 15-19; it favoured mediation in the Congo, upheld Mauritania's independence, professed friendship for France and called on her to end the war in Algeria in 1961 on the basis of Algerian self-determination, and while opposing political union, advocated the strengthening of African solidarity through economic cooperation. The conference constituted a first attempt to create a bloc of African states.)

"The group of African states which had adopted a clear-cut Lumumbist line in the Congo," Legum continued, "had for some time felt the need to coordinate their policies. They had become a minority in the African group at the UN and they were anxious to reassert the initiative taken by them in the earlier stages of Pan-African developments..." (Colin Legum, Pan Africanism, London, 1961, p 50)

Antecedents of the Casablanca Group. [The UAR, Morocco, Ghana, Guinea and Mali had come closer together through the Congo conflict. On Dec 6, 1960 the UAR (as well as Ceylon and Yugoslavia) announced the withdrawal of their contingents from the UN Force in Congo; Morocco and Guinea joined them a few days later. Only Ghana did not join in this move.

Ghana, Guinea and Mali (the latter had separated in Aug 1960 from its federation with Senegal) met at Conakry on Dec 24, 1960, and declared their intention to establish a union of the three states.] The three Presidents flew together from Conakry to Casablanca on Jan 3 "in two Russian made and piloted planes." (NYHT, Jan 4)

Morocco. An article in Le Monde outlined changes in Morocco's policy which led her to the Casablanca conference. King Muhammad's foreign policy had taken a recent change towards militancy and extremism. The absence of Bourguiba from the conference dealt a blow to Maghreb unity which had been an important factor in Moroccan policy. On the other hand, Abdel Nasser's presence had a special meaning, not only in the context of Maghreb unity—Abdel Nasser being an adversary of Bourguiba—but also in the wider context of Morocco's Arab and foreign policy, for in the past Morocco had been reserved in its attitude towards the UAR's regime and its policies. The writer asked: Did these changes in Morocco's policy come in order to efface her long period of reserve on the Algerian conflict? Or in order to "confiscate the foreign policy of the leftist opposition?" Or did they stem from a need to cover the failure on Mauritania? (Monde, Jan 3)

Another commentator took it for a fact that the King, who was generally regarded a "man of the West," was seeking to prove to the strong opposition in his country that he was working with the "anti-imperialists." On the other hand, the commentator thought it was "not completely correct" to attribute the King's change of course to the failure of the West to support his claim on Mauritania. (Frankfurter Rundschau, Jan 5)

[The negative attitude towards Morocco's claim on Mauritania on the part of the Brazzaville conference as well as of Tunisia (see above) should also be noted in regard to the general background for the Moroccan initiative.]

The UAR. Cairo broadcasts presented the conference as a countermove to an imperialist alliance in Africa and a display of cooperation between African nationalism and Arab nationalism. Abdel Nasser's presence at the conference would explode "imperialism's myth" that Arab and African nationalism were diametrically opposed. Not one traitor would be present. (BBCM, Jan 3, 4)

At Casablanca Abdel Nasser launched the African offensive which he had been preparing for a long time, later comments said. In the ME his horizons were blocked: Iraq was making her own bid for Arab leadership; Jordan was defending her independence ferociously; and Israel, by her very existence, constituted an insupportable defiance. Africa was more open to UAR activity. (L'Action Catholique, Canada, Jan 26; La Croix, Paris, Jan 19)

A foreign correspondent in Cairo thought that the UAR's primary interest at Casablanca was to build up President Abdel Nasser as an African leader. Though the UAR could register no success in the Congo itself, her involvement there had put her in "the front line of the Africans," and the UAR now sought to strengthen this position. (Frankfurter Rundschau, Jan 5)

PROCEEDINGS AND RESOLUTIONS

Debate on Agenda. In a preliminary meeting, the Cairo weekly Rûs al-Yûsuf reported, the heads of state agreed to make the conference as short as possible to enable them to attend to their business at home. Thus they agreed to skip opening speeches except for one by King Muhammad. After the King's speech the heads of state met again to determine the agenda. The placing on the agenda of the questions of Congo, Algeria and the French atomic tests in the Sahara was quickly agreed upon while the inclusion of the questions of Palestine, Mauritania and Ruanda Urundi was opposed by some of the participants, and the debate lasted hours (For an official announcement on these meetings see R. Rabat, Jan 4 [6]). Some countries had diplomatic relations with Israel and received assistance from her [Ghana, Guinea, Mali]. However, after Abdel Nasser spoke at length about Israel being a "tool of imperialism," the Palestine issue was put on the agenda. Thereafter King Muhammad set out his views on Mauritania, and following a drawn-out debate between him and President Keita of Mali, this issue too was put on the agenda. This was also the case with Ruanda Urundi, after a lengthy memorandum from the country's representatives was received during the meeting. The last point left was a number of proposals for the organization of Inter-African cooperation. Rûs al-Yûsuf reported, but time was running out. King Muhammad was sick with malaria, Sekou Touré was expected on a state visit in Yugoslavia, Nkrumah was in a hurry to get home... (Rûs al-Yûsuf, Jan 16; compare also NYHT, Jan 5)

The agenda was finally agreed upon as follows: (1) The Congo and Algeria, (2) The Sahara and Mauritania, (3) Palestine, (4) racial discrimination, (5) the unity of Africa and African organizations. (R. Rabat, Jan 4 [6])

The conference, which had opened late-on Jan 4 instead of Jan 3—because of the late arrival of Presidents Keita, Nkrumah and Touré (Times, Jan. 4), was also prolonged by one day, to Jan 7, reportedly because of last minute difficulties involving translations and the phrasing of a joint statement. In the evening of Jan 6 an unscheduled work session took place instead of the scheduled public closing session. There was no official explanation for the delay. President Touré had left for Yugoslavia already on the morning of Jan 6. (NYT, Jan 7)

Congo. The most important point under this heading, Rûs al-Yûsuf reported, was the position of the UN in the conflict, but also on other points the debate was long-drawn. "The heads of states had to cancel the planned hanquets and to make do with sandwiches, and eventually also gave up the sandwiches to save time." (Rûs al-Yûsuf, Jan 16)

Nkrumah's position diverged from that of the majority. Morocco, the UAR, Liha, Mali and Guinea had already declared their intention of withdrawing their troops from the Congo. Ghana, on the other hand, maintained that there should be no withdrawal until a joint African command was ready to replace the UN command in which Ghana played an important part. (Times, July 9)

The UAR was the most ardent promoter of Lumumba and the Lumumbist government in Stanleyville (see pp 636 ff). Reports during the conference said "Abdel Nasser, vigorously supported by Sekou Touré," wanted the African states to give outright military aid to the Stanleyville government and put at its disposal the troops to be withdrawn from the UN Command. Modibo Keita had also taken this stand. Ghana and Morocco, on the other hand, though they strongly supported Lumumba, opposed such an extreme move, feeling that it would precipitate civil war which might spread to the rest of the continent and invite armed intervention by the world powers (NYHT, NYT, Jan 6). Rûs al-Yûsuf, however, reported that it was primarily Sekou Touré who debated Nkrumah, while Abdel Nasser mediated between the two. Keita supported Sekou Touré. Following reports which the Cairo Al-Gumhuriyah had spread by "imperialist trumpets," Nkrumah denied that he intended to return home before the conference closed.

The Liha Foreign Minister objected to the inclusion of certain wordings in the resolutions but immediately withdrew his objections when he was confronted by the unanimity of the other participants and had a talk with King Muhammad. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 6; Rûs al-Yûsuf, Jan 16)

A compromise was reached, it was reported, according to which Ghana agreed in principle to the withdrawal of the forces, but only after the UN was given another chance to help Lumumba return to power in the Congo (Jer. Post, Jan 6; Ahram, Jan 10). [This compromise will be seen in the resolutions on Congo.]

In the "Communiqué concerning the situation in the Congo" the conference: (1) Declared "the intention and determination" of the participants to withdraw their troops placed under the UN Command in the Congo; (2) Reaffirmed their recognition of the elected Parliament and legally constituted government of the Congo which came into being on June 30, 1960; (3) Being convinced that the only justification for the presence of the UN troops in the Congo was (a) to answer the appeals of the "legitimate government" of the Congo "at whose request the UN decided to create the Command." (b) to implement the decisions of the Security Council, (c) to safeguard the unity, independence and integrity of the Congo; (4) Urged the UN to act immediately to: (a) "disarm and disband the lawless bands of Mobutu," (b) release from prison all members of the Parliament and the "legitimate government," (c) reconvene the Parliament, (d) eliminate all Belgian and other foreign military and para-military personnel not belonging to the UN, (e) release to the "legitimate government" all airports, radio stations and other establishments, now "unlawfully withheld" from it, (f) prevent the Belgians from using Ruanda Urundi as "a base to commit aggression" against the Congo; (5) "Besides that, if the purposes and principles which justified the presence of the UN Operational Command in the... Congo are not realized and respected, then the states here represented reserve the right to take appropriate action." (For sources, see below: Resolutions.)

According to a Cairo source, secret resolutions on the Congo had also been adopted. A Soviet correspondent in Casablanca reported that these resolutions concerned the "appropriate measures" mentioned in para 5 above, and were considered to refer to a plan to aid the Stanleyville government outside the UN framework. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Jan 15; Izvestia, Jan 10 quoted in Mizan, Jan)

Two principal suggestions which King Muhammad had made in his opening speech were completely omitted from the resolutions. He suggested that once the authority of the "legal government" [Lumumba] had been established, the UN General Assembly create a permanent Congo committee and appeal to all Congolese leaders to meet in a national conference which should attempt to heal—with the help of the Congo committee—the dissensions in the country (Moroccan Embassy, London: News Bulletin No 43, Jan). [A round table conference had been proposed by the Brazzaville group, though as an initial step in seeking a solution, and on the eve of the Casablanca conference President Kasavubu of Congo called for a round table conference on Jan 25. See also p 640 for background information on the Congo crisis.]

It was commented that the resolution "conveniently left open the date of withdrawal" of the contingents from the UN Command (Times, Jan 9). Ghana did not recall her contingent with the UN force. Mali had withdrawn hers already in Nov 1960. Guinea withdrew her troops in Jan, the UAR in Feb, Morocco in March-May. Ceylon and Indonesia also recalled their troops. Sudan withdrew her contingent in April, after Sudanese troops were attacked by a Congolese force at Matadi on March 5-6. Indian and Tunisian troops, among others, reinforced the depleted UN force. (UN Year Book 1960, 1961)

The Palestine Question. In his opening speech, King Muhammad made two short references to the question. Condemning the "partitioning of national territories in order to weaken them," he mentioned Algeria, "Arab Palestine," Congo (Katanga) and Indonesia (West Irian). He also asserted "our determination to resist colonialism... to liberate Arab Palestine from Zionist occupation, the Congo, Algeria..." (Moroccan Embassy, London: News Bulletin No 43, Jan). These passages did not appear in the original official text of the speech but were added, it was reported, at the behest of Abdel Nasser; one was pencilled in and the other added later. (NYHT, Jan 5)

UAR sources gave details on the debate. Hassanain Haykal in Al-Ahram published what he said were excerpts from minutes of the conference. King Muhammad suggested to open the debate on the topic, whereupon Sekou Touré said there was no need for a prolonged debate, the conference should call for the implementation of the UN resolutions. King Muhammad then read out a short note saying that the conference should propose a "just solution" to the question, "in accordance with the UN resolutions and restoring to the Arabs of Palestine their full rights." Ferhat Abbas supported the King's declaration.

At this point Abdel Nasser intervened, explaining his view point in detail. He said it was not a question of UN resolutions only. He alleged that Israel was both an imperialist force and an imperialist tool. Israel, he said, had been established by Western imperialism which utilized it as a base for aggression in the ME—as in the Suez Campaign of 1956—and as a base for infiltration into Africa and Asia. He said the British had enabled Israel to enter Ghana before the UAR—and Nkrumah knew this for a fact. Imperialism in Africa hid behind Israel because she was small and did not appear dangerous. He claimed that Israel's stands on the Congo, Algeria, Cyprus and other questions were all evidence of her imperialist role. Abdel Nasser said that the UAR stood guard against the imperialist danger at Africa's north-eastern gate but she also felt that the African countries should protect her from any threat from the rear. He concluded that the conference should adopt resolutions both on the rights of the Arabs of Palestine and on Israel's imperialist penetration. (Ahram, Jan 20)

Touré and Keita supported Abdel Nasser, Ruz al-Yusuf reported, and King Muhammad dwelt on the rights of the Palestine Arabs. Nkrumah on the other hand explained in detail the diplomatic, economic and cultural relations between Ghana and Israel. After a debate on Nkrumah's statement the Ghanaian President agreed with the other participants (Ruz al-Yusuf, Jan 16). The "Resolution on Palestine" said: The conference (1) Warns against the menace which this situation presents to the peace and security of the ME and the international tension which results therefrom; (2) Insists on... a just solution in conformity with the UN resolutions and the resolutions of Bandung to restore to the Arabs of Palestine all their legitimate rights; (3) Notes with indignation that Israel has always taken the side of the imperialists... concerning vital [African] problems... notably Algeria, the Congo and the nuclear tests in Africa, and the conference therefore denounces Israel as an instrument in the service of imperialism and neo-colonialism not only in the ME but also in Africa and Asia; (4) Calls upon the states of Africa and Asia to oppose this new policy which imperialism is carrying out to create bases for itself. (For sources see below: Resolutions)

"Resolutions on Palestine"—Arab and Israeli Reaction. "The salient point of the Casablanca conference as described in your message to me," President Abdel Nasser told the UAR National Assembly after his return home, "is that it was a measure taken against imperialism and against Zionism as one of its agents and tools." At Bandung, Adel Nasser said, there was "Afro-Asian unanimity" to place Israel "behind the barrier of isolation" as a form of the "imperialist disease," and this had now recurred at Casablanca. Israel's only harvest in Africa would be her "bitter fury." In a later speech (Damascus, Feb 21) he said Africa was made aware at Casablanca of the "imperialist danger" that was Israel. (Nasser's Speeches, pp 3-23)

UAR press and radio commentaries echoed the President's words, e.g.: "The outcome on the Palestine question was the main gain from the Casablanca conference." "The Palestine problem has now become an African problem as much as it is an Arab problem" (Akhbar, Jan 10; Ayyam, Jan 9). Abdel Nasser in one stroke had succeeded in frustrating the Israeli rulers' toil and struggle in Africa. (R. Cairo, Jan 8-IMB, Jan 9)

In Jordan the radio and part of the press criticized the UAR for exaggerating the importance of the resolution. An Amman radio commentary attacked Abdel Nasser for not having brought a single African leader to sever relations with Israel. (R. Amman, Jan 9-IMB, Jan 10; see also Menas, Jan 8, 10)

The Israeli press sought explanations for and voiced disappointment at the fact that the three non-Arab African countries had consented to the anti-Israeli resolution: "The strong anti-Israeli resolution... has caused some surprise in diplomatic circles in Jerusalem..." reported Ha'aretz, which surmised that possibly the resolution had been passed after Nkrumah and Sekou Touré had left Casablanca, a day before the end of the conference (Ha'aretz, Jan 8). [There was no evidence to this effect; in any case, both later affirmed that they stood by the resolutions.] "The fact that a very strong anti-Israeli resolution was adopted... shows that our political relations with the countries of Africa and Asia demand unceasing efforts on our part in disseminating information and in constructive acts..." The Casablanca decision, even though its practical implementations are not clear, gives cause for concern." (Ha'aretz, Jan 9)

The Jerusalem Post, describing the close relations existing between Israel and Ghana and Mali, thought that Abdel Nasser had made the adoption of anti-Israeli resolutions the condition for a common stand on other subjects; thus, for the sake of this unanimity, Presidents Nkrumah and Keita had agreed to join in resolutions against Israel as well as Mauritania, which had been recognized by Ghana a short time before. This stand, however, could hardly be consistent with African policies of neutrality (Jer. Post, Jan 9). The Israel Foreign Ministry instructed Israel diplomatic representatives in Ghana, Mali and Guinea to request formal explanations on the resolution. All three countries made known that they stood by the resolutions, while Ghana and Mali also expressed the wish to continue their ties with Israel. (Jer. Post, Jan 11, 19, 27; see also: Israel, International Relations: Ghana, Guinea, Mali)

On March 22, an Israel official spokesman said that as relations with Ghana, Guinea and Mali were continuing, the Casablanca resolution was only of a limited importance. (Jer. Post, March 23)

Algeria. [On the Algerian question, unanimity reigned, according to all sources.]

It was remarked, however, that in his opening speech King Muhammad surprised his listeners by making an implied claim to the Sahara region of Reggan, regarded by France and the Algerian insurgents as part of Algeria. The King referred to the third French atomic test carried out in that region as having taken place "on a part of the territory of our Kingdom." (NYT, Jan 5; text of speech in Moroccan Embassy, London: News Bulletin, No. 43, Jan)

In its "Resolution on Algeria" the conference declared its determination to support "by all means" the Algerian people and the Algerian Provisional Government (APG) in their struggle for independence. It termed "any assistance given to France in her war in Algeria" as an "act of hostility directed against Africa as a whole," called on all governments to recognize the APG and "approved" the enlistment of African and other volunteers in the Army of National Liberation. (For sources, see below: Resolutions.)

Mauritania. [Morocco's claim for sovereignty over Mauritania, which had gained independence in Nov 1960, was supported by the Arab countries, Tunisia excepted.] As also mentioned above, one of King Muhammad's motives in calling the conference was thought to have been his wish to canvas support on the question (Monde, Jan 3). President Keita raised objections to Morocco's stand, but agreed in the end to the Moroccan resolution. (Ruz al-Yaumi, Jan 16)

The resolution adopted defined Mauritania as the southern part of Morocco and stigmatized her as a "puppet state" set up by France; the conference approved "any action taken by Morocco on Mauritania for the restitution of her legitimate rights." (For sources see below: Resolutions.)

Resolutions. In addition to the Communiqué on the Congo and the resolutions on Palestine, Algeria and Mauritania, the conference adopted the following resolutions:

Nuclear Tests: The conference condemned French nuclear tests in Africa, the "collusion between France and Israel with regard to nuclear tests," and invited all African countries "to reconsider their relations with France."

Ruanda Urundi: The conference denounced "Belgian attempts to divide this country," to use it "as a base for aggression," demanded the evacuation of all Belgian forces in the territory and supported the cause of the people of Ruanda Urundi in their struggle for "real independence."

Apartheid and Racial Discrimination: The conference denounced the government of South Africa for "its contempt of the decisions taken by the UN and African and Asian conferences"; denounced the "imperialist powers" who supported this government, and called for sanctions by the UN.

The conference also adopted an "African Charter" for which see below. (For text of resolution see, e.g.: Casablanca Conference, Jan 1961, issued by Information Department, UAR; Colin Legum, Pan Africanism, London, 1961; MENA, Jan 8 [10].)

The African Charter of Casablanca provided the basis for the activities of the Casablanca group. Whereas all resolutions were issued in the name of the conference, the Charter was proclaimed by the assembled heads of African states only.

The heads of state proclaimed their "determination to promote the triumph of liberty all over Africa and to achieve its unity," to promote world peace, to adopt the policy of non-alignment, and to liquidate colonialism and neo-colonialism; they also proclaimed the necessity for the African states to direct their policies to the exploitation of their national wealth for the benefit of their people and its equitable distribution among the citizens. To promote effective co-operation among the African states they decided on the creation of the following bodies:

The African Consultative Assembly, to be established "as soon as conditions permit," and to comprise representatives of all African states.

The African Political Committee, comprising the heads of state or their representatives.

The African Economic Committee, comprising the ministers of economic affairs.

The African Cultural Committee, comprising the ministers of education.

The Joint African High Command, comprising the chiefs of staff.

Liaison Office, to co-ordinate the activities of the different organizations.

The committees and High Command were to meet periodically to coordinate policies and promote cooperation. The High Command would seek to ensure the common defence of Africa. (For sources see above: Resolutions)

The African High Command was proposed by President Nkrumah, it was reported on the eve of the conference. It was remarked that he probably thought that he would be entrusted with the position of Commander-in-Chief. The Egyptians had agreed to the establishment of the Command with reservations. They had also pointed out that the Command would provide the opportunity to remove from the African armies "the white officers and Israelis." (British officers were especially prominent in the Ghanaian army.) (Frankfurter Rundschau, Jan 5)

WORLD REACTIONS AND COMMENTARY

Western Criticism. The Western press disapproved of the conference and its resolutions. The participants were termed "impatient" or "revolutionary Africa" (Monde, Jan 3), and the "African dissidents" (NYT, Jan 5), and it was thought that the conference was apt to widen the divisions within the continent (Times, Jan 3). If the participants had anything in common, it was remarked, it was their strong anti-colonialism (Daily Express, London, quoted by McAerie, Jan 9). The New York Times said the Casablanca group had proclaimed an African "Monroe Doctrine," namely to liquidate with UN help all Western positions in Africa. Comparing President Kasavubu's approach to a Congo solution—a round table conference and reuniting the country on a federal basis—with the alternative of a "centralized dictatorship imposed by force," which was endorsed by the Casablanca group, the paper favoured the former. The paper noted that the group "undertook to dictate to the UN" by threatening to withdraw their contingents from the UN forces unless their demands were met. (NYT, Jan 5, 10)

The conference was regarded as a victory for President Abdel Nasser. He had gained a strong condemnation of Israel. The King of Morocco gained similar support for his claim to Mauritania, and Dr Nkrumah was won over by the setting up of the African High Command and the Charter, steps nearer in the direction of his pan-African aspirations. But only Abdel Nasser had to make no concessions. (Scotsman, Jan 10). Abdel Nasser was thought to have been more than usually aggressive in his anti-western stand and in his attacks on the UN "to which he owed more than any other leader in the world." (Washington Post, Jan 10)

Communist Countries Approve of Conference. Telegrams of support were sent to the conference by PM Khrushchov, PM Chou En-lai, President Tito and Chairman Ulbricht (Tanyug, Jan 4 [EE 6]; ADN, Jan 2 [EE 4]; R. Berlin (GDR), Jan 6 [EE 9]). Soviet, Eastern European and the Peking radio stations hailed the conference as an anti-imperialist gathering working for a just solution of the Congo problem and the liberation and unity of the African states. (See BBCM, EE, FE, SU, Jan 1-12)

In a statement on the Congo and Ruanda Urundi, issued on Jan 11, the Soviet government termed the Casablanca conference "an important event in the struggle for the liberation of Africa from... colonialism." It fully supported the conference's resolutions on the Congo. (Mizan, Feb)

Arab Attitudes Divided. [Arab official reactions and press comment reflected the differing attitudes towards the

UAR and her President as well as towards the world powers.]

Abd al-Halîq Hassûnah, the [Egyptian] SG of the Arab League, Ahmad Shukairy, the Saudi Arabian representative at the UN [a Palestinian], Baghdad Radio and papers (but no official Iraqi spokesmen) were among those which had praise for the conference. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 6; Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 11; Ahali, Jan 10; R. Baghdad Jan 3-IMB, Jan 4; R. Baghdad, Jan 9, 10 [10, 11])

President Bourguiba of Tunisia said in a press interview on the conference: "Such a meeting of a limited number of African States has the disadvantage of demonstrating, or perhaps crystallizing, the divisions between African states, strengthening them and widening them. It involves the risk of creating divisions among the very small group meeting in Casablanca..." He said he was "not in favor of these improvised meetings by Heads of State assembled to run down a country that does not toe the line, and to attack the UN." He thought that "our position is that of the vast majority of the African countries..." (Afrique Action, Jan 9)

Amman disparaged the "alleged success of the conference." Amman Radio said Abdel Nasser's "trumpets" were busy building up the conference "as if the solution of the Palestine problem depended on signatures by Ghana, Guinea or Mali." Abdel Nasser had failed to persuade any African leader to take any positive steps which could be termed a victory over Israel. (R. Amman, Jan 9 [11])

[While Lebanese pro-UAR papers extolled the conference, other papers were critical, e.g.: Al-Jaridah said that Abdel Nasser should appreciate the importance of the coexistence of various African currents and should try to unite them instead of identifying himself with one of them (Jaridah, Jan 6). Another paper thought that the reason for the absence of Sudan, Tunisia and Ethiopia from the conference was the UAR policy towards them which made them wish to keep their distance from her. (Nahar, Jan 4)]

A resolution of the Baghdad Conference of Arab League Foreign Ministers (Jan 30-Feb 4) requested the member states which had not participated in the Casablanca Conference to consult its resolutions. One country, [probably Tunisia], made a reservation. (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6]; Jaridah, Feb 5)

Brazzaville Group: The Senegal radio and paper condemned the conference as a divisive effort: Whereas the Brazzaville conference had been open to all African countries, Casablanca had been closed to certain countries "because of their realism and moderation." The Africa that met at Casablanca was "carried away by a tempest of sterile passions and various competitions." There was no prospect for isolating the Brazzaville powers. (R. Dakar, Jan 11 [13])

Both Dakar and President Houphouët-Boigny of the Ivory Coast were critical of the linking of Africa to Arab affairs as was the case with the Palestine question: President Houphouët-Boigny said it was the right of Morocco and Egypt to consider that "the Arab League must come before Africa" and to take up at the League level questions that most concerned them. "Indeed not all the Arabs are African. We should like to have it understood, however, that we, too, have some problems to discuss together, first of all among ourselves, without calling for undeserved reproaches or accusations about which the least that can be said is that they are inopportune and unjustified." (APS Press Agency, Abidjan, Ivory Coast, Jan 5)

Dakar Radio asked whether the need to escape isolation made it necessary for certain African states to align themselves unconditionally with the stand taken by the Arab League. All Africans were obviously in agreement with the conference's condemnation of racialism. Their only wish was that there should be no exceptions, and that neither Israel nor any other state should be discriminated against. "It is always possible to unite people or countries against something, but this is not very constructive. Let us beware lest Casablanca should mark another form of imperialism—even racialism." (R. Dakar, Jan 10 [12])

ACTIVITIES OF THE CASABLANCA GROUP

ACCRA CONFERENCE ON CONGO

(February 19-22)

Following the assassination of Patrice Lumumba in Katanga (announced on Feb 13) Ghana called for an urgent conference of the political committee of the "African Charter." The foreign ministers of the six signatories of the Charter—Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Morocco, the UAR and the Algerian Provisional Government—met in Accra from Feb 19-24. The ministers were also to discuss the establishment of the committees provided for in the Charter.

[While the conference was meeting, the Security Council too was dealing with the Congo question, and the Lumumba murder in particular. It adopted a resolution sponsored by the UAR, Ceylon and Liberia with which the resolutions adopted at Accra did not correspond. Compare p 639]

In a communiqué issued on Feb 23, the conference supported President Nkrumah's suggestion, made a week before, that the UN Command in the Congo should be reconstituted "with a view to the setting up of an African Command." All diplomatic missions in the Congo should be temporarily withdrawn to give the "African Command" a "fair chance" and eliminate the cold war from the country. The conference affirmed the recognition of the Gizenga government by the participating countries and called on all other countries to exchange missions with it. [The UAR had been the first government to follow the USSR in recognizing the Gizenga government, on Feb 13; meanwhile a number of Communist countries had followed suit.] There were a number of other recommendations. Earlier the conference had resolved to send a letter to the UN Secretary-General demanding that the advance of the "gangs of Mobutu" towards Orientale Province be stopped.

It was also decided to hold a "conference of experts" of the Casablanca group countries in Accra, on March 20. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 23; R. Rabat, Feb 21 [24]; R. Brazzaville, Feb 22 [24]; see also Ahram, Feb 18, 22, 23; Monde, Feb 22, 23; Hayat, Feb 24)

ACCRA CONFERENCE OF EXPERTS

(April 6-11)

The "conference of experts" originally scheduled for March 20 (see above) met in Accra on April 6. (Eg. Gaz., April 7)

[The six signatories to the "African Charter" were joined in this conference by Tunisia.] Libya failed to attend and cabled an apology. (R. Cairo, April 15 [18])

"Tunisia Accepts African Charter." According to one Cairo source, Tunisia's approval of the Casablanca resolutions preceded her participation in the Accra conference (Gumhuriyah, quot. in BBCM, April 11). According to another Cairo report the Tunisian delegate's presence was in accordance with an agreement between Presidents

Nkrumah and Bourguiba. Following a Ghanaian proposal that the UAR delegate should be chairman, the Tunisian representative (her Ambassador in Morocco, Hayat, April 5) said that he had been instructed to attend the conference but not to comment on its decisions. In reply the Guinean delegate had said: "Tunisia cannot place one foot inside the conference and the other outside it"; she could not participate unless she declared her approval of the "African Charter." Thereupon the Tunisian delegate declared that his government endorsed the Charter. On his return from Accra, Mahmūd Rīyād, the UAR chief delegate, said, however, that there had been no disagreement over the chairmanship; Tunisia had welcomed the UAR delegate to the chair. (MENA, April 9, 12 [11, 14])

Rīyād stated that the experts had drawn up a draft protocol for the coordination of the work of the committees to be established under the "African Charter," as well as draft by-laws for their work, in preparation for the foreign ministers' conference which would meet in Cairo on April 30. The experts would meet for further preparatory work on April 27. (R. Cairo, April 15 [18])

CAIRO CONFERENCE OF FOREIGN MINISTERS PROTOCOL OF AFRICAN CHARTER

(April 30-May 5)

The conference—which was preceded by a meeting of the experts committee on April 27—took place with the participation of the six signatory countries to the "African Charter." Libya apologized for its absence (MENA, April 30 [May 2]). Tunisia did not participate.

Tunisia's Absence. Tunisia, it was reported from Tunis, had decided against participation on the grounds that "little constructive work" could be accomplished by participants holding such widely divergent views (Mid. Mir., May 6). [Tunisia participated in the rival Monrovia conference, see below.] The organ of the Tunisian Neo-Destour party criticized the Cairo conference and contrasted it with the Monrovia conference which represented the majority of states. The paper said the Cairo conference dealt mainly with propaganda, while Africa was in need of action (Amal, April 30). On May 2, however, a conference spokesman at Cairo reiterated that Tunisia and Libya had acceded to the treaty [Charter]. (MENA, May 2 [4])

Issue of Monrovia Conference. One of the issues discussed at Cairo was the Monrovia conference of African states which met from May 8-13. [19 countries, the majority of independent African countries, were represented at this conference, mostly at the level of heads of state or government. Invitations to the conference—which was to discuss African unity and cooperation, stability and decolonization, the situation in the Congo, Angola,

South Africa and other questions—were sent out at the beginning of April by a number of states, including Guinea and Mali of the Casablanca group. The other Casablanca group members declined the invitations. Later Guinea and Mali also declined to attend, possibly due to Ghanaian influence. Some days before the conference Ghana, Guinea and Mali requested that the conference be postponed, but President Tubman of Liberia—the host of the conference—did not agree.]

On May 3 the Cairo conference issued a statement saying that it had been informed of the invitations to the Monrovia conference and of the request for its postponement. It added that the heads of state of the "African Charter" would participate in all joint actions undertaken by African states for the unity of Africa that agreed with previous resolutions of the conferences of African independent states and the Casablanca conference. (Ahram, May 4)

[The Monrovia conference was attended by the 12 UAM states, including Mauritania (the Brazzaville conference group), and by Ethiopia, Liberia, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Togo and Tunisia. The six signatories to the "Casablanca African Charter," as well as Libya and Sudan did not attend. The Monrovia resolutions were rather more moderate than those of Casablanca. In regard to inter-African relations they emphasized (not unlike the majority of Arab states in regard to inter-Arab relations) the equality of states, their right to independence of each other as well as to union, respect for territorial integrity and non-intervention in each others internal affairs. As to the Congo, they implicitly opposed the Lumumba regime. The Monrovia conference thus served to crystallize the division of the continent into two camps; on the one hand, the Monrovia group comprising the moderates, both pro-Westerners and neutralists; on the other, the Casablanca group, encompassing a minority of neutralist anti-Western inclined countries, some of them "revolutionary," with the Arab countries predominating.]

UAR broadcasts disparaged the Monrovia conference (R. Cairo, R. Damascus, May 10 [12]). Rabat denounced it as imperialist inspired (R. Rabat, May 12 [15]). [and President Nkrumah alleged that the majority of African countries represented at Monrovia was "false" and did not reflect the "force and strength of the African masses"; Africans must be ready to reject the established frontiers drawn for the convenience of the colonial powers.]

Conference Encounters Difficulties. The signing of the protocol to the "Casablanca Charter," was officially scheduled for May 4 (R. Cairo, May 3 [5]), but was postponed. On May 4 reporters waited for over an hour to record the signing of the protocol before being told that it would not, in fact, be held. Mahmud Riyad told the press that the signing would not take place on the next day either, and when asked regarding May 6, he answered merely, "Who knows?" Some of the delegates expressed pessimism on the score of achieving ultimate accord. It was thought that it was Ghana who was out of step with the majority, both on the African High Command and the Congo issues (Mid. Mir., May 3). Ghana reportedly came under criticism for not having put the Casablanca resolutions into effect [for not having withdrawn her troops from the UN Command in the Congo?] and for having continued her relations with Israel as before. (Daver, Tel-Aviv, May 5)

Legal difficulties were reported to have cropped up with regard to the ratification of the Charter. The Charter would bind the countries in a way similar to that of the Arab League. But as three of the participants—Ghana, Guinea and Mali—had previously decided on a union of their states, and as Algeria was not yet independent, only Morocco and the UAR could approve the Charter without problems. (Monde, May 3)

The conference ended on May 6; a spokesman said the delegates had approved the text of the protocol to the Charter, but the protocol itself was not produced, and was made public only on May 9. (see below; Mid. Mir., May 13)

The Resolutions and Protocol were made public by Mahmud Riyad on May 9. The protocol, Riyad said, was signed by the foreign ministers on the authority of their heads of state and would be ratified by each state according to its constitutional requirements.

The first meetings of the institutions of the Charter were to be held as follows: On July 15, the Economic Committee at Conakry, and the High Command [venue unspecified]; on July 31, the Cultural Committee at Casablanca; the Political Committee before Sept 15 at a venue to be decided through consultations.

Bamako, the capital of Mali, would be the headquarters of the liaison office. The temporary secretary—pending appointment of a permanent secretary by the Political Committee—would be a Moroccan.

The protocol had 19 articles. It reiterated that cooperation within the framework of the "African Charter" would be conducted through the three committees, the High Command and the liaison office; the Political Committee (heads of state or their representatives) would meet once a year, the other bodies—"periodically." It laid down the duties of the liaison office and its head, the secretary—recommending measures for coordination, drafting the budget and secretarial work.

Art. 16 provided that any African state accepting the provisions of the Charter and protocol could become a member upon the approval of the Political Committee.

The member states declared that their international obligations and commitments should not contradict those under the Casablanca Charter and protocol and, in particular, the policy of non-alignment. They undertook to inform the secretary of any agreements and treaties to which they became party.

The protocol could be amended at the request of one member state and the approval of two-thirds of the members with a view to strengthening the relations among the members. The protocol was to become effective when approved by at least two member states. (Full text in MENA, May 9 [11])

AFRICAN COMMAND AND COMMITTEES' MEETINGS

Higher Council of African Joint High Command (Cairo, July 15-28). The six signatories of the "African Charter" were represented in the meeting by high-ranking officers, [not by the chiefs of staff.] (Ahram, July 16; BBCM, July 18)

On July 28 the Council released a communiqué saying that at the meetings the Command had organized its bodies, defined their procedures and adopted practical decisions regarding cooperation among the armies of the member states. The situation in Africa had also been considered. There had been complete unanimity of views. The next two meetings would take place in the UAR and Morocco. At the closing meeting, the UAR delegate said that the meeting was laying the basis for the first African military organization for the defence of Africa. (MENA, July 28 [31]; Ahram, July 29)

On Aug 30 it was reported that the Political Committee of the Charter had chosen Maj.-Gen. Muhammad Fawzi, director of the UAR war college, as C-in-C of the African Command (Ahram, Aug 30), but this was not confirmed in the communiqué of the Committee, (see below).

In Sept the intention was reported to set up the Command in Accra. (Ahram, Sept 24; Ghanaian Times, Sept 26; see also below: Political Committee Meeting)

Economic Committee Meeting (Conakry, July 17-21). The UAR was represented by Abd al-Mun'im al-Qaysuni, Central Minister of Economy and Finance. Both Qaysuni and President Sekou Touré, who opened the conference, blamed imperialism for the economic backwardness of the African countries. Qaysuni warned against the "danger" of African countries joining the European Common Market, a step which he said would harm their foreign trade and hinder industrialization. He called for an African economic bloc instead, geared to the specific needs of the African countries. (Ahram, July 19)

The conference decided on the establishment of a free African trade zone within five years, starting with a 25% reduction in customs duties from Jan 1, 1962. The resolution also included the creation of an African development bank, the signing of an agreement on technical cooperation, the establishment of an African payments union, the bringing about of economic unity to which end a permanent council for economic unity would be established, and the adopting of a common external economic policy. It was also agreed in principle to create a commission for communications to deal with cooperation in posts, telecommunications, and maritime, air, rail, and road transport, to set up joint shipping and air lines, to set up African postal and telecommunications unions, and to establish air routes between the member capitals. Two commemorative postage stamps were to be issued on the first anniversary of the Casablanca conference, one bearing the photograph of the late King Muhammad V, the other in memory of Lumumba.

The next meeting was to be held in Jan 1962. (R. Rabat, July 29 [Aug 1]; R. Cairo, Aug 1 [3]; Ahram, Monde, Aug 2; Horaya, Conakry, Aug 22)

The Cultural Committee (Tangier, July 31-Aug 4). The six signatories to the "African Charter" were represented at the meeting.

The conference agreed inter alia: to set up a centre for African studies; to convene scientific conferences; to draft an agreement on exchange of teachers and scholarships; to encourage cultural exchange; to hold an African festival; to set up a joint fund for Algerian students; to hold a census of technical institutions of learning; to establish prizes for scientific achievements; to examine ways of evolving a common policy on technical assistance from the UN and through multi-lateral agreements. (L'Esor, Bamako, Aug 1, 11; R. Rabat, Aug 5 [8]; Ahram, Aug 19, 26)

The Political Committee (Cairo, Aug 28-29). The heads of state of the "African Charter" countries were due to meet in Cairo on Aug 28, preliminary to the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (Sept 1-6) which all of them were to attend. President Nkrumah of Ghana and President Sekou Touré of Guinea, however, failed to attend. Nkrumah was on a visit to the USSR, and Touré was reportedly kept at home by a political crisis. Present at the opening were President Abdel Nasser, King Hasan II of Morocco (King Muhammad had died on Feb 26), President Modibo Keita of Mali, PM Yousef Ben Khedda of the APG, and the foreign ministers of Ghana and Guinea. On the suggestion of Abdel Nasser, it was decided to continue the conference at ministerial level. (Monde, Ahram, Aug 29)

"Usually reliable sources" reported that the meeting had failed to agree on the location of the headquarters of the "African Command." The majority had favoured Cairo but Ghana had suggested Accra. It had been agreed to discuss the matter with President Nkrumah at Belgrade. It was also noted that the communiqué (see below) made no reference to the identity of the commander of the "African Command" though Cairo papers, the previous day, had stated that Maj.-Gen. Fawzi had been appointed to the post. (Mid. Mir., Sept 2)

The communiqué, issued on Aug 30, said the Committee had approved the recommendations of the "African Command" to establish a "Higher Council" of the Command consisting of the chiefs of staff, and to set up a permanent military staff. The Committee approved the "allocation of some forces" from the Charter members for employment by the Command in time of need. The Committee had taken note of the reports submitted by the economic and cultural committees.

The committee also took stands on various African issues: Congo, Angola, the "French aggression against Tunisia" (the Bizerta crisis), Algeria, racial discrimination, the "danger" to Africa from European economic groupings, "the attitude of imperialist powers in Africa and their disguise behind agents." The Committee welcomed the adherence of other African states to the Charter. (MENA, Aug 30 [Sept 1])

THE BELGRADE CONFERENCE OF NON-ALIGNED COUNTRIES

SYNOPSIS

The Belgrade Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries was held on Sept 1-6; it was attended by heads of state or representatives of 25 countries: Afghanistan, the Algerian Provisional Government (APG), Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, Congo (L), Cuba, Cyprus, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Mali, Morocco, Nepal, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Tunisia, the UAR, Yemen and Yugoslavia.

Three Latin-American countries, Bolivia, Brazil and Ecuador, were represented by observers.

Thirteen of the 25 countries represented were predominantly Muslim. Nine participants were Arab, but three members of the Arab League were not represented—Jordan, Kuwait and Libya. The Communist, SEATO and CENTO countries among the ME and Asian countries had, of course, not been invited, as was the case with Israel (though she fitted the requirements of non-alignment specified by the preparatory conference.) Sub-Saharan Africa was represented by a minority of countries—half of them being members of the Casablanca group. Cuba was the sole participant from the Americas, and Yugoslavia the sole country from Europe.

The conference was sponsored by President Abdel Nasser of the UAR and President Tito of Yugoslavia. Reports that those two leaders were contemplating the idea of a neutralist conference first appeared in February and March. Tito was said to have conceived the idea in 1959, when he was at odds with both the USSR and People's China, while President Sukarno of Indonesia, and originally also Abdel Nasser, were said to have wished for a new Afro-Asian conference on the pattern of the Bandung conference (at which People's China was represented). PM Nehru of India, however, the dean of the neutralist leaders, had opposed both a neutralist and a Bandung type conference, and in particular any attempt at forming a third world bloc.

The UAR's view was, it was later explained in Cairo, that in the face of the world crisis (Congo, Cuba, Berlin), the non-aligned countries must save the peace. For the United Nations was ineffective and so were the regional groupings of Afro-Asian states; the latter were divided among themselves, and some of them were tied to the West. (On the political divisions in Africa which had recently emerged see under: The Casablanca Conference, above.) The UAR's growing interest in Latin America was also noted in connection with the conference. An Indian correspondent in Cairo said the UAR felt that by virtue of internal stability and political vigour she had qualified herself for leadership among the "wobbly regimes" of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The decisive step was taken in April when Abdel Nasser and Tito met in Cairo. The Bandung idea, which Sukarno continued to sponsor, was shelved, and India was confronted with a fait accompli, namely the consent to a neutralist summit of other countries besides the two sponsors. Abdel Nasser and Tito jointly issued invitations to a preparatory conference in Cairo; Sukarno later became a co-sponsor, but Nehru, it was reported, declined the honour. Several explanations were proffered for Nehru's attitude: fear that "hot-headed" neutralists might split the Afro-Asian group; the wish not to annoy the powers on whose assistance India's development plans depended and to whom she might also be looking for support against China; India's "increased isolation" among the neutrals as a result of her policy of moderation, especially in the Congo crisis; and the view that the neutralists would not be able to influence big-power attitudes on decisive questions.

The preparatory conference met in Cairo in June, with the participation of the countries which later attended the Belgrade conference, except Congo (L), Cyprus, Lebanon and Tunisia, who had not been invited. Three Latin American countries who had been invited did not attend: Argentina, Mexico and Venezuela. It was reported that three attitudes, which had been emerging among the neutralists for some time, were expressed in groupings at the conference: A "leftist" attitude represented mainly by the three members of the Casablanca group from sub-Saharan Africa—Ghana, Guinea and Mali—as well as by Cuba; a "rightist" group headed by India, and a middle of the road group—nearer, however to the "leftist"—headed by the sponsors, the UAR and Yugoslavia. Controversy arose over such questions as the seating of the rebel governments of the APG and the Stanleyville regime to which India objected; argument also ranged over the invitations—India seeking wide participation, the "leftists" wishing to confine it, and, on similar lines, over the definition of non-alignment. The "middle of the roaders" helped in achieving compromise. The conference adopted a 7-point agenda for the Belgrade conference, concerning the struggle against imperialism, non-intervention in internal affairs of states, racial discrimination, disarmament, peaceful coexistence, the role of the UN, and problems of economic development.

The Cairo conference referred the question of invitations to an ambassadorial committee, meeting at Cairo, where the Indian approach was defeated. Eight countries in addition to the original 22 were invited: Cyprus and Lebanon; Nigeria, Tanganyika, Togo and Upper Volta; Bolivia, Brazil and Mexico. Only the first two accepted; the last three sent observers.

The Belgrade conference lasted from Sept 1-6. On the eve of its opening, the conference was confronted by an unforeseen issue when the Soviet Union announced its decision to resume nuclear tests. Abdel Nasser was the first speaker to refer to the issue, expressing his "shock" at the Soviet step.

The three differing attitudes among the neutralists re-emerged at Belgrade, though there was apparently no rigid alignment on these lines. A major change from Cairo was that Tito now joined the "African group" or "leftists," and consequently Abdel Nasser was seen to have emerged as the foremost "middle of the roaders" and mediator; his relative moderation was duly noted in the West and especially in the US. Iraq, which was in conflict with the West over Kuwait and questions of oil, joined the "leftists" and took an extreme anti-Western stance.

The divergent attitudes emerged on all major questions. Regarding the role of the non-aligned countries in the world conflict, it was generally agreed that these countries should not constitute a third world bloc, but should actively participate in world affairs, especially in the preservation of peace. Differences arose, however, as to whether the world crisis or the traditional themes of colonialism, racism, etc. should have priority; Nehru adopted the first line and Sukarno the second. Also, Nehru, in contrast to some of the leftists, thought that the capacity of the neutralists to intervene in the world conflict was strictly limited.

On the German question Nehru joined the "leftists"—Cuba, Ghana, Indonesia and Iraq—in declaring that the existence of the two German states must be recognized; Nehru, though, was reported to have opposed a formal resolution to this effect. Abdel Nasser, on the other hand, emphasized that the division was artificial.

On the question of the UN almost all participants thought that some structural reforms were needed, as well as changes in the composition of the UN's organs, in view of its many new members. Tito and Nkrumah proposed that the power of the Secretary-General (SG) be limited; Nkrumah also reiterated the proposal he had made at the UN to appoint three deputy SGs, on the lines of the Soviet "troika" proposal. Tunisia and Somalia, on the other hand, favoured a strong SG. Abdel Nasser in his public speech did not commit himself on this point.

The Arab's proposal for the condemnation of Israel was defeated; foremost among its opponents was PM U Nu of Burma.

The conference issued a separate Statement on the Danger of War and Appeal for Peace, in accordance with the attitude of Nehru. On the other hand, the first 14 resolutions of the General Declaration of Heads of State or Government—out of a total of 27—dealt with imperialism and related issues, in accordance with the Indonesian stand. The declaration supported general and controlled disarmament; it was believed that Nehru had secured endorsement for the Western position that disarmament must be founded on control. The declaration called for accelerated economic development, and economic cooperation between the developing countries to resist pressures from the industrial countries. As regards the UN, the declaration urged that the membership of the Security Council and ECOSOC be expanded, and a "more appropriate" structure of the secretariat; the question of the Secretary-General was not mentioned. Those participants who recognized People's China recommended her admission to the UN. On the German problem and Berlin, the conference urged the powers not to resort to force to solve the question.

The conference also addressed identical letters to President Kennedy and PM Khrushchov, urging them to hold direct negotiations to arrest the deterioration in the international situation. Nehru and Nkrumah were chosen to deliver the letter to PM Khrushchov, while Keita and Sukarno carried it to President Kennedy. Both the statesmen sent non-committal replies.

Western comment on the conference said the value of the neutralists' opinion had been "debased": the conference had fallen dismally short of its opportunities, especially in regard to the reaction to Soviet resumption of nuclear tests. At the same time it was noted that the neutrals had been "far less enthusiastic" about Communist than had been the case at Bandung. It was also remarked that the "non-aligned had remained largely unaligned even among themselves."

Soviet comment presented the conference as endorsing Soviet policies. Communist China praised the attitude of the "leftists" and condemned those who advocated priority for questions of peace and war over questions of colonialism, especially Nehru, and, of course, Tito.

In November a short meeting took place in Cairo between Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito and PM Nehru. Since the Belgrade conference Abdel Nasser had experienced the Syrian secession, and Tito thought himself under heavy pressure from both East and West; both were looking for support. Nehru, who was on his way home from a visit to the US, was reported to have been a reluctant partner to the meeting, and to have restricted the scope of talks and resolutions. The joint communiqué, which Western observers termed "tranquillizing," mentioned the need for strengthening means of economic cooperation. Tito was thought to have in mind a neutralist economic conference, to which Nehru was said to object, but which indeed met in 1962.

PRELIMINARIES

YUGOSLAV-UAR INITIATIVE

(February-May)

Abdel Nasser's Plans and Contacts. In Feb it was reported from Cairo and New Delhi that Abdel Nasser was contemplating a summit conference of non-aligned countries to discuss world problems, with special emphasis on the Congo crisis. He was reported to be in contact with various heads of states, including Nehru, Tito, Nkrumah and Sekou Touré. (Hayat, Feb 17)

The UAR approach was explained at a later date by Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram. The struggle between East and West, he wrote, demanded the existence of a "third opinion (ra'y) or a free opinion capable of opening an impartial road for the peaceful development of events." Haykal mentioned, in particular, the struggle along "the line separating the two blocs" in Southeast Asia, Iran, Turkey, Algeria, Angola, Congo and Cuba. The Cuban revolution was having a violent impact throughout Latin America. These countries were now being swept by waves of struggle for social progress and liberation from imperialism. On these borders the world faced the threat of armed clashes which might, by miscalculation, develop into an atomic war. Who would avert this danger?

The UN, "simply a group of nations," was incapable of saving anyone; it needed saving itself. Experience had proved that a regional grouping of Afro-Asian states was also ineffective, as they were divided among themselves and there were African states tied to Britain and France. Moreover, the problems facing the world were not restricted to Asia and Africa, the question now was peace or war. There remained only the non-aligned countries to take up the cause of peace. (Ahram, May 26)

A Western correspondent in Cairo noted, in connection with the conference, Abdel Nasser's growing interest in Latin America. (NYT, May 5)

UAR Claims "Role of Leadership" Among Neutralists. According to K. L. Khanna, The Times of India correspondent in Cairo, the UAR felt that "by combining stability with political vigour it has qualified itself for a role of leadership among the wobbly regimes of three continents": Africa, Asia and Latin America. Cairo divided the neutralists into three trends: the "left neutralists" like Guinea, Ghana and Mali; the "right neutralists" like India, Burma and Ceylon; and the hard-core "middle-roads," with the UAR and Yugoslavia in the van. The acceptance by the UAR of these distinctions had "engendered a new mood of tolerance in Cairo that has taken many Western observers here by surprise." The UAR approach to the neutralist summit was thus a flexible one. (Times of India, May 20)

Nehru Disagrees with Tito, Abdel Nasser and Sukarno. The Observer wrote later that Tito, Abdel Nasser and Sukarno had been trying for two years to persuade Nehru to join in sponsoring a summit conference of non-aligned nations. Tito was said to have conceived the idea in 1959, when the USSR and People's China had launched a campaign to discredit Yugoslavia in Africa, while Abdel Nasser and Sukarno had been hoping for a repetition of the Bandung Conference. Nehru was said to have opposed any conference resembling Bandung, or any attempt to constitute a new bloc between East and West. (Observer, May 7, June 11)

K. L. Khanna said, however, that Abdel Nasser, though basically in sympathy with the approach of Yugoslavia and Indonesia, had "faithfully echoed Mr. Nehru's view that such a conference would do more harm than good."

In Feb 1961, Khanna continued, Abdel Nasser had sounded Nehru once again, but the latter had said that the time was inopportune because of the Congo situation, the changing US policy towards the uncommitted countries and other international developments. If a neutralist summit conference should be attempted at all at a later time, he reportedly indicated, it should be a representative gathering of a world-wide movement and not of a few "hot-headed" Afro-Asians alone. (Times of India, May 20)

Indonesia Proposes Bandung-type Conference. The next step, Khanna wrote, was an Indonesian proposal, made in Cairo in March, envisaging two stages: a conference of Cuba, Ghana, India, Indonesia, the UAR and Yugoslavia, to be followed by a Bandung-type Afro-Asian meeting. (Times of India, May 20; on Sukarno's initiative see also Eg. Gaz., March 21)

At the same time it was reported that President Tito had sent a letter to Abdel Nasser suggesting a conference of neutral states to discuss the international situation and Afro-Asian problems. This was followed by consultations between Yugoslavia, India, Indonesia and the UAR. (R. Cairo, March 24-IMB, March 24)

Tito and Abdel Nasser Sponsor Conference. The decisive step was taken when Tito visited the UAR from April 17 to 22, at the end of an African tour. At this meeting with Abdel Nasser, it was reported, the Bandung idea was shelved and the number of countries to be invited enlarged to 21. India was said to have indicated that she could not oppose the proposal even if she was not enthusiastic about it; Cairo had faced her with the consent in advance of Sudan, Ethiopia and Brazil. (Times of India, May 20)

In a joint communiqué issued on April 21, Abdel Nasser and Tito expressed "deep concern regarding the . . . developments in international relations and the serious stage these relations have reached as a result of recent events" (failure of disarmament talks, the situation in the Congo, Algeria and Laos, and "foreign interference in Cuba"). They believed that "contacts and consultations among the neutral powers" were "imperative for the strengthening of world peace, the safeguarding of the independence of all nations, and the elimination of the danger resulting from interference in the affairs of any state. These consultations must help strengthen economic, cultural and technical cooperation for the good of the people of those nations and the entire family of nations." (R. Cairo, April 22 [25])

Abdel Nasser and Tito jointly invited heads of state to participate in a preparatory conference in Cairo. (R. Cairo, April 30-IMB, April 30; NYT, May 5)

On May 12 it was reported in Cairo that Sukarno had become co-sponsor of the conference.

It was understood that Nehru had also been invited to act as co-sponsor, but had felt that it would not be proper for him to join in the invitations already extended. (Times of India, May 13, 18)

Abdel Nasser-Touré-Sukarno Talks. On May 15 Sekou Touré and Sukarno (who were paying state visits to the UAR) and Abdel Nasser held talks in Cairo which were referred to as a "little summit." An official source said later that the three were "in complete agreement" concerning the forthcoming conference. The communiqué issued at the end of Touré's visit (May 17) expressed the belief that an effort should be made to expand the front of non-aligned nations "so that it may embrace the largest possible number of countries in the world." (Eg. Gaz., May 18; Arab Obs., May 21)

Controversy Starts Over Participants. Since the Abdel Nasser-Tito meeting, it was reported in mid-May, "confusion galore" had developed on the question of the participants and the agenda. [Controversy was to continue in the preparatory conference and afterwards.] Tito wanted Abdel Nasser to patch up inter-Arab differences and invite President Bourguiba of Tunisia. Supported by Indonesia, he also favoured better representation for Europe, with the participation of countries like Ireland, Finland and Sweden.

Indonesia thought Uruguay and Bolivia should be included. Many Afro-Asians looked askance at the "snub administered to Lebanon" by leaving her out. Some wanted Nigeria and Malaya to come in. Cairo was throwing out feelers with a view to inviting the Algerian Provisional Government and the Gizenga regime in Stanleyville, Congo.

There was little evidence anywhere that "a constructive mind" was being applied to the purpose of the forthcoming conference, this report concluded. (Times of India, May 20)

India Still Reluctant; Awaiting Outcome of Preparatory Meeting. On May 18 Nehru told the press that India would attend the Cairo preparatory meeting and might attend the main conference, but had no intention to accept an invitation just yet. (Times of India, May 19)

India's position was that adequate steps must be taken to ensure success; the conference should be as representative as possible; it should not function as a bloc or take up a rigid attitude. (Indian Express, June 1)

In Cairo, it was reported, the "uncharitable" implied that this caution sprang from a desire to avoid annoying the great powers, on whose aid India's third five-year plan depended.

Others explained it, however, as due to the fear that a "capricious grouping of neutralist states" might lead to a split in the Afro-Asian bloc, and to scepticism as to whether decisions of a neutralist summit conference could influence big-power attitudes on questions like Laos and disarmament. (Times of India, May 20)

Nehru's qualified consent was thought to be due to India's increased isolation, as a result of her policy of moderation and mediation in the UN, especially her attitude in the Congo crisis. Besides, she was looking for support against China. (Observer, May 7, June 11)

It was thus reportedly "known" in Cairo that the UAR, Yugoslavia and Indonesia felt that they could have the conference they wanted and that New Delhi could not help but "welcome" it. (Times of India, May 20)

THE PREPARATORY CONFERENCE IN CAIRO

(June 5-13)

The countries represented at the preparatory conference by ambassadors or special envoys were: Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, Cuba, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mali, Morocco, Nepal, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Yemen, the UAR, Yugoslavia and the Algerian Provisional Government. Brazil was represented by observers. The UAR Foreign Minister, Fawzi, presided over the sessions, which were closed to the press; Subandrio and Popovic, FM's of Indonesia and Yugoslavia respectively, were vice-presidents. (Doc. Belg.; this source, however, did not mention Yemen, who was given as a participant by all other sources; see e.g. Arab Obs., June 18.)

Countries Not Invited or Declining to Attend. Venezuela and Argentina, who were invited, did not participate.

Mexico, who was approached a week before the meeting, when the UAR and Yugoslavian ambassadors called on President Mateos Lopez, was not represented either. (Eg. Gaz., July 1)

[Cyprus was apparently not invited.]

According to Ruz al-Yusuf, Malaya, Pakistan, and Nigeria could not be invited as they were members of military or semi-military pacts. On the other hand, the paper said, the fact that India, Ceylon, and Ghana were members of the British Commonwealth did not interfere with their policies of non-alignment, as it was not a political organization. (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 15, 22)

Uninvited Arab Countries: Lebanon, Libya, Tunisia, Jordan. Ruz al-Yusuf explained that Abdel Nasser and Tito had rejected these countries for the following reasons:

Although Lebanon had declared herself a non-aligned state, she had in practice followed Western policies. For example, she had voted at the UN against the admission of Communist China. [See MER 1960, p 78.]

Libya's non-alignment had become questionable after she had left the Casablanca Conference. (See p 54a.)

Tunisia and Jordan had made it quite clear that they were following the policies of the West.

Although countries like Morocco and Saudi Arabia did maintain foreign bases on their territory, the paper argued that they could still be considered non-aligned, as the bases had been established before they had attained independence, and against the wishes of their governments and peoples. (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 15, 22)

Question of Lebanese Participation and Lebanese Neutralism. On May 14 Philippe Tagla, the Lebanese FM, told the parliamentary foreign affairs committee that Lebanon had been sounded on participation but had not yet decided. (Hayat, May 17)

On June 6 when the preparatory meeting in Cairo was already in session, Tagla told the committee that he did not know on what basis some countries were regarded as qualified to attend the Cairo meeting; the term neutralism could be widely interpreted, as each country followed its own policy of neutralism. Pressed to define Lebanon's neutralism, Tagla explained it as follows: Lebanon did not prefer one country to another; she dealt with them equally in accordance with "mutual friendship and esteem" and "the changing international situation." However, Lebanon would not allow foreign bases to be established on her territory by any power, or enter into alliances with any foreign power or bloc, which would affect her freedom to determine her own policies. Lebanon regarded herself as bound only by the Arab League Charter, the Arab Joint Defence Pact and the UN Charter (Hayat, June 7). [Later, certain Arab countries proposed the invitation of Lebanon; see below.]

Issues Discussed in Cairo; Major Divisions Among Participants. (The major issues at the preparatory meeting were: the invitation to the present meeting of the Algerian Provisional Government (APG) and the Stanleyville (Congo) government of Antoine Gizenga; the countries to be invited to the main conference—a problem which involved the definition of non-alignment—; and the agenda. There were serious differences on all these issues. The question of venue also had to be determined.)

The major groups were those already defined by an Indian observer in May (see above): the "African" or "left neutralists" group, headed by Ghana, Guinea and Mali; the "Indian" or "right neutralists" group; and the "compromise" or "middle of the road" group, headed by the sponsors, the UAR and Yugoslavia (Times of India, June 12). (In fact, however, the basic approach of the "middle of the road group" was nearer to that of the African group, while Cuba might also be classified with the "leftists.")

[This division was also reflected in the fact that draft resolutions were usually presented by the "left" and "right" groups, while the UAR and Yugoslavia appeared only in the final drafting committees.] Thus draft definitions of non-alignment were presented by Guinea, India, Indonesia and Cuba, while Yugoslavia was added to these countries to frame the final draft. Similarly, on the agenda, drafts were presented by Guinea, Ghana, Cuba, Indonesia, Ceylon and India, while the drafting committee consisted of India, Guinea and the UAR. (MENA, June 11 [14])

The debates, which lasted three days longer than scheduled, were variously described as "extremely lively" (by a Yugoslav source) and as "protracted and heated" (by an Indian source). Another Indian observer said that the conference had "deteriorated into a farce." (Times of India, June 12; Tanyug, June 10 [14]; Hindu, Madras, June 18)

India Opposes Seating of Stanleyville and APG. The seating of these two governments [which had already been sponsored by the UAR in May—see above] was one of the first questions debated. The invitation of the APG was proposed by the Arab countries and Ghana. In the vote taken by the Committee of 11 (see below) on June 7, all members were in favour except India, who abstained on the ground that she did not recognize the Algerian regime. The Algerian delegation was subsequently seated. (Times of India, June 8)

The invitation of the Stanleyville regime was proposed on June 7 by Ghana, Ceylon and Iraq. India again objected, with the support of Burma, Ethiopia, Nepal, Sudan and Saudi Arabia. The UAR tried to mediate, and it was decided to debate the question at the conference itself. (Times, June 9; Observer, June 11)

Controversy Over Invitations to Belgrade Conference; Decision Deferred. Controversy arose over the countries to be invited to the Belgrade Conference. As the plenary meeting could not agree on the issue, it was referred to a sub-committee of 11 members (Afghanistan, Cambodia, Cuba, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mali, Morocco, the UAR and Yugoslavia). On June 8 the committee was enlarged to include Ceylon and Ghana. (Eg. Gaz., June 8, 9; Mid. Mir., June 10)

From fragmentary reports of the discussions the following details emerge.

The African group, led by Guinea and Ghana, wanted to confine participation to countries attending the preparatory meeting, with the addition of the APG and the Stanleyville regime. India, while opposing these two additions, insisted on broad participation. The UAR, Yugoslavia and Indonesia, although sympathizing with the African view, suggested, as a compromise, the inclusion of a few more countries on an ad hoc basis. The UAR reportedly suggested the APG, Congo (L), Lebanon and several Latin-American states. An earlier report said that Lebanon had previously been proposed by Iraq and Saudi Arabia. Cuba and Iraq also proposed the inclusion of Libya and Malaya.

India rejected the UAR proposals, while the UAR indicated that she would resist India's attempt to further enlarge participation. A MENA despatch on June 14 said that it was not so much the number of powers attending the conference that counted as the principle of non-alignment; a deviation from this principle would diminish the value of the conference.

THE BELGRADE CONFERENCE

At India's insistence it was decided that after the closing of the preparatory meeting (on June 13) an ambassadorial committee would be set up in Cairo to decide on further invitations. (Times of India, June 8, 11, 12, 15; Indian Express, June 8; Eg. Gaz., June 15)

Controversy Over Definition of Non-Alignment. The question of participation necessitated a definition of non-alignment. [Here again the above divisions reappeared.]

Guinea suggested three major criteria: the country concerned should have officially proclaimed non-alignment; it should apply this policy in its internal and international affairs; it should not be a member of any military alliance or allow foreign military bases on its territory.

Indonesia, supported by most delegates, specified non-participation in bilateral or multilateral military alliances and the banning of foreign military bases on national territory.

India favoured a more flexible definition, which would have permitted nations having foreign bases on their soil against their will to attend. She insisted, however, that only UN members should qualify. This broad definition of non-alignment was supported by Cambodia and Afghanistan, the strongest opponents being Ghana, Guinea and Mali. The UAR and Indonesia played the role of conciliators. (Observer, June 11; Times of India, June 12)

Non-Alignment Defined. The final criteria of non-alignment, adopted after lengthy discussions, specified that:

1. The country should have adopted an independent policy based on the coexistence of states with different political and social systems and on non-alignment, or should be showing a trend towards such a policy.

2. The country concerned should be a consistent supporter of national independence movements.

3. It should not be a member of any military alliance in the context of great-power conflicts.

4. If a country has a bilateral military agreement with a great power or is a member of a regional defence pact, the agreement with the great power should not have been deliberately concluded in the context of great-power conflicts.

5. If the country has conceded military bases to a foreign power, the concession should not have been made in the context of great-power conflicts. (Times of India, June 15)

The Times of India regarded the definition as a partial victory for India, because these criteria, if liberally applied, would make many other countries eligible. India had, however, made a concession by agreeing to the participation of non-members of the UN. (Times of India, June 12)

Debate on Agenda. The central problem in deciding on the agenda was whether to admit only subjects of broad international significance or also to include specific issues. India insisted that the conference should aim at broad understanding on larger world issues, like disarmament, banning of nuclear tests, racialism, colonialism and the structure of the UN, rather than purely regional problems, like Mauritania and Palestine.

Even on the world issues, however, India believed that the conference should not take up rigid positions. While promoting cooperation, it should not try to commit the participants to particular lines of action against their will. The Indian view was opposed by the "extremists," who wished to adopt definite policies on particular issues. (Times of India, June 9, 12)

The provisional agenda which was finally adopted was couched in general terms (see below).

Egyptian sources, however, said it was understood that under the heading of "terminating colonialism" the conference would discuss the Congo, Angola, Palestine and West Iran. (Eg. Gaz., June 14)

An Indian observer commented that this apparently meant that UAR intended to trade support on local issues in the ambassadorial committee. (Times of India, June 15)

Agenda for Belgrade Conference Adopted. The following provisional agenda was adopted:

Exchange of views on the international situation; consolidation and strengthening of international peace and security:

1. Respect for the right of the peoples and nations to self-determination; the struggle against imperialism; liquidation of colonialism and neo-colonialism;

2. Respect for the territorial sovereignty and integrity of states; non-interference and non-intervention in the internal affairs of states;

3. Racial discrimination and apartheid;

4. General and complete disarmament; prohibition of nuclear tests, problem of foreign military bases;

5. Peaceful coexistence between states with different political and social systems;

6. Role and composition of the United Nations and the implementation of its resolutions;

7. Problems of unequal economic development; improvement of international economic and technical cooperation. (Doc. Belg.)

Belgrade Chosen as Venue. On June 9 it was agreed to hold the conference in Yugoslavia. [The Yugoslav town of Bled, which had originally been fixed as the venue, was later replaced by Belgrade.] Other proposals had been: Havana, proposed by Cuba alone; and Cairo, proposed by Guinea and supported by Yemen, Mali and Morocco. (Tanyug, June 10 [14])

CAIRO COMMITTEE ON INVITATIONS

(June-August)

Cairo Ambassadorial Committee to Determine Invitations. The committee to determine the countries to be invited to the conference consisted of the diplomatic representatives of the participants in the preparatory meeting. It was set up in Cairo under UAR chairmanship. It held its first meeting on June 21. (Observer, June 13; Eg. Gaz., June 22)

India's Insistence on Wide Participation Overruled. India suggested that 19 additional states be invited: Ireland, Finland, Sweden, Paraguay, Argentina, Chile, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Bolivia, Mexico, Brazil, Lebanon, Jordan, Tunisia, Malaya, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Upper Volta and Togo.

The Cuban delegate who, it was reported, had set himself up as an arbitrator on invitations to Latin-American countries, alleged that India deliberately wanted to vitiate the non-aligned and anti-imperialist character of the conference. He was supported by Guinea and Mali who, according to The Times of India, received the silent support of the UAR and Yugoslavia. The Indian proposals were supported by six or seven delegates. The committee's deliberations, described as 30 hours of "acrimonious discussions," were concluded only in mid-July, with the addition of eight countries to the original 22. They were: Lebanon, Nigeria, Upper Volta, Togo, Ecuador, Tanganyika, Cyprus and Bolivia. Invitations were also renewed to Mexico and Brazil.

An Indian observer thought that, though the Indian approach had been defeated, at least approximate equality had been achieved between those favouring the "liberal Indian" approach and the other, more extreme nationalists. (Times of India, June 22, 26; Observer, July 9; Statesman, Calcutta, Aug 19)

Formal invitations were issued by Yugoslavia, following soundings by her and by the UAR. (Times of India, July 27). [Of the additional countries, only Lebanon and Cyprus accepted. Bolivia, Brazil and Ecuador sent observers.]

Tunisia Invited After Bizerta Crisis. Tunisia [who initially had not been approached] was invited through the mediation of Sudan. On Aug 8 it was reported that, after ascertaining that Tunisia wished to attend, President Abud had formally suggested to President Tito that Tunisia be invited. (R. Umdurman, Aug 8; R. Tunis, Aug 9 [10])

On Aug 11 President Bourguiba delivered a policy declaration emphasizing that Tunisia's foreign policy was based on the principle of non-alignment with any bloc. He added that after the "battle of Bizerta" the causes of estrangement between the UAR and Tunisia had altogether disappeared and that complete understanding prevailed between them. [See also p 172a.] (R. Tunis, Aug 11 [14])

On Aug 17 Bourguiba stated that Tunisia had accepted an invitation to Belgrade. (MENA, Aug 17 [19])

Cyprus Accepts Invitation Over Opposition of Turkish Cabinet Members. On Aug 22 the Cypriot cabinet decided by a majority, consisting of the Greek members, to participate in the conference. The Turkish members opposed the decision, it was reported, insisting that the constitution linked Cyprus to the Western camp through her attachments to the UK, Greece and Turkey. (Cyprus Mail, Aug 23; Reuters, Jer. Post, Aug 23)

Vice-President Fazil Küçük later said that, though he had not used his veto against participation, the Turkish community continued to object to it. (Cyprus Mail, Aug 25)

On his way to Belgrade, Makarios said in Athens (Aug 30) that he could not guess why the Turkish-Cypriots were against participation. He denied rumours that the UK, Turkey and Greece had attempted to dissuade him from going to Belgrade. (Times, Aug 31)

European Neutrals Not Participating. Private soundings in Sweden, Ireland, Austria, Finland and Switzerland showed that all except the latter were interested, but preferred not to be invited until they saw how the first conference shaped. (Observer, Sept 3)

When asked why Switzerland or Sweden were not invited at least as observers, Abdel Nasser replied that these countries "have made us feel that they would not participate even if they were invited. Thus it would be better not to embarrass them by inviting them as long as they don't wish to attend." (MENA, Aug 13 [15])

India Delays Decision. [The Indian decision to attend came only at the end of July.]

On July 27 it was reported that PM Nehru had sent a message to Abdel Nasser and Tito, re-emphasizing the Indian view on the need to avoid the impression that a restricted neutralist bloc was being created. The conference should discuss world problems in the context of the East-West conflict and not get lost in petty disputes of local significance, he said.

The message was understood to convey New Delhi's annoyance at the failure of the Cairo preparatory meeting to give due weight to the Indian view. It was assumed that India's final decision would depend on the replies received. (Statesman, Calcutta, July 29; Times of India, July 30)

Casablanca Group Meeting in Cairo; Indian Protest. A meeting of the Casablanca group (the APG, Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Morocco and the UAR) took place in Cairo on the eve of the Belgrade Conference (Aug 27-28). [See p 56b; the meeting was described as routine but was widely understood to be designed to rally the group in preparation for Belgrade.] While a MENA despatch on Aug 24 on the draft agenda for the meeting made no mention of Belgrade (MENA, Aug 24 [26]), President Keita of Mali declared on Aug 25 that the Cairo discussions would "serve to formulate certain special ideas to be taken to Belgrade." (R. Bamako, Aug 25 [28])

India reportedly sent a note to the UAR, Yugoslavia and Indonesia stating that it was not desirable that the heads of the Casablanca group should meet immediately before the Belgrade Conference. Spokesmen of the Casablanca group explained, however, that the Cairo Conference had been envisaged long before the Belgrade Conference and that it would be confined to African matters. (Times of India, Aug 20)

The Observer wrote that India was afraid that the Casablanca group might try to swing the conference to their side. The paper thought that the position of this group on the Berlin question could be of decisive importance, because it operated as a caucus in international affairs. (Observer, Aug 6, 27)

India Plans Pre-Belgrade Talks in Delhi. India invited Asian heads of state to stop over in New Delhi for consultation on their way to Belgrade (Times of India, Aug 20). The Times wrote that India expected to do a little lobbying before the conference. However, only King Mahendra of Nepal and U Nu of Burma arrived in Delhi, on Aug 28. It was disclosed that Mrs Bandaranaike of Ceylon had declined the invitation and so did Sukarno who, according to The Times, resented Nehru's opposition to his idea of regarding Belgrade as another Bandung Conference. (Times, Aug 29)

THE CONFERENCE

PARTICIPANTS AND PROCEEDINGS

(September 1-6)

Participation. 25 participants and three observers attended the conference, which opened on Sept 1.

Following are the heads of delegations: Afghanistan, Sardar Muhammad Daud Khan, PM; Algerian Provisional Government, Ben Youssef Ben Khedda, PM; Burma, U NU, PM; Cambodia, Prince Norodom Sihanouk, Head of State; Ceylon, Mrs Sirimavo R. Bandaranaike, PM; Congo (Léopoldville), Cyrille Adoula, PM (arrived, together with Antoine Gizenga, his deputy, only on Sept 4); Cuba, Oswaldo Dorticos Torrado, President; Cyprus, Archbishop Makarios, President; Ethiopia, Emperor Haile Selassie; Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah, President; Guinea, Beavogui Luis Lansana, FM; India, Jawaharlal Nehru, PM; Indonesia, Ahmed Sukarno, President; Iraq, Hashim Jawid, FM; Lebanon, Sâ'ih Slâm, PM; Mali, Modibo Keita, PM; Morocco, King Hassan II; Nepal, King Mahendra Bir Bikram Shah Deva; Saudi Arabia, Shaykh Ibrahim as-Suwayl, FM; Somalia, Adan Abdullah Osman, President; Sudan, Ibrahim Abbud, President; Tunisia, Habib Bourguiba, President; UAR, Gamal Abdel Nasser, President; Yemen, Prince Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan; Yugoslavia, Josip Broz Tito, President.

Observers: Bolivia, Jose Fellman Velarde, Minister of Education; Brazil, De Melo Franco Filho, Ambassador to Switzerland; Ecuador, Jose Joaquin Silva, Ambassador in Bonn. (Dac. Belg.)

Heads of State Absent From Conference. PM Qasim did not attend (although specially urged by Tito and Sukarno), reportedly because of preoccupation with the oil negotiations, which were resumed on Aug 24 (Times, Aug 17). King Saud was prevented from attending for health reasons (R. Mecca, Aug 25 [28]). President Sekou Touré of Guinea, one of the firm supporters of the conference, was held up at the last moment by an internal political crisis. (R. Cairo, Aug 29-IMB, Aug 30; Economist, Sept 9)

Proceedings. The conference was opened on the morning of Sept 1, in the Federal Peoples' Assembly Building in Belgrade. President Tito delivered the opening address. The report of the Committee for Organizational Matters was unanimously accepted. All heads of delegations took part in the general debate (Congo was allowed two speeches, by PM Adoula and his deputy, Gizenga), which covered 14 open plenary sessions. In two closed sessions the heads of the delegations, each accompanied by one adviser, adopted the documents of the conference, which had been prepared by a drafting committee. The documents were approved at the closing session on Sept 6.

Messages to the Conference. Hundreds of messages and telegrams were received from political parties, movements, organizations and individuals. The only Western head of state who sent a message was President Kennedy. From the Eastern bloc, messages arrived from PM Khrushchov of the USSR, PM Chou En-lai of the Chinese Peoples' Republic, and the governments of Bulgaria and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (Dac. Belg.). (For a full list see Dac. Belg., pp 266 ff.)

All the messages supported the conference's aim of contributing to the preservation of peace. While Khrushchov exhorted the delegates to "curb the forces of aggression and revenge," Kennedy emphasized that, like the US, the delegates were committed to the UN Charter, as well as to a "world society in which men have the right and freedom to determine their own destiny" and where "one people is not enslaved by the other."

Chou En-lai hoped that the conference would help to defend world peace and oppose imperialist aggression and intervention and colonialism, old and new. (For Khrushchov message see R. Moscow, Sept 1 [SU, 4]; Kennedy—USIS, Aug 31; Chou En-lai—NCNA, Aug 31 [FE, Sept 2].)

Earlier the German Federal Government had sent a memorandum to all countries to be represented in Belgrade (except Yugoslavia, with whom she had no diplomatic relations). The note, to which a personal letter from Chancellor Adenauer was attached, urged the neutrals to issue an appeal, directed particularly at the USSR, to abstain from any unilateral act which would render negotiations over Berlin and Germany more difficult. (Times, Aug 31)

REACTION TO SOVIET RESUMPTION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

On Aug 31, the eve of the conference, the Soviet government announced its decision to resume nuclear tests. This followed a moratorium during which the US, the UK and the USSR, but not France, had discontinued their tests. The text of the Soviet announcement was communicated to the delegates on the same date. A US report on a first Soviet nuclear explosion after this announcement was published on Sept 1 (NYT, Aug 31, Sept 1, 4), [and there were two further explosions reported before the conference ended].

Yugoslav officials were reported to have described the resumption as "a brutal act," and most of the delegates were shocked. Some thought the timing indicated a deliberate Soviet attempt to undermine the conference and show disregard for neutralist opinion.

Tito and Nehru were expected to set the tone in reacting to the Soviet move. Nehru declared upon arrival: "I am against nuclear tests at any time in any place" (NYHT, NYT, Times, Sept 1), but Tito made no mention of the Soviet step in his opening statement on Sept 1. (Dac. Belg., pp 17 ff)

Abdel Nasser "Shocked." President Abdel Nasser was the only speaker on the first day of the conference who directly referred to the Soviet move. (He was preceded by Tito and Sukarno, and followed by Abbud, U Nu, Bourguiba and Daud Khan. For Bourguiba's attitude, see below.) After noting that, because of the "lack of faith in peaceful coexistence," armaments were growing, Abdel Nasser expressed "deep regret" at "the fact that in this atmosphere filled with anxiety the government of the Soviet Union found itself in a position which, according to its own point of view, leads it to the resumption of nuclear tests. This decision shocked me just as it shocked world public opinion," he declared. "Yet whatever the motives of the Soviet government that prompted this decision, the main thing in it is its clear bearing on the deterioration of the dangerous international position." He added that it was "painful" to see France persisting in "provoking world public opinion by holding nuclear tests" in the homeland of peoples who refused to allow them. He accused colonial powers and reactionary elements of being at the head of the forces who exploited the situation, "where peace depends on the frightening nuclear equilibrium." In this connection he mentioned the use of NATO weapons in Algeria and Angola. (Doc. Belg., p 47)

Cairo: Abdel Nasser Acted on Hint from Khrushchov; USSR Showed Consideration for Conference. Haykal, the editor of Al-Ahram, wrote that the Soviet note to the delegates was accompanied by a personal letter from Khrushchov saying: "I know that this decision will be a shock to you." Haykal thought that the USSR's action was a hint to the delegates to act quickly for the sake of peace, or it would be too late. He thought Abdel Nasser had noticed this hint and mentioned it in his speech. (Ahram, Sept 8)

While Abdel Nasser did not go into the motives for the Soviet tests, Cairo Radio declared that the West was to blame. The commentator said that the USSR had warned the US and the UK against their underground tests and against their encouragement of France to continue her tests. He explained the timing of the Soviet move as follows: The USSR knew that a demand for the banning of nuclear tests would probably be adopted in Belgrade. Rather than resume tests after the conference, which would have been interpreted as a snub, the USSR announced its decision beforehand, risking adverse comments. (R. Cairo, Sept 3-IMB, Sept 4)

Nehru Regrets, Tito Not Critical. PM Nehru said in his address on Sept 2 that the danger of war "has become nearer to us, perhaps, by the recent decision of the Soviet government to start nuclear tests." No one was in a position "to know all the facts which underline this decision," he continued, but it "makes the situation much more dangerous" and therefore "I regret it deeply." (Doc. Belg., pp 113-4)

President Tito stated in his speech on Sept 3 that negotiations on an atomic test ban had reached an impasse, while France continued tests without interference by the Western atomic powers. "The matters have now reached such a point," Tito continued, "where the Soviet government has published a statement on the resumption of nuclear weapons tests. All this has alarmed the whole world." (Doc. Belg., p 156)

Abdel Nasser's "Firm Condemnation" Noted in West. A Times correspondent, reporting on the first day of the conference, wrote that Abdel Nasser was the only delegate to voice "a firm and unequivocal condemnation of the Soviet move" (Times, Sept 2). The New York Times wrote that only Abdel Nasser spoke with "anything remotely like the required honesty and openness" in condemning the Soviet act (NYT, Sept 2). On the other hand, Newsweek wrote that he "had put just as much blame on the US and France" as on the USSR (Newsweek, Sept 11). Moscow Radio mentioned only Abdel Nasser's statement that the Soviet decision had been a shock to him. (R. Moscow, Sept 1 [SU 7])

Reactions of Other ME Countries. President Bourguiba of Tunisia said that the "unexpected decision recently announced by a Great Power" was liable to heighten international tension and increase the anxiety of the peoples." (Doc. Belg., p 77)

PM Sliam said he was "truly astonished, as was the whole world," by the Soviet announcement especially as it came on the eve of a meeting planned to "urge all the powers to listen to dictates of reason." (Doc. Belg., p 132)

King Hasan of Morocco said that the Soviet announcement "has caused us serious concern," coming at a time when the whole world was awaiting an agreement to ban the tests. (Doc. Belg., p 202)

President Makarios expressed shock at the Soviet decision, as well as concern over the continuation of French tests in Africa. (Doc. Belg., p 173)

Representatives of the following ME countries made no mention, either direct or indirect, of the Soviet announcement, but spoke about the banning of nuclear tests in general: Sudan, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Somalia, the Algerian Provisional Government, and Yemen (Doc. Belg., pp 60-1, 135, 150, 228, 235, 241). Emperor Haile Selassie did not refer to nuclear tests at all. (Doc. Belg.)

SPECIFIC ISSUES RAISED BY ME COUNTRIES

(ME countries' positions on questions referred to in the agenda are dealt with separately below.)

[All the ME Arab countries raised the question of the Palestine refugees and condemned Israel as an imperialist bridgehead in the ME and Africa (see p 191 b). They also supported the Algerian Provisional Government and condemned French "aggression" in Bizerta. The question of southern Arabia was raised by Iraq, Sudan, Yemen and Saudi Arabia.]

Lebanon's Neutrality. PM Sliam stated: "The neutrality of Lebanon in international politics and its non-alignment to world blocs are linked to its people's unity and to its independence." (Doc. Belg., p 129)

Jawād: British Imperialism in Kuwait. Hashim Jawād, of Iraq, said that Kuwait was the most recent example of British imperialism, which had turned the country into "a military base threatening the security and disturbing the stability of the ME region." (On the Kuwait crisis, see pp 117 ff.) (Doc. Belg., p 151) (The only other delegate to mention Kuwait and demand the withdrawal of British forces was President Dorticos of Cuba.)

Saudi Arabia: Oman Will Not Give Up the Fight. Ibrahim as-Suwayl declared that the "free people" of "fighting Oman" would accept no foreign domination. They were "fighting for their liberty," and would not give up the fight. (Doc. Belg., p 135)

Yemen: British Imperialism in "Southern Yemen." Prince Hasan of Yemen said: "British imperialism, with its notorious deceit, infiltrated during the Ottoman domination into certain Yemeni southern areas" and created the [Aden] Protectorates (Doc. Belg., p 240). (No other delegate mentioned "southern Yemen.")

Tunisian Policy of Non-Alignment, Moderation and Reason. President Bourguiba stated that non-alignment had been a "fundamental element of our policy for many years now." Tunisia had maintained her freedom of choice, he said, in accordance with her national interest and the "fundamental and universal values of our time." "We in Tunisia do not go back on our friends," he said, "but we place attachment and loyalty to principles above preferences and affinities. At all times and in all places, we try to keep our reactions at a moderate level and ensure that reason prevails over sentiment." (Doc. Belg., pp 72-3)

Somalia: Self-Determination for French Somaliland. Demanding the consideration of the "legitimate national aspirations of the Somali people," the Somali representative said that French Somaliland was one of the Somali territories still under foreign rule, suffering from French "colonialism" and "tyranny." The Somalis were ethnically a homogeneous race, he declared, and should be geographically united. (Doc. Belg., pp 230-1)

THE ROLE OF THE NON-ALIGNED NATIONS (The World Conflict and Colonialism)

[It was generally agreed in public speeches that the non-aligned states did not and should not constitute a third bloc; views diverged, however, on the degree of coordination that was desirable. Again, all were agreed that non-alignment meant active participation, mainly through "moral-power," in world affairs, especially in the preservation of peace; views differed, however, as to the capacity of the non-aligned countries to intervene in the world conflict by adopting judgements on rights and wrongs and submitting concrete proposals for solutions, as well as on the desirability of such intervention. There were also differences on whether the world crisis should be given priority at the conference over the traditional themes of colonialism, racialism, etc.]

Tito: No Third Military Bloc, but Clearcut Neutral Positions on Current Problems Needed. "The purpose of this meeting," President Tito said, "is to make the great powers realize that the fate of the world cannot rest in their hands alone." The role of the non-aligned nations was to contribute towards the solution of international problems and towards the "easing of dangerous international tension in general." To this end they should adopt "clear and unequivocal positions on current problems." They did not intend to create a third bloc, he said, for blocs were mainly characterized by their military aspects and economic discrimination against others. Where the "stands" of the neutrals differed from or coincided with those of "one or the other side" would become clear once they had defined their positions. They would take their decisions with the aim of furthering peace and not of supporting one bloc or another. The conference, he continued, would not attack certain countries "for propaganda motives," but would voice its "resolute disagreement with the methods applied by some great powers towards other countries." He also advised the neutrals against getting entangled in "issues of secondary importance" which could be referred to bilateral negotiations. (Doc. Belg., pp 15-22)

Nehru: Non-Aligned States Should Concentrate on World Crisis, Not Colonialism, and Avoid Definite Attitudes. Nehru said that "classic colonialism is gone and is dead," though it still gave "a lot of trouble." The question of imperialism, he said, was overshadowed by the world crisis and the question of peace and war—or, rather, the choice "between negotiations for peace or war." The non-aligned states should, therefore, concentrate on the main problem, and "throw [their] weight, such as it is, in favour of peace." The conference should beware of getting lost in "long resolutions and . . . brave declarations" on "anti-imperialism, anti-racialism and all that." Nehru repeatedly stressed that the non-aligned countries must realize their "lack of strength." "We must not imagine," he warned, "that we can order about great countries or, as small countries, do as we like." Therefore the non-aligned should use their limited capacity, their moral strength—"call it what you like . . . without force but with courtesy . . . so that we may influence those who have the power of war and peace in their hands." To try and adopt definite attitudes and propose concrete solutions, to "denounce and irritate" the powers, would only make it more difficult for them to follow the path of peace. (Doc. Belg., pp 107 ff.)

Sukarno: Colonialism, Not Big-Power Conflict, the Basic Problem; Non-Aligned States Strive for New World Equilibrium. Sukarno thought that non-alignment should become a "coordinated accumulated moral force"—though not a third bloc—powerful enough "to make its impact felt upon the two conflicting blocs." This should be based, he said, on a new common approach to the basic issues, which would "startle mankind by its freshness." He maintained, however, that the real source of international tension was not the ideological conflict between the great powers, but the conflict between "the new emergent forces for freedom" and the "old forces of domination." In every single case," he said, "the cause of international tension is imperialism and colonialism and the forcible division of nations." The newly emergent and non-aligned nations, on the other hand, strove for a "new stable equilibrium," which would be established by making all nations truly independent and in which there would be no place for conflicting blocs. (Doc. Belg., pp 25 ff.)

Nkrumah Proposes Concrete Solutions to World Problems. President Nkrumah said the delegates had come to interpose their influence between the two blocs, so that the fate of mankind "should cease to hang . . . on the desires and ambitions of the great powers." Though not a third bloc, they constituted a "distinct moral force, which should be a balancing force and influence between the East and the West in the cause of peace," and they should coordinate their efforts at the UN to this end. Nkrumah singled out colonialism and disarmament as the most acute world problems. On these and other issues he proposed a set of seven definite solutions. (Doc. Belg., pp 98 ff.)

Abdel Nasser: To Coordinate Efforts for Peace and Fight Colonialism, with More than "Moral Efforts." Abdel Nasser said that the non-aligned states bore "a special responsibility towards peace," as "by dint of their just and unbiased outlook" on world problems they could "shorten the gap separating" the world powers and help "many other peoples still in shackles."

Abdel Nasser stressed that the non-aligned nations did not constitute a third bloc, but said that the conference "may agree on taking common action." In this public speech, he said, he had "tried [his] utmost" to avoid any particular proposal on world problems; but this would come at a later stage of the conference.

Abdel Nasser mentioned six priorities, starting with international tension and disarmament and continuing with imperialism, racialism, etc. He also said he was aware that the conference was unwelcome to "several powers hostile to peace," especially the colonial powers.

The non-aligned nations should back their objectives with constant cooperation and co-ordinated efforts, both within and outside the UN, he continued, remaining in constant touch with the two conflicting camps. He emphasized that in the battle against colonialism and racial discrimination "we can give more than just moral efforts" and "protests." (Doc. Belg., pp 40 ff.)

national relations on power politics and exploitation, said that the conference should examine the underlying causes of the impasse in international relations and "recognize the forces which hinder the promotion of peace and progress." Jawād declared that imperialism was the main obstacle to peace and that the cold war was fraudulently justified "by the pretext of collective security against the so-called Communist conspiracy to dominate the world," whereas, in fact, the West was utilizing it to preserve its colonial grip on the underdeveloped areas.

He proposed that the conference should work out a programme of peace and "press by every positive means possible for its implementation" [without specifying the means.] (Doc. Belg., pp 143 ff)

Haile Selassie and Makarios Call for Objective Judgements. Emperor Haile Selassie said that to be non-aligned meant the capacity to act independently of the world powers and neutrality in the cold war. To be neutral meant to judge actions and policies objectively in their relation to the preservation of peace and the improvement of the lot of man. To urge the powers to negotiate without making such judgement, the Emperor said, was equivalent to adverting responsibility.

Though lacking in military power, the Emperor continued, the neutrals should not underestimate their strength, as the big powers, who competed for their support, were "highly sensitive" to their reactions and judgement. He warned the neutrals, however, not to act and vote as an organized group, because group action could only be achieved by pressure and deals within the group, which in turn would dissipate their moral influence. (Doc. Belg., pp 85-8)

President Makarios thought that all the peoples were looking to the conference for a "dynamic signal of moral progress" leading to lasting peace. They should not seek "a point of compromise between the two sides without relating such compromise to the merits of the case and to basic principles," he said. (Doc. Belg., pp 170-1)

North Africans Stress Mutual Assistance. President Bourguiba, who asserted that non-alignment had been "a fundamental element of our policy for many years now," thought that the "moral striking force" of the neutrals would in the end be decisive. While he, too, was opposed to a third bloc, he stressed the need for solidarity and mutual assistance among the neutrals and said he would propose that they hold periodical conferences. When speaking of particular issues, Bourguiba put "decolonization," with stress on "Tunisia's struggle" [i.e. the Bizerta affair, see p 170 h], before disarmament. (Doc. Belg., pp 72 ff)

King Hasan of Morocco said it was not enough for the neutrals to indicate the origins of international tension; they must "outline partial solutions." Additional countries should be induced to adopt non-alignment, but the neutrals must be prepared to help them in case they were "exposed to the risk of reprisals." (Doc. Belg., pp 197-9)

Ben Khedda, PM of the APG, called on the neutral peoples to "assess the true responsibilities in the race to catastrophe." He emphasized that effective non-alignment was not only based on genuine independence but also involved full support for the struggle of all peoples for independence. (Doc. Belg., pp 234-5)

Sudan, Saudi Arabia and Somalia Urge Moderate Approach to Powers. President Abdu expressed the hope that "an exposition of our understanding and objectives may serve to display our ideals and not to impose them." (Doc. Belg., p 53)

The Saudi Arabian delegate said "our souls must be innocent of any bias" so that "our feelings can examine problems freely, and can seek out flexible solutions," non-provocative but convincing. (Doc. Belg., p 134)

The Somali representative thought it imperative not to display "bitter hostility" against either of the great-power blocs, as "has been the consistent practice of the majority of us here"; on the other hand, the neutrals should express their views "without fear and favour." (Doc. Belg., pp 226-7)

Lebanon, Yemen: Sā'ib Slām thought non-aligned nations should "inculcate, instead of the paths followed by the two blocs..., a new path" which would "build one stable world instead of two." (Doc. Belg., p 130)

The Yemeni representative emphasized that the great powers, who seemed to have the right to decide the fate of others, must understand that the other nations were now aware of their rights and interests. (Doc. Belg., p 239)

GERMANY AND BERLIN

Background Note. The Berlin question was potentially the most explosive in world affairs in the summer of 1961. In June PM Khrushchov of the USSR had said that a peaceful settlement of the Berlin and German questions must be achieved that year. If the other powers who had been at war with Germany did not conclude peace treaties with both German states, the USSR would sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany and the West would have to negotiate with the East German authorities on access to Berlin, which should become a free city. The attitude of the Western powers in general was that a German settlement must be based on the freely expressed will of the German people. They refused to perpetuate the division of Germany, to recognize the German Democratic Republic, and to countenance any change in the status of Berlin, where, they claimed, their forces were stationed by right and to which they had the right of free access. Tension between the blocs mounted during the summer and East Germany erected a fortified wall between East and West Berlin.

Tito, Nehru, Nkrumah, Sukarno and Iraqi FM Declared that the Existence of the Two German States Must Be Recognized, and urged negotiations to settle the Berlin question. Nehru thought that a guarantee of free access to Berlin would remove one major cause of conflict. Tito criticized the West for arming Germany and Nkrumah thought the conference should call upon the big powers to sign peace treaties with both states. The only ME country which supported this attitude was Iraq: Jawād said that the Berlin question could not be solved unless the existence of the two Germanies was recognized and both made part of a neutral area. (Doc. Belg., pp 36, 101, 111, 149, 157)

Abdel Nasser: German Division Artificial. Abdel Nasser on the other hand, spoke about "that artificial line which divides the German people into two peoples hostile to each other." "Our duty," he said, was not "to stand in front of the wall built between East and West Berlin and imagine that we have reached a dead end." But he did not indicate any solution and related the problem to the wider one of the "crisis of peaceful coexistence." (Doc. Belg., p 43, 46)

Ethiopia and Cyprus Call for Self-determination and Free Access to Berlin. Emperor Haile Selassie supported the concept of a "unified Germany" and "the principle of free access to West Berlin." (Doc. Belg., p 96)

President Makarios of Cyprus emphasized that the German people had the right to self-determination, which should be exercised through a plebiscite under UN auspices. The people of Berlin, he said, could not "be kept in a kind of concentration camp" and movement between East and West Berlin should be free. (Doc. Belg., pp 172-3)

Other ME Countries Non-Committal. The representatives of Morocco, Somalia and Yemen called for negotiations to settle the German problem (Doc. Belg., pp 203, 228, 241), while those of Algeria, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Tunisia did not raise the question.

STRUCTURAL REFORMS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Background Note. At the 15th UN Assembly, in Sept and Oct 1960, PM Khrushchov, while attacking SG Dag Hammarskjöld for "serving the imperialists in the Congo crisis," demanded the replacement of the SG by a "troika" of three representatives, one each from the Western, Eastern and neutral groups. The West fully backed the SG and categorically opposed the innovation on the ground that it would paralyse the UN.

No non-Communist country backed the Soviet proposal and the majority, including all ME representatives except Abdel Nasser, explicitly expressed their support for Hammarskjöld (MER 1960, p 11). [The UAR criticized the UN attitude in Congo much in the same vein as the USSR, and Iraq adopted the same attitude at a later stage (MER 1960, pp 7, 25 ff).]

President Nkrumah of Ghana proposed a plan, endorsed by President Touré of Guinea, for three deputy SGs, on the same lines as the troika.

Almost all participants in the Belgrade Conference thought some structural reforms were needed in the UN. While few proposed functional alterations, the majority suggested changes in the composition of the UN's organs, in view of its new membership.

Tito, Nkrumah Propose Limiting Power of SG. Tito called for the enlargement of the Security Council and ECOSOC to represent Asia and Africa more fully. He did not support the troika plan but suggested that the role of the SG should become purely administrative, without "independent political functions"; a consultative body of five or more should be set up to assist him and ensure "a proper interpretation of the recommendations." (Doc. Belg., p 166)

Nkrumah reiterated his UN proposal to appoint three deputy SGs and proposed an executive body elected by the Assembly to ensure the faithful and prompt implementation of UN decisions. (Doc. Belg., p 104)

Nehru: UN Should Reflect New Balance of Power. Nehru pointed out that the framework of the UN reflected the balance of power existing 15 years ago and called for structural changes in view of its new membership. (Doc. Belg., p 112)

Abdel Nasser Criticizes Big-Power Manipulation of UN. Abdel Nasser said it was regrettable to see the UN "sometimes transformed into a field of conflict between the blocs" or used as a "tool in the hand of colonialism," with the result that resolutions sometimes remained unimplemented unless they were in line with the policies of the major powers. He demanded that the UN "adapt itself to the present dynamic nature of the world" and proposed, without going into detail, "constructive changes" in the UN "administrative machinery" and changes in the "distribution of power in its various centres." (Doc. Belg., p 49)

Tunisia and Somalia Favour Strong SG. President Bourguiba said he was in favour of a strong SG "invested with powers of interpretation and enforcement," but proposed that the SG should have several assistants. He thought the non-aligned nations were not fairly represented in the Security Council and ECOSOC but called for "a correct balance between the power of the big nations and the number of the small." (Doc. Belg., p 78)

The Somali representative, who warmly praised the UN's action in the Congo, also rejected any alteration in the structure of the Secretariat, but called for a revision of the veto power. He proposed that foreign aid be channelled through the UN. (Doc. Belg., p 232)

Ethiopia, Lebanon, Morocco and APG Call for More Representation of New Members. (See Doc. Belg., pp 90, 131, 200-1, 235.) King Hasan also suggested a general conference of UN members to review the Charter and consider the organization of an international force to ensure the enforcement of UN decisions, as well as ways to deal more effectively with problems of underdeveloped countries. (Doc. Belg., pp 200-1)

President Abbad of Sudan, who praised the work of the UN, proposed (like the Somali representative) to strictly limit, or abolish, the veto. All power and authority, he thought, should be centred in the Assembly. The authority of the specialized agencies should be expanded and the regional commissions become the focal points of much of the UN's work. (Doc. Belg., p 63)

The representatives of Saudi Arabia and Cyprus made only short statements in support of the UN. The Iraqi representative did not mention the subject at all, except in connection with the Israel question. (Doc. Belg.)

ADMISSION OF PEOPLE'S CHINA TO UN

The majority of the delegates demanded the admission of the People's Republic of China to the UN. Of the ME countries, Ethiopia, Iraq, Morocco, Sudan, Tunisia, and the UAR did so, while other ME countries did not raise the question. (Doc. Belg.)

DOCUMENTS OF THE CONFERENCE

The Conference issued three documents:

1. Statement on the Danger of War and an Appeal for Peace;
2. Declaration of the Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries;
3. A Letter in identical terms to the US President and the Soviet PM.

Divisions Between "Moderates" and "Leftists" Over Documents: Abdel Nasser Described as Mediator. The difference between the "leftist" African and "moderate" groups, which had dominated the Cairo preliminary meeting (see above), came out strongly, according to observers in Belgrade, in "long and acrimonious" debates in the drafting committee and at the closed plenary session, at which the texts of the documents were debated.

Nehru was the main spokesman for the moderate opinion, and Burma, Ceylon, Cyprus, Lebanon, Nepal and Tunisia were variously mentioned as sharing his approach.

On the other hand, Tito, who apparently, together with Abdel Nasser, constituted a third, "middle-of-the-road," group at Cairo, joined the "African group" at Belgrade. Thus, according to an American observer, a "Tito-African-Arab group" was formed. Yugoslav reports that Tito was trying to help Khrushchov "against a potential military take-over bid" in Moscow were treated somewhat sceptically in the Western press. (Times, Sept 4, 5; NYT, Sept 5; Economist, Sept 9)

Of the African leaders in this group, Nkrumah alone was generally mentioned. Having come to the conference direct from his talks with Khrushchov in Russia, Nkrumah was reportedly regarded by many delegates as the Soviet PM's spokesman on world problems.

It was not clear who were the Arabs in this group, but in the open sessions Jawād of Iraq had been the most vehement anti-Western spokesman among the Arabs.

Abdel Nasser was thought to have emerged as the foremost mediator. (NYT, Sept 1, 5, 6, 7; Monde, Sept 2, 3; Times, Sept 4, 5; Newsweek, Sept 11, 18; Time, Sept 15)

However, there did not seem to have been any rigid alignment of these lines, as will be seen below.

Cairo sources said that the identical messages to Kennedy and Khrushchov were proposed by Abdel Nasser at a closed plenary session on Sept 4, following consultations between himself and Nehru, Nkrumah, Sukarno, Tito and U Nu. The draft text was proposed by Nehru. According to these reports, Abdel Nasser also proposed the "messengers" who were to present the letters in Moscow and Washington. (MENA, Sept 4 [6]; Eg. Gaz., Sept 4, 5)

Western observers said that Abdel Nasser was showing "a responsible attitude" at the conference. A reflection of this was seen by some quarters in such instances as the moderation of Antoine Gizenga, the Congolese vice-PM [whose regime in Stanleyville, which he had left only two days previously, was extremely anti-Western]. Abdel Nasser met the Congolese leaders before they spoke. (NYT, Sept 6)

Divisions on Various Issues. A major point of disagreement was reported to be the question of priorities in the declaration. The Indians, in conformity with Nehru's policy of absolute priority for the preservation of peace, pressed for a special document on this question. On the other hand, Indonesia insisted on priority for questions of colonialism. According to a New York Herald Tribune report, this was also Abdel Nasser's attitude, though he also advocated a declaration for world peace. [In the end, a separate appeal for peace was issued, while in the main declaration priority was given to questions of colonialism.] (NYHT, Sept 5, 6)

On the German question, it was reported that Yugoslavia, Cuba and Ghana wished to include a resolution calling for the recognition of East Germany, but this was successfully opposed by Abdel Nasser and Nehru [though the latter had declared in his speech that the existence of the two Germanies was a fact of life which must be recognized—see above]. (Times, Sept 5; NYT, Aug 7, 31, Sept 6)

It was believed to be Nehru who secured endorsement for the Western position that disarmament must be founded on inspection and control. (NYT, Sept 6)

Algeria was another issue on which there was no unanimity. During the conference Afghanistan, Cambodia, Ghana and Yugoslavia announced their recognition of the Algerian Provisional Government. [Cuba, Guinea, Indonesia, the UAR and Yemen had extended recognition earlier.] The majority of the participants, including India, continued, however, to withhold recognition. (Times, NYT, Sept 6)

An additional point of contention was the resolution on Israel and the Arab refugees; Arab proposals for condemnation were defeated. (For details see pp 191-3.)

In general, it was thought, the mainly moderate tone of the conference's documents was due to the fact that Nehru's approach prevailed. (Times, Sept 6; Time, Sept 15)

Statement on the Danger of War. Expressing deep concern that the grave and critical situation might lead to world annihilation, the conference urged the US and the USSR to suspend war preparations and continue negotiations until total disarmament and enduring peace was achieved; it called on their leaders to make "immediate direct approaches to each other."

"While decisions leading to war or peace at present rest with these great powers, the consequences affect the entire world," the statement continued. It expressed the hope that other nations, not represented at the conference, would join the appeal. (Doc. Belg., p 252)

The Declaration of the Heads of State or Government.

The preamble to the 27 resolutions contained in the declaration reiterated the belief of the non-aligned nations in the principles of peaceful coexistence; international cooperation; the elimination of imperialism, colonialism and neo-imperialism; the rejection of the idea of the cold war, and the solution of outstanding conflicts and differences by negotiations.

Resolutions 1-14 concerned imperialism and related issues. The conference reaffirmed its support for the UN Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; it demanded the "immediate, unconditional, total and final abolition of colonialism" and respect for the territorial integrity of independent states. It declared support for the Algerian Provisional Government and the integrity of its territory, including the Sahara; denounced repressive measures against the Angolan people and demanded independence for the territory; demanded the immediate termination of all colonial occupation in Asia, Africa and Latin America; the evacuation of French forces from Tunisia and the prevention of further foreign intervention in the Congo; and condemned imperialist policies in the ME and expressed support for the rights of the Arab refugees (for the last point see p 192 b). The conference condemned racial and ethnic discrimination, mentioning especially the apartheid policy in South Africa, and proclaimed respect for the rights of minorities. The delegates called for the abolition of foreign bases, particularly where their existence was in violation of the sovereign will (only the US base at Guantanamo, Cuba, was specifically mentioned), and reiterated their conviction that all nations have the right to determine their political, social, economic and cultural development without intimidation or hindrance—again with particular reference to Cuba only.

Resolutions 15-20 dealt with disarmament. Support was expressed for "general, complete and strictly and [sic] internationally controlled disarmament," and for the use of outer space exclusively for peaceful purposes. The great powers were urged to sign a treaty for complete disarmament without delay. The non-aligned nations should be represented at all future conferences on world disarmament, which should be held under UN auspices, as well as on teams of inspection and control. The conference called for a ban on nuclear tests and demanded that, meanwhile, the moratorium on tests should be resumed. Immediate negotiations on this question, either separately or as part of the talks on complete disarmament, were urged. The conference recommended that the UN Assembly convene a special session or a world conference devoted to the question.

Resolutions 21-23 dealt with economic questions. The conference called for accelerated development to bridge the gap between the economically advanced countries and the less developed ones; it demanded the adjustment of terms of trade adversely affecting the economies of the latter and urged the establishment of a UN Capital Development Fund.

The developing countries were invited to institute economic cooperation in order to resist economic pressures and the "harmful results which may be created by the economic blocs of the industrial countries," and to convene a conference to discuss common economic problems and "ways and means of repelling all damage which may hinder their development." The conference declared that countries receiving economic and technical assistance must be free to determine its use.

Resolutions 24-25 dealt with the UN. Revision of the Charter was urged to expand the membership of the Security Council and ECOSOC in "harmony with the needs of the Organization and with the expanded membership on the UN." A "more appropriate" structure for the Secretariat, "bearing in mind equitable regional distribution," was advocated.

Resolution 26 said that those countries who "recognize the Government of the People's Republic of China" recommended that the UN Assembly should accept it at its forthcoming session as the only legitimate representative of China.

The last resolution, No. 27, spoke of the "decisive influence" of the German problem on the international situation and urged the powers not to resort to force to solve the question. (Doc. Belg., pp 253 ff)

Letters to Kennedy and Khrushchov. In identical letters to President Kennedy and PM Khrushchov, the members of the conference expressed their distress at the "deterioration of the international situation and the prospects of war which now threaten humanity." In order to "avert the developments that may precipitate it," they urged the two statesmen to hold direct negotiations to find a way out of the "present impasse." (Doc. Belg., pp 264-5)

Nehru and Nkrumah were chosen by the conference to deliver the letter to PM Khrushchov, while Modibo Keita and Sukarno carried it to President Kennedy. (NYHT, Sept 6)

President Kennedy replied (on Sept 13) that, although he agreed in principle to negotiations "at the highest levels," they needed "careful preparation" and a "reasonable chance of success." He also stressed that the US did not intend to enter negotiations "under ultimatum or threats," and did not propose to discuss "either abdication of our responsibility or renunciation of the modalities for carrying out those responsibilities." He also pointed out that there was an opportunity for serious talks about Germany and other problems between the US Secretary of State and the USSR Foreign Minister, who were both scheduled to attend the UN General Assembly session the following week. (USIS, official text, Sept 14, 18)

Khrushchov answered (on Sept 16) that he would be ready to meet with Kennedy if such a meeting promised to be fruitful. The USSR, he said, welcomed talks that would result in the conclusion of a general peace treaty. (NYT; Newsweek, Sept 18)

WESTERN COMMENT ON OUTCOME OF CONFERENCE

Value of Neutrals' Opinions "Debased." The US State Department's reported reaction to the conference was that it "deflates a rather exaggerated regard for the opinion of these so-called uncommitted nations, since their behaviour in Belgrade debases the value of their opinion—good or bad." (NYHT, Sept 8)

The New York Times wrote that the meeting "fell dismally short of its opportunities," especially with regard to the reaction to Soviet resumption of nuclear tests. (NYT, Sept 6)

The New York Herald Tribune, in an editorial entitled "Neutrals Miss the Boat," criticized the neutrals for failing to find ways "to impose their voice more productively on the course of the cold war," and accused them of lacking "courage of commitment at a crucial hour." (NYHT, Sept 8)

Newsweek believed that the attitude of the neutrals in Belgrade had prompted President Kennedy's decision to cut down aid to nations who did not share the US view of the world crisis. (Newsweek, Sept 18)

Time wrote that the neutrals were chiefly committed to "the profitable middle-way to preserving their neutrality at whatever cost of principle, to keep the money flowing in from both camps." (Time, Sept 15)

A Le Monde editorial, which expressed similar opinions, said that the only true winner at the conference was the Algerian Provisional Government, which had scored recognition by a number of countries. On the positive side, the paper added, was the realization by the delegates that non-aligned nations should assume the role of mediation between the two blocs on such issues as disarmament. (Monde, Sept 7)

Decreasing Affinity With Communism Noted. The New York Times commented that the neutrals were far less enthusiastic about Communism at Belgrade than at Bandung (NYT, Sept 6). Similarly, the London Times wrote that both the Americans and the Russians had been wrong "in the days when they both felt that neutralism was the first step to Communism." (Times, Sept 7)

Another observer believed that the concept of non-alignment, which should have been clarified in Belgrade as superseding "positive neutralism," remained vague. Probably, however, it constituted a certain change from the communist point of view, as positive neutralism tended to be more hostile to "Western imperialism." If the resolutions included some denunciations that such conference could not escape, it also contained a new tone of moderation. (Orient, No 19, pp 19-25)

"Non-Aligned, Unaligned Among Themselves": No Follow-through. The London Times wrote that the most obvious result of the conference was that the "countries which met in Belgrade have remained largely unaligned even among themselves... Non-alignment has become more self-conscious and confident. But it is still groping for definitions and identity." The paper declared that if the US had resumed nuclear testing in place of the Soviets, "the outcry would have been loud and bitter." (Times, Sept 7)

The Economist described the outcome of the conference as "flat." "Apart from the personal appeals of peace that are being made in Moscow and Washington, the impact of which cannot yet be assessed, no original initiative emerged from the conference, nor is there any suggestion of a coherent follow-through on a working level," the paper wrote. (Economist, Sept 9)

COMMUNIST ATTITUDES

Soviet Russia. Having given only scant notice to the lengthy preparations that had preceded the Belgrade Conference, the Soviet press and radio accorded extensive coverage to the proceedings of the conference itself, stressing its representative nature as the largest gathering of non-aligned nations since the Bandung Conference and the 1960 UN General Assembly.

Both the main Soviet daily newspapers, Pravda and Izvestia, as well as Moscow Radio presented the conference as endorsing Soviet policy on such major issues as the German peace treaty, Berlin, colonialism and disarmament, and gave prominence to the resentment with which the Western powers were said to have greeted this endorsement.

On the Soviet resumption of nuclear tests, it was said that the issue occupied "the centre of attention"; but while the leaders of the non-aligned nations were understandably perturbed at the prospect of further nuclear explosions, they "understand the reasons which have impelled the Soviet Union to this step." Pravda reported that Nkrumah had referred to the Soviet announcement concerning the resumption of tests as a "shock" which served to underline the gravity of the situation and the need for fresh efforts to safeguard peace. Despite the attempts of "American and West German cold war troubadours" who sought to inflame the opinion of conference participants, the latter had refused to be drawn into a "hysterical campaign" and had instead maintained a realistic attitude towards the problems of world peace.

In broadcasts to Africa, Moscow Radio emphasized the anti-colonialist aspects of the conference, while in broadcasts to Iran and Turkey it gave prominence to the advantages of neutrality. (R. Moscow, Sept 4, 6, 7, 9, 10 [SU 13]; Pravda, Sept 1, 7, 9; Izvestia, Sept 2; Mizan, Sept)

Communist China. Official spokesmen as well as the press and radio of Communist China commented favourably on the anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist attitudes expressed at the conference and consequently singled out for praise speakers like Dorticos, Nkrumah and especially Sukarno. On the other hand, they condemned as "spokesmen for imperialism" those speakers who wished to give prominence to "the so-called question of peace and war," especially Nehru. The "Tito clique" was singled out for sharp criticism. It was further stressed that the "banner of anti-imperialist colonialism" had been raised at the Bandung Conference, and the convening of another such conference was strongly advocated. (NCNA, Sept 7, 8, 9, 10 [FE, 12, 13])

ABDEL NASSER-NEHRU-TITO MEETING IN CAIRO

(November 19)

[Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito, and PM Nehru held a one-day conference in Cairo on Nov 19.]

Tito arrived on the night of Nov 17, and Nehru the next night. (Borba, Nov 19)

Controversy: Who Proposed the Meeting? Was Nehru Taken Unawares? On Nov 2 it had been disclosed that Nehru would meet with Abdel Nasser in Cairo on Nov 18 on his way home from the US (Ahram, Nov 3); it was later reported that his original intention had been to report on his talks in Moscow and Washington (Observer, Nov 19). Later, on Nov 14, Al-Ahram reported that in a few days important political talks would be held in Cairo. The paper further reported on Nehru's impending visit [but made no mention of Tito]. (Ahram, Nov 14)

The first report on the tripartite meeting, scheduled for Nov 19, came only on Nov 16 from Belgrade and Cairo. [Foreign?] sources in Cairo said that the meeting was "entirely President Abdel Nasser's doing." When he had been advised that Nehru planned a twenty-minute stop-over at Cairo airport, he had pressed him to stay at least overnight. [In fact the first report on the planned stopover spoke only of an Abdel Nasser-Nehru meeting on Nov 18—see above.] Abdel Nasser then sent a "quick invitation" to President Tito who was reported to have agreed only on Nov 16 after a second, stronger appeal. (NYT, Nov 17)

In fact, the first Cairo report on Tito's impending visit came only on the radio on the evening of Nov 16, and in the press on Nov 17, the day of his arrival, in the framework of a report on the forthcoming tripartite meeting. [There was no official announcement.] Al-Ahram said that the three leaders had been in contact all through the week to arrange the meeting. (R. Cairo, Nov 16 [18]; Ahram, Nov 17)

The Egyptians, however, said it was Tito, not Abdel Nasser, who had proposed the conference, which the Yugoslavs privately denied. The correspondent who reported this, after the conference, thought there were ample grounds for accepting the UAR version, as it was Tito's projects that mainly occupied the three statesmen. (NYHT, Nov 21)

Tito arrived in Cairo on the afternoon of Nov 17. On the following day Nehru, on his way to Cairo, was reported to have told the press in New York and at London airport that he had heard only the previous day that Tito would be in Cairo. He said he would see Tito as well as Abdel Nasser "if it was possible." (Times, Nov 20)

Some days after the meeting, however, Abdel Nasser personally asserted that Nehru had agreed to the conference in advance and that the idea had originated with Tito. On Nov 25 Al-Ahram published a cable from Abdel Nasser to Tito in reply to a cable of thanks from the latter, thanking Tito for raising the idea of holding the meeting after he had learned that Nehru would pass through Cairo. Abdel Nasser said that Nehru had warmly welcomed the idea.

Al-Ahram summed up the stages leading to the meeting as follows: On Nov 1 Nehru proposed to stop over in Cairo. When Tito heard of this, he proposed the tripartite meeting. Cairo welcomed the idea but advised that Nehru should be consulted. On Nov 13 the Indian Ambassador in Cairo conveyed Nehru's agreement. Al-Ahram said that all other versions were fabrications of Western papers. (Ahram, Nov 25)

Topics at UAR-Yugoslav Talks, Motives and Intentions. According to UAR sources Abdel Nasser and Tito discussed the following main topics during their preliminary meeting, before Nehru's arrival:

1. The development of the international situation since the Belgrade conference; 2. ways of countering the "pre-meditated conspiracies" to divide the non-aligned countries; 3. the need for further cooperation, both political and economic, between them. (R. Cairo, Nov 18-IMB, Nov 19-BBCM, Nov 20; NYT, Nov 20)

Other reports provided an elaboration of these points. Both Yugoslavia and the UAR believed, it was reported, that, since the Belgrade Conference, the non-aligned nations had been subjected to dangerous pressures from both East and West. In particular, Yugoslavia charged that the US was exerting economic pressure on her in an attempt to alter her policy. In a speech on Nov 13 Tito had complained of such pressures, and especially that the US was withholding wheat supplies that Yugoslavia had requested after a drought. (Some US senators had demanded the withholding of aid from Communist Yugoslavia—NYHT, Nov 20.) Yugoslavia also pointed to attacks on her at the 22nd Soviet Party Congress. Cairo sources said that both Yugoslavia and Ghana were being subjected to such pressures, because of their attitude at the Belgrade Conference. Al-Ahram accused President Kennedy of wanting to prevent certain countries from adopting a neutralist policy. In particular, however, the UAR pointed to the Syrian revolt, which, it said, was organized by Western agents in collaboration with Arab reactionaries, in execution of the imperialist policy of "divide and rule."

Yugoslavia also wanted to discuss the possibilities of joint action in view of the progressing economic integration of Western Europe. In the above-mentioned speech Tito had hinted at such a need. He wished, it was believed, for a non-aligned economic community.

Observers in Cairo believed that one of Abdel Nasser's important motives in holding the meeting was to help restore his prestige after Syria's secession, to silence rumours as to the stability of his regime, and to support his claims to speak for the Arab world. (NYT, Nov 17, 19, 20; Ahram, Nov 18; NYHT, Nov 19, 20, 21; Times, Nov 20; Economist, Mid Mir., Nov 25)

Joint Communiqué Composed of Generalities, but Mentions Economic Cooperation. [Following a short preliminary meeting after Nehru's arrival on Nov 18, the three statesmen met for some three hours on Nov 19.] The publication of the joint communiqué was delayed; it was issued only after Nehru's departure early the next morning (NYT, Nov 20). It said that the three leaders had exchanged views on international problems, and especially the situation since the Belgrade Conference, in a "friendly atmosphere." They noted with concern that international tension still persisted, agreed that the problem of war and peace was the question of the survival of mankind, confirmed their resolve to concentrate their efforts for the sake of peace, and appealed for a general and comprehensive agreement on disarmament.

They noted, however, that "the efforts, especially those of non-aligned countries," had contributed to a certain improvement in the international situation, and mentioned the appointment of an acting SG of the UN, the resolutions on the moratorium on nuclear tests and the establishment of Africa as a non-atomic zone, and the termination of the hunger strike of Algerian prisoners. They noted efforts to solve the Berlin problem through negotiations, and "devoted attention" to the need for strengthening means of economic cooperation between all countries, "including those affected by economic groupings in the world." (R. Cairo, Nov 20 (21))

Comment: Nehru Restricted Scope of Talks and Resolutions. It was the consensus of Western observers that what was termed as the "negligible formal results" of the talks was due mainly to Nehru's reluctance to commit himself. At the conference he had "listened sympathetically to the facts about pressures," but had objected to any specific political or economic proposals. It was understood that the Indians had deleted almost all the points for common agreement submitted by Abdel Nasser and Tito. The "tranquillizing communiqué"—as it was defined by The Economist—was believed to be "a reflection of Mr. Nehru's discreet optimism rather than the strident anxieties of the other two." The absence of any harsh indictment of the big powers or the "imperialist conspiracy" was especially noted. (NYHT, NYT, Nov 21; Economist, Nov 25)

One proposal that was understood to have been dropped due to Nehru's objections was a high-level economic conference of non-aligned nations (Times of India, Nov 21). [However, such a conference took place in Cairo in 1962.]

Even the manner of Nehru's departure on Nov 19, almost immediately after the talks ended, was regarded as indication of his feelings that the meeting had been given a publicity buildup disproportionate to its brevity and informality. A press conference scheduled to take place before Nehru's departure was cancelled without explanation. It was reported that a security cloak was thrown about his departure and all but some local correspondents were barred from the airport. Egyptian sources stated that the Indian embassy had requested it, but this was denied by embassy officials. (Times, Nov 20; Mid. Mir., Nov 25)

Belgrade, on the other hand, emphasized the importance of the meeting as a fresh effort towards peace. (Borba, Belgrade, Nov 19)

NOTES

Definition. The tables below include only new agreements concluded in 1961. Thus, e.g., USSR operational contracts under general credit agreements concluded in former years are not given.

The tables contain grants-in-aid, loans and credits from governments, governmental agencies and banks, and large-scale credits from private companies with government backing (the last category was not given in MER 1960). Military assistance, current commercial credits, private donations and, in the case of Israel, private and government income from the reparations agreements with the German Federal Republic, are not included.

US Public Law 480. In order to avoid double accounting, only the original surplus food agreements signed during 1961, but not the use of counterpart funds accruing from the domestic sale of the surpluses, have been included.

The IBRD and the IMF appear under Western agencies because the Soviet Bloc did not participate in these agencies.

Explanatory Notes. Where no amount is given in the second column, the reasons are explained under: Details.

Sums in the second column are given in round figures, converted—if necessary—into dollars at the official rate of exchange. Exact figures, in the currencies stated in the reports, are given under: Details.

- 5) Iraq 1960: Including oil exports. The figures have been added up from two sources: 1) Oil exports from Quarterly Bulletin of the Central Bank of Iraq, No. 39, July-Sept 1961; 2) Other exports from YITS 1960. The second source is more detailed as to countries but does not include oil exports. There are slight discrepancies between the two sources as to non-oil exports.

In 1960, payments by petroleum companies to the Iraqi Government totalled $266.6 million.

Iraq 1961: The break-down of oil exports to individual countries was not available. Oil exports amounting to $624,680,000 have, however, been included in the totals under "Western and other countries." THE WESTERN POWERS AND THE MIDDLE EAST

THE MILITARY POSITION OF THE WEST IN THE ME

[Note: On the Russian military position in the area, only Western reports and reviews were available; these are included below.]

Western strategy in the ME continued to be concerned with the oil interest and the overall strategic value of the area in the struggle with the Communist countries; the first received more emphasis in the UK, the latter in the US.

The outstanding military event during the year was Britain's operation in Kuwait, in defence of her oil interests. In face of an open Iraqi threat to Kuwait's newly won independence, and in response to a Kuwaiti request for assistance under her agreement with Britain, a UK force was landed in Kuwait, starting on July 1. This was the first Western military intervention in Arab affairs since 1958, when US and British forces came to the assistance of the Lebanese and Jordanian governments respectively, after the coup d'état in Iraq. In 1961, as in 1958, the intervention was legal in that it was requested by the government concerned, and also as in 1958, it met no armed opposition either locally or from abroad. Both Kuwait's independence and Britain's oil interest were preserved, though that credit for this was due to the presence of the British force remained a matter for speculation. (On the political circumstances of the Kuwait crisis, see pp 117 ff.)

From the military point of view, qualified observers argued that the operation, while executed speedily and efficiently, also demonstrated the great limitations of the small British strategic reserve, which was committed to action for the first time. By using most of the resources of the RAF Transport Command, and with several days warning, it took almost a week to concentrate in Kuwait one reinforced brigade group in an unopposed operation. In case of Iraqi armed opposition, it was thought, air cover, armour, and even sea defence would have been inadequate. Nor would sufficient troops have been available, as the whole strategic reserve consisted of three brigade groups, a parachute brigade and two Marine commandos. Thus the intervention would have had to be abandoned entirely, or else postponed for so long a time that an entirely new situation would meanwhile have arisen. In Oct the British troops were relieved by an Arab League force in safeguarding Kuwait's independence.

Except for the Kuwait operation, where the British forces in the area were reinforced from the central strategic reserve in Britain, no major change took place in the order of battle of Western forces in the ME and the Mediterranean. The main Western deterrent in the area remained the US 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean, which was constantly at a state of full combat readiness. For land forces, however, apart from the small British garrisons in the ME and East Africa (Kenya) and the 1,800 marines of the 6th Fleet, the West had to rely on its strategic reserve and on its airlift capacity for speedy intervention in an emergency. British resources were very limited, as already stated, even considering the seven brigades of the Army of the Rhine. The US capacity to commit forces grew as the Administration put more emphasis on strengthening forces for non-nuclear, limited wars and guerrilla warfare, as well as on increasing the air-lift capacity. The Berlin crisis also contributed to increasing the readiness and the strength of the US forces.

CENTO, upon the insistence of Iran and Pakistan, decided to appoint a military commander, a step interpreted as the cornerstone for a military command structure and forces committed to the organization. The appointment, however, was not actually made, and thus, it was commented, the power of CENTO continued to be expressed primarily in the bilateral defence agreements between the US and Iran, Pakistan, and Turkey.

The Soviet Union's submarine flotilla withdrew from Albania following the deterioration in the relations between the two countries. The Soviet Union's capacity to intervene in the ME by airborne troops and land forces, however, presumably remained as considerable as before; (see MER 1960, pp 95, 102).

WESTERN STRATEGIC OBJECTIVES

Western strategic objectives in the ME continued unchanged. (See MER 1960, p 95.)

British Oil Interests. [The determination to defend the oil interests was demonstrated by Britain's military assistance to Kuwait in face of the Iraqi threat to the latter's independence.] A leader in The Times confirmed again that "a threat to the oil of the Middle East is one of the main preoccupations of British strategy." (Times, July 11)

US Strategy. The objectives of the US in the ME were defined by one of her commanders in the area, Maj-Gen. Frank S. Bowen, Deputy C-in-C, US Naval Forces Eastern Atlantic and Mediterranean. He declared that the reasons for US concern in the area were strategic location and oil.

Geographically, he said, the ME was the hub of the eastern hemisphere. History seemed to demonstrate that anyone who would desire to dominate the continents of the eastern hemisphere must, as an essential step, dominate the ME. Conversely, for anyone trying to resist continental expansion, the ME must be protected at all costs. Soviet Russia sought to expand southward, as the Turks had done, while the emergence of independent African states gave her an additional reason for desiring to play a dominant role in the ME.

In addition to its strategic location, the ME contained three-quarters of the world's known oil resources, upon which the allies of the US were dependent for their supply. While the Russians perhaps had no vital need of ME oil for their own use, it would certainly be of tremendous advantage to them to be able to control its production and exportation.

US aims in the ME were: (a) to assist the people of the ME to resist domination by a totalitarian power, whose aims were inimical to the free world, and to ensure the availability of the oil; (b) to prevent the spread of Communism in the area, regardless of the form it might take; (c) to ensure the ME's continued neutrality or alignment with the West.

As to the means employed, Bowen said, the US sought to promote peace, understanding, and economic stability in the ME primarily through diplomatic channels and economic and military aid. "Direct military support may be provided at the request of nations who may find themselves in difficulty" (the "commitment to Lebanon" [in 1956] was such a case); Bowen emphasized, however, that "initial effort and incentive must be of indigenous origin."

There were no US [land] forces in the area, and the forces which might be required had to come from Europe, the US, and the Far East. Emphasizing that successful intervention required a short reaction time, the General spoke of the logistic problems involved—mainly aircraft requirements—and raised the questions of aircraft capacity as well as the availability of the Suez Canal. (Army, Oct)

East Africa to Enable Defence in Depth. An article in a US military journal discussed the strategic value of East Africa as a "bastion for the Western world." While the land bridge from Asia to Africa retained its extraordinary strategic importance, the loss of the British positions in and around the pivotal Suez positions, as well as political changes in the ME area, had enhanced the importance of East Africa.

British defence planning had now prepared a new role for East Africa. In addition to the major stake the Western allies had in Africa itself, they needed a place of security in which to mass reserve forces for defence in depth against assault through the Middle East. They also needed bases outside the vulnerable European theatre for deploying airpower to strike in the Persian Gulf and Eastern Mediterranean, as well as facilities for naval power in the Indian Ocean. Finally, they needed an "enclave of political stability and pro-Western faith in an unpredictable continent..."

Concluding his survey of the area—Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Zanzibar and Pemba—the author said that East Africa had the "characteristics for a defensive position of some strength" and that the US could contribute to the creation of such a position. (US Naval Institute Proceedings, March)

US FORCES AND BASES

The Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean. After taking over command in July, Vice-Admiral David L. McDonald declared in London that the fleet normally consisted of some 50 ships, almost 30,000 men, and more than 200 naval aircraft. The fleet was at full strength and at a state of full combat readiness. (NYT, July 6, Aug 8)

The composition of the fleet continued in the main as in 1960 (see MER 1960 p 95). However, the report quoted in MER 1960 on Polaris (nuclear) submarines in the fleet was apparently erroneous. In Feb a New York Times correspondent reported from Ankara that the 6th Fleet had Polaris submarines. In Aug, however, a report on the composition of the Fleet made no mention of them (NYT, Feb 22, Aug 8), and in the same month the US Secretary of the Navy denied that there were any immediate plans for Polaris submarines to operate in the Mediterranean. (Times, Aug 24)

Fifteen mobile Jupiter medium-range missiles and nuclear warheads to arm them were emplaced in Turkey (30 such missiles were in Italy). Turkey agreed to the emplacement of the missiles in spite of Soviet warnings. Both forces were fully committed to NATO and could not be used unilaterally by their own governments. (Flight, March 3; NYT, Feb 22)

Exercises in Turkey. [In Sept. at the height of the Berlin crisis] NATO exercise Checkmate II was held in western Turkey. A force of about 2,000 parachute troops from the US 101st Airborne Division were dropped, and other troops carried out a beach assault at Saros Bay. Turkish, British, Greek, and US forces took part in the exercise. About 230 US fighter and transport aircraft participated.

The USSR protested to Turkey against the holding of this exercise in an area "directly bordering on the Soviet Union and Bulgaria." It said that US naval ships—among them an aircraft carrier—were calling on Turkish ports on the Black Sea coast. The Soviet government, precisely during the Berlin crisis, could only assess this exercise as a hostile demonstration; the use of the Black Sea itself as an area for manoeuvres was incompatible with the existing international agreements (Times, Sept 8, 18; Pravda, Sept 26). (Admiral Arleigh Burke, US Chief of Naval Operations, had declared at the beginning of the year that the US Navy would go into the Black Sea whenever it pleased, and the Soviet Union would not stop it. (Times, Feb 17))

Wheelus Air Base in Libya. In July the Wheelus Air Base near Tripoli came under the command of the 17th Air Force of the USAFE (US Air Force, Europe). The base covered an area of more than 3,000 acres, and its runways carried a greater volume of tactical aircraft traffic than any other runway in the USAFE. Air forces based in Europe did weapon training from the base, which could accommodate over a hundred aircraft and a thousand personnel for training purposes. Each tactical fighter pilot in the USAFE came to Wheelus as the average of twice a year for one month. Wheelus was also important as a MATS (Military Air Transport Service) base. During 1961 it played an important part in facilitating the movements of UN staff and supplies to the Congo and refugees from the Congo. (Flight, April 20; Times, Dec 16)

US Air Base in Dhahran (Saudi Arabia). In March Saudi Arabia asked the US to cease its military operations from the Dhahran airfield. (For details see pp 428-9)

BRITISH NEAR EAST COMMAND

The unified ME Command, with headquarters at Akrotiri (Cyprus), was redesignated Near East Command, as of March 1. It was responsible for all British forces within the Mediterranean area i.e. Cyprus, Libya, and Malta. (Report on Defence 1961, Memorandum on Army Estimates 1961-62, HMSO.)

In mid-1961 a total of seven infantry battalions were stationed in the Mediterranean area, including Gibraltar. But in Dec it was reported that British garrisons in the ME would be reduced considerably, and that the area would be largely the responsibility of a UK-based strategic reserve. (Times, June 27, Dec 7)

British Bases in Cyprus. The British forces in Cyprus operated in the sovereign base areas without any serious disturbance throughout the first full year of Cyprus' independence.

Air Marshal Sir William MacDonald, Air Officer C-in-C, Near East Air Force, and Administrator of the Sovereign Base areas, Cyprus, described the treaty relations with Cyprus as working extremely well. Boundaries of the sovereign territory had been marked with stones instead of barbed wire. The bases were the biggest employers on the island (12,000-15,000 Cypriots). (Times, March 20)

Between July 26 and Aug 7 the water pipeline leading to Dekhelia base was sabotaged 12 times. (See p 252 h.)

Strategic Value of Cyprus Questioned. The strategic value of Cyprus was questioned. A US observer thought Britain might find her position in Cyprus seriously impaired, either by political developments or by the exposed location of the island, in an age of jet bombers and missiles (US Naval Institute Proceedings, March, p 22). The Defence correspondent of The Times described the Cyprus commitments, together with others such as Malta, irrelevant to immediate strategic needs. They seemed to be outside of the framework of any foreseeable strategic concept. The withdrawal from them might be unattractive and even painful, but it would be an important step towards solving the manpower problem. (Times, Sept 15)

Forces in Cyprus. The strength of the British forces on the island was about 20,000 servicemen, supported by 12,000-15,000 civilians.

The major units were: No. 3 Infantry Brigade Group; 2nd Battalion, the Parachute Regiment; Canberra bombers and fighter aircraft. (Soldier, June; Times, Oct 3; Memorandum on Air Estimates 1961-62, HMSO)

The Mediterranean Fleet and British Forces in Malta. Malta was the base of the British Mediterranean Fleet, which also operated two airfields on the island.

The Royal Navy was broadly divided into the ships based west of Suez, which were virtually all interchangeable between the Home and Mediterranean Fleets, and the Eastern Fleet, based at Singapore. West of Suez were always two aircraft carriers.

The permanent establishment of the Mediterranean Fleet consisted of 1 cruiser, 5 destroyers, 4 frigates, 1 submarine squadron, 1 repair ship, 1 guided missile ship, 8 coastal minesweepers. (Explanatory Statement on Navy Estimates 1961-62, HMSO)

Among other British forces in Malta was a Royal Marine Commando. (Soldier, June; Times, Feb 8)

Exercises in Cyprus, Libya. The strength of the permanent British garrison in Libya remained unchanged during 1961, namely, one armoured and two infantry battalions (Soldier, Nov). The El Adem airfield continued to serve as an important staging point for the RAF. (Times, Oct 14)

Exercise Triangle, in March, was described as one of the highest exercises in North Africa since the Second World War. The 3rd Independent Infantry Brigade Group moved from Cyprus to Libya in what was described as the biggest airlift out of Cyprus since the Suez operation. The move was supported by sea transport. The opponents of the Cyprus force were troops permanently stationed in Libya.

In April Exercise Fabulist was held in Cyprus. The 16th Independent Parachute Brigade of the Strategic Reserve in the UK joined her battalion stationed in Cyprus for five days during the exercise, which was intended to test combined air mobility and ground tactical training. It opened with a mass drop in the north-west of the island, and afterwards the troops were engaged in the Adolphus forest area. The transportation of the brigade involved the biggest military airlift to Cyprus since the time of the Suez intervention. (Times, March 16, April 26; Soldier, June)

BRITISH MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

General. On March 1 British Forces Arabian Peninsula was redesignated Middle East Command. The titles of commanders were as follows: C-in-C Middle East; Flag Officer Middle East; GOC Middle East Land Forces; GOC East Africa Command; Air Officer Commanding Air Forces Middle East. (Army Quarterly, July)

Air Marshal Sir Charles Elworthy was the C-in-C. The Command included Aden and the Arabian coast up to Kuwait, Kenya, Uganda, and Tanganyika, and the western half of the Indian Ocean. The protection of the oil interest was regarded as the main task of the Command. "The way to protect that interest is to protect the weak coastal powers and the minorities against outward pressure of the powers and peoples of the interior." The command, it was reported, "backs the minority of white settlers in Kenya. In Aden it wages a spasmodic war against Yemen in defence of the nascent federation of shaykhdoms on the Aden coast. It supports the Sultan of Muscat and Oman against the ever rebellious Omanis... who get their guns from Saudi Arabia. It finances the Trucial Oman Scouts, who keep the Saudis out of the strategic Buraimi Oasis." (NYT, July 7)

There were 8,000 UK land troops in Aden, Bahrain, and Kenya. (NYT, July 1)

The forces under command consisted of: Naval: three frigates; the Amphibious Warfare Squadron, with headquarters ships and three tank-landing ships; the commando carrier Bulwark with one marine commando; one marine commando based at Aden.

Land: In Aden, one infantry battalion, one armoured car regiment, one field-gun battery, and one light aircraft squadron, as well as five infantry battalions and an armoured car squadron of the Aden Protectorate Levies (on which see p 441 b).

In Bahrain, two infantry companies, reinforced in Oct by a parachute battalion.

In Sharjah, one armoured squadron.

In Kenya (as local strategic reserve), the 24th Infantry Brigade, with four infantry battalions and one field-gun regiment.

Air: Two Hunter squadrons, a transport force engaged in maintaining the widely dispersed ground and air forces. (Times, July 3, 20, Oct 3, Dec 28; Journal RUSI, Nov; Army Quarterly, Jan 1962)

Bases in Aden. The Army rebuilt its administrative and workshop centre, and spent £3.5m. on new barracks at Khormaksar, Aden. At Bir Fukum, 22 miles from Aden, the biggest single military building scheme ever undertaken in the area was launched—the $5m. Little Aden cantonment for 2,500 soldiers and 1,000 dependants. (Times, Oct 9; Soldier, June)

Bases in Kenya. African leaders, especially of KANU, were conducting a sustained campaign against the British Army cantonment being built at Kahawa, 14 miles from

Nairobi, and the RAF station at Eastleigh, Nairobi. (Times, July 1, Oct 18)

On Nov 30 it was announced that discussions on the future of the military bases were to take place between the governments of Kenya and the UK. The decision was reached after an outright demand to stop further military activity and to take steps to remove the bases without delay. (Times, Dec 1)

OPERATION IN KUWAIT

General. In the Kuwait crisis (on which see pp 117 ff) Britain's Strategic Reserve—the "fire brigade" force—was tested for the first time in action, though in a bloodless operation. (Soldier, Sept)

Build-up of Forces. As the reports of the Iraqi build-up were received, a British review of the operation said, it was obvious that the Ruler of Kuwait might request assistance and that certain preparatory moves would have to be made. During June 27 and 28 more information about the build-up came in, and the decision was made to put the commando carrier Bulwark [which was at Karachi] within reach of Kuwait, and to move a Hunter squadron to Bahrain. On June 30 the Ruler of Kuwait asked for British assistance (Army Quarterly, Jan 62). On the same day the 24th Infantry Brigade in Kenya was alerted, and a small number of administrative troops moved from Cyprus to the ME Command. (Times, July 1)

D-Day (July 1): 600 Royal Marine commandos of 42 Commando from the commando carrier Bulwark (escorted by one frigate only) were landed by helicopters near the town of Kuwait, and 14 Centurion tanks of 3rd Dragoon Guards from Bahrain were landed by tank landing ship. The Commander of the 24th Infantry Brigade Group established a joint Kuwait-British Headquarters. By nightfall British troops were established on the Mutla ridge, which covered the only approach to the town of Kuwait from the north. (Soldier, Sept; Army Quarterly, Oct 1961, Jan 1962)

D + 1 (July 2): Troop-carrying aircraft flew in more men and equipment. A British army spokesman confirmed that the British troops in Kuwait were, in addition to 42 Commando and 3rd Dragoon Guards: 45 Commando (from Aden), two companies of the Coldstream Guards from Bahrain, a squadron of the 11th Hussars with armoured cars from Aden, an airborne gun battery from Aldershot, and advance elements of the 24th Infantry Brigade from Nairobi; there were 12 Hawker Hunter jet aircraft; an Inter-service amphibious headquarters joined the Bulwark. (Times, July 3)

D + 2 (July 3): Further troops arrived of the Coldstream Guards and also of the 2nd Parachute Battalion from Cyprus, who were flown over Turkey and Iran. Air forces on the spot included eight Canberra bombers, two Hawker Hunter fighter squadrons, short-range transport aircraft, and a reconnaissance flight of the Army Air Corps. A squadron of Javelin fighter aircraft of the RAF Fighter Command was standing by in Britain. The Force in Kuwait was by now "a very strong brigade group, with air support." (Times, July 3, 4)

D + 3 (July 4): Military transport aircraft continued to arrive at an average of five an hour. The new arrivals were mainly infantry from Kenya and two 25-pounder gun batteries from the U.K. (Times, July 5; Army Quarterly, Jan 1962)

D + 4 (July 5): 34th Field Squadron, Royal Engineers arrived (Times, July 6). More than 7,000 men were by now in position, holding an 80-mile defence line. (Soldier, Sept)

D + 6 (July 7): The naval forces off Kuwait were reinforced by the aircraft carrier Victorious and her escorting vessels (this force had been ordered to sail from Hongkong on June 29—Times, July 30; Journal RUSI, Nov) and minesweepers from Aden (Army Quarterly, Jan 1962). With the arrival of the 1st Battalion, the King's Regiment, from Kenya, the men of the Coldstream Guards returned to Bahrain. The C-in-C ME announced that the build-up had been virtually completed. (Times, July 8)

[The forces, drawn from Aden, Kenya, Cyprus, Germany, the UK, and Singapore, consisted finally of the following:

Naval: One fleet carrier, one commando carrier, one amphibious warfare squadron, and minesweepers. In reserve off Aden: one light aircraft carrier and a destroyer squadron (which had sailed through the Suez Canal.)

Land: Under command of HQ 24th Infantry Brigade Group: two infantry battalions, one parachute battalion, two marine commandos, most of an armoured car regiment, a tank squadron, a field-gun regiment, an airborne gun battery and supporting units.

Air: Two Canberra (bomber) squadrons, two Hunter (ground attack and fighter) squadrons, one Javelin (air defence) squadron on alert in the UK, one photo-reconnaissance Canberra squadron, and one Shackleton (maritime reconnaissance and anti-submarine duties) squadron, Beverley transports and communication and liaison aircraft.]

ME Command commanded this force from advanced joint headquarters at Bahrain. (Army Quarterly, Jan 1962)

Theatre Reserve (Kenya): HQ 19th Infantry Brigade and two infantry battalions of the UK Strategic Reserve were airlifted to Kenya starting July 7. These units replaced those of the 24th Infantry Brigade sent to Kuwait, and provided a base from which reliefs and reinforcements to Kuwait could be carried out. (Times, July 4, 5, 7)

Role of RAF Transport Command. Never before had British troops moved so rapidly, a British source said (Soldier, Sept). Some 70 aircraft were used, most of them within the first 48 hours. This figure was given by the Air Minister, who said that three Royal Rhodesian Air Force aircraft and 17 chartered civil machines were also used in the first six days. About 7,000 men and 700 tons of stores were moved to airfields in the Persian Gulf and Aden. The final seal was set on the airlift on July 14. The transport force included one Comet squadron, two Britannia squadrons, 4 Beverley squadrons, 3 Hastings squadrons, and one Valetta squadron. (Flight, July 13, 27)

Activities. The force in Kuwait held an 80-mile defence line near the Iraqi border. There was a reserve for defending the oilfields and the water and distillation plants. (Times, July 4, 7)

Not one shot was fired in anger. The biggest enemy turned out to be the weather. Scores of men (though, significantly, not those who had been acclimatized in Bahrain and Aden) were prostrated by the overpowering heat, and violent sandstorms tore at the troops. (Soldier, Sept, Nov)

The Withdrawal. The withdrawal started on July 19 with the return of 45 Marine Commando to Aden, followed on July 21 by the Bulwark with 42 Marine Commando.

With the arrival of Arab League troops the parachute troops started to leave for Bahrain on Sept 19. By Oct 10 the withdrawal had been completed. In mid-Oct the troops which had been sent to Kenya started to return to the UK. (Times, July 20, 22, Sept 16, 20, Oct 11, 16)

Evaluation of Operation. The joint planning staff of the Ministry of Defence, a Times leader said, had provided a workable plan which had been executed by the service ministries and their commanders and staff with precision.

The situation which faced the British government bristled with political difficulties, but militarily General Qasim surrendered the initiative when he announced his claims on Kuwait without making a military move of any consequence. This enabled the government to move a force into a friendly country and to take up defensive positions there—an operation needing far smaller resources than would have been needed if Iraq had acted without warning. Using most of the resources of the RAF Transport Command and the commands overseas, and with several days warning, it took a week to concentrate and deploy a reinforced brigade group.

There were obvious gaps in the composition and equipment of the force. The most serious of these was the strength of its defence against armour. Aircraft armed with rockets could be considered to strengthen the anti-tank resources, but they could not replace the tank as the principal close anti-tank support for ground forces. (Times, July 11)

Nor was the air situation considered satisfactory. To provide reconnaissance, close support of ground forces, and air defence, at least five different types of RAF and Royal Navy aircraft were used. The deployment of Canberra and Hunters with the possibility of reinforcement by Javelins, the Defence correspondent of The Times noted, pointed to a gap in the equipment of the RAF: There was no all-purpose aircraft, capable of being ferried long distances without refuelling and of operations from short unmade runways in a combined air-defence and ground-attack role. The Canberra was basically a bomber, with limited capability in air defence. The Javelin was an air fighter with an effective air-to-air missile designed primarily to operate from the UK, but it needed long metal runways and could be ferried long distances only by using frequent stages and flight refuelling. The Hunter was virtually obsolete as an air-defence fighter, having no air-to-air missile armament, and would have been at a disadvantage against the MIG 17 aircraft with which the Iraq Air Force was equipped. There seemed to be a clear need for a versatile aircraft, like the French Mirage, for operations in limited war. (Times, July 4, 5, 7)

On the naval side serious risks had to be taken, an authoritative British source said. As luck would have it, the commando carrier Bulwark was at Karachi, only two days steaming from Kuwait. But for protection of the Bulwark out of three frigates in the area only one was available. Iraq had no submarines, but she had 10 motor torpedo boats, which could have delivered a night attack on the carrier. Alternatively, they could have been used to lay mines, and there was no minesweeper within 4,000 miles of the scene of operation. Two minesweepers which passed through the Suez Canal from the Mediterranean, could not reach the area before July 16. But most serious of all was the lack of air protection during the early stages, since a commando carrier did not carry any aircraft for this purpose and had limited armament. Much had been made of the useful role of the commando carrier, but she was very vulnerable. The only carrier east of Suez, the Victorious, was 5,000 miles away when the crisis arose. She was only able to reach the scene some nine days later. The light fleet carrier Centaur and two escorts, which sailed from Gibraltar, could reach Kuwait only three days after that, so she was held at Aden. This force could have been easily held up in the Suez Canal by the Egyptian government. (Vice Admiral B.B. Schofield in Army Quarterly, Oct)

The Force in Kuwait had been successfully deployed largely because it was unopposed. If an opposed landing had been necessary the outcome might have been very different. In fact, the Bulwark would have been obliged to await the necessary concentration of forces before entering the operational area, and by that time the aggressor would have been in possession of the field (see also below: Strategic Reserves). (Times, July 11; Army Quarterly, Oct)

Second ME Alert. In Dec there was another, though limited, alert, in regard to Kuwait (see p 137 b ff).

Two hundred officers and men of the army and the RAF left Britain on Dec 27 for the ME, by air. The move was part of precautions which began to be taken before Christmas, when last minute changes were made in the leave arrangements of the central Strategic Reserve to meet increasing tension in the ME. The aircraft carrier Centaur sailed from Mombasa to the Aden area, accompanied by a tank landing ship and two frigates.

The Times Defence correspondent remarked that although no official statement was made about the nature of the threat, there could be little doubt that the sensitive area was once more Kuwait. The British troop movements were almost no more than intelligent precautions, as it would have been difficult to bring effective aid to Kuwait after an attack by the Iraqis. (Times, Dec 28)

CENTRAL TREATY ORGANIZATION

Organization. The organizational setup of CENTO remained unchanged during 1961 (see MER 1960, p 100).

Ninth Session of CENTO Council; Question of Military Commander. [Pakistan and Iran had been urging for some time the appointment for CENTO of a military commander with powers similar to those of the Supreme Commander of the NATO Forces. It appeared that the two countries wished to have a US general as Commander.]

Before the annual meeting of the CENTO Ministerial Council (ninth session, Ankara, April 27-28) it was reported that the proposal for a "CENTO joint military command" was likely to be dropped, because the US, "while unwilling to detract from the importance of existing military pacts... is not eager to take on any new commitments."

Mr. A.O. Baig, CENTO SG, [a Pakistani] stated that without the US CENTO would not have much reality; her presence "gives us an umbrella against any possible aggression." (Times, April 19)

Following the meeting of the Military Committee in Ankara (April 24-25), which, as usual, preceded the session of the Ministerial Council, the CENTO SG said "that the command structure in itself is not so important, even if desirable as a goal, so long as CENTO is confident that the US and Britain will come to our aid in case of aggression." He added that the allocation of troops by member countries to CENTO "had been agreed but never actually spelt out"; this point would again be raised at the Council meeting.

The unified command question was the leading issue at the Ministerial Council meeting. The Council decided to appoint a Military Staff Commander with the rank of full general.

The CENTO SG said that the decision was "the corner stone of a command structure." The SG said that the general was likely to be an American, because of the need to appoint some officer who was versed in the technicalities of modern nuclear warfare. But he added that the Americans were in no way committed to providing the new commander. It was believed, the Times correspondent added, that the decision was taken largely at the insistence of Iran and Pakistan, both of whom, especially Iran, which was a member of no other alliance, felt militarily "out of the world." Turkey, being a member of NATO, found the question of a unified command more academic.

Dean Rusk, the US Secretary of State, declared after the meeting that full US membership of CENTO had not even been discussed at the meeting. The Americans would remain as "observers," it was remarked, though the US "provided the military power and the lion's share of the economic resources of the pact." The power of CENTO would continue to be expressed in the bilateral defence agreements that the US signed in 1959 with Turkey, Iran and Pakistan, the wording of which was considerably stronger than that of the CENTO treaty. [By the end of the year no military commander had yet been appointed.]

On the economic side the communiqué of the Council merely "reaffirmed keen interest" in development projects in the area, some of which were known to be short of sufficient funds. The CENTO SG said all economic projects were behind schedule. (Times, April 27, 29)

Telecommunications Project. In June a high-frequency radio link between London and Turkey and Iran was inaugurated. The link was devised to improve communications between the CENTO countries. The link with Pakistan was expected to be completed in 1962. The equipment was provided by the UK as part of its bilateral technical assistance to CENTO regional countries. (Times, June 22)

Soviet Charges CENTO with Nuclear Plot. On Aug 18 the USSR made public what she claimed were secret documents of the Baghdad Pact, the forerunner of CENTO, dated Feb 3, 1958, and entitled "Nuclear Target Study." According to the purported documents and a Tass statement, the plan outlined nuclear targets in the Soviet Union and the Sinkiang province in China, as well as 40 populated targets in Iran and Pakistan in order to establish a "zone of death" to prevent a Soviet attack to the south. Tass also charged that suspicious military activity had been going on recently on the southern borders of the Soviet Union. The allegations were strongly denied by the CENTO countries, the US, and by officials of CENTO headquarters. (Times, Aug 19, 21; BBCM, Aug 21, 22; NYT, Aug 21)

WESTERN CAPACITY TO INTERVENE IN ME

The Sixth Fleet. [The US 6th Fleet remained on first call for an eventual US emergency intervention in the ME. Its land force consisted, however, of only, 1,800 Marines.]

US Strengthens Mobile Force to Fight Limited Wars. [The strength and mobility of the US force was increased during the year, mostly on account of the Berlin crisis.]

In his message to Congress on the 1962 defence budget, President Kennedy stated that the free world's security could be endangered not only by nuclear attack, but also by being slowly nibbled away at the periphery by forces of subversion, infiltration, intimidation, indirect or non-overt aggression, internal revolution, diplomatic blackmail, guerrilla warfare, or a series of limited wars.

The President's material recommendations, in addition to speeding up the missile programme, included the strengthening in manpower, weapons and mobility of the conventional forces, to improve the ability to fight guerrilla and limited wars. He said the US should have "strong, highly mobile forces trained in this type of warfare, some of which must be deployed in forward areas, with a substantial airlift and sealift capacity and pre-stacked overseas bases." "Our capacity to move forces in sizable numbers on short notice and to be able to support them in one or more crisis areas could avoid the need for a much larger commitment later."

It was remarked that this statement was fully applicable to the ME. (NYT, NYHT, March 29)

During the year the unified Strike Command was formed, combining the Army's Strategic Army Corps (STRAC) and the Air Forces' Tactical Air Command (TAC) (NYT, Sept 20). STRAC included the 82nd and 101st airborne divisions, the 4th Infantry Division, the 150th Armoured Cavalry and supporting units, including a missile brigade, all under command of the Eighteenth Airborne Corps. This force had a strength of 115,000 officers and men (Army, May; NYT, July 27; Times, Aug 9). TAC had 46,000 officers and men. It included the Ninth, Twelfth and Nineteenth Air Forces. Its 1,800 planes included fighter-bombers, tactical reconnaissance aircraft, long-range heavy cargo and assault troop-carriers with complementary in-flight refuelling tanker aircraft, and Mace and Matador missiles. TAC had been responsible for the composite airstrike force sent to Lebanon in 1958. (NYT, March 27, Sept 9)

On the Military Air Transport Services (MATs), whose task was to provide strategic airlift, see MER 1960, p 101 (US Airlift Capacity); in 1961 MATs operated 996 propeller-driven aircraft. Thirty Boeing C 135 jets and 23 C 130 E turboprops had been ordered, and the first Boeing aircraft was delivered in June. (Times, Feb 3; Flight, June 29)

The British Strategic Reserve. The Strategic Reserve consisted of three brigade groups, a parachute brigade (16th) and two Royal Marine commandos. The central reserve was based on the UK; one infantry brigade group was in Kenya, a parachute battalion in Cyprus, and some units in Bahrain and Aden. The Royal Marine commandos were based West of Suez in Malta and East of Suez in Singapore, Aden, and on the commando carrier Bulwark.

In the Kuwait crisis the Strategic Reserve was tested in action for the first time, though in a bloodless operation. This operation committed the Strategic Reserve heavily. Two brigade groups and two Royal Marine commandos were tied down. [See above: The Kuwait Operation). This left only the parachute brigade and one infantry brigade in reserve, with a limited amount of administrative backing. Any additional reinforcements would have had to come from the Army of the Rhine, which comprised seven brigades. (Times, July 5)

The lesson of the Kuwait operation was that Britain would find it difficult, if not impossible, to deal with more than one emergency of this sort without either taking away forces from Germany or calling her allies for help. (Times, July 11)

The Berlin crisis at the very time of the Kuwait action strained British resources heavily. The defence correspondent of The Times commented that whereas in the past the Central Strategic Reserve and the British Army of the Rhine had been the source of manpower for emergencies in other parts of the world, the roles were now reversed. If the situation in Europe got worse, it would be necessary to withdraw administrative and signal units from the Mediterranean or the Far East to fill the gap. (Times, Aug 14)

On Aug 17 the War Office announced the establishment of a strategic reserve division, to be based on the UK. The division (3rd) would consist of two infantry brigades of the Strategic Reserve, the 19th and the 51st. The 16th Parachute Brigade would have three infantry battalions temporarily under its command [two battalions of the brigade were at the time in Cyprus and Bahrain], and would be responsible for meeting sudden calls of the fire-brigade type, leaving the 3rd division to concentrate on the requirements for reinforcing the British Army on the Rhine. The Times' comment on this reorganization was that whereas requirements in Europe were for mechanized forces, with armour and heavy artillery, elsewhere the need was for lightly equipped, air-transportable forces trained in internal security and guerrilla warfare. The requirements were mutually exclusive. "The Central Strategic Reserve is now to be asked to organize and train for both tasks with the obvious danger that it will be properly prepared for neither..." (Times, Aug 18, 21, 25, Dec 28)

The mobility of the small British reserve depended mainly on the RAF Transport Command. Its strength was as follows: 10 Comets, 23 Britannias, 60 Hastings, and 50 Beverleys. (In the Kuwait operation these resources were fully committed; see above.) Transport Command had on order 5 Comets 4C and 56 Argosy tactical transports; 5 Vickers VC-10 jets were also to be ordered. (Times, Sept 6)

The commando carrier Bulwark, commissioned in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 101), played a major role in the Kuwait operations (see above). A second commando carrier, Albion, was due to be commissioned in 1962, and consequently a fifth Royal Marine commando was to be formed. The First Lord of the Admiralty stated that this decision had to be regarded as a recognition of the need to keep a highly trained mobile force in readiness, particularly in the area East of Suez. (Times, May 19, 24)

SOVIET MILITARY POWER IN THE ME

Russian Air Power in the Balkans. US military leaders considered that Soviet air facilities in the Balkan countries were a threat to vital western defence positions, declared the Chief of Staff of the US Air Force. In these countries there existed a well developed and modern base system, suitable for employment by Soviet offensive aircraft and missile forces. The location of this area made these facilities extremely important as forward strike bases threatening western key centres. (Times, Feb 20)

Soviet Naval Movements in the Mediterranean. On May 26, owing to the deterioration of Russian-Albanian relations, eight Soviet submarines left their base at the Albanian port of Valona and returned to the Soviet Union. The submarine pens that the Russians maintained at Valona—"the only symbol of Soviet power in the Mediterranean area"—were apparently abandoned. (NYT, July 6)

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE COUNTRIES OF THE MIDDLE EAST

INTER-ARAB RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS: MAJOR DEVELOPMENTS

The year 1961 witnessed three clearly defined periods in inter-Arab relations. The détente which had begun in the course of 1960 became more pronounced in the first half of 1961. This period was brought to an abrupt end in the second half of June when Gen. Qasim put forward Iraq's claims to sovereignty over Kuwait; the next three months were dominated by this issue. The break-up of the UAR on September 28 opened a third period and a new chapter in the relations between the Arab countries.

During the first six months, a number of Arab League conferences took place, beginning with the Baghdad conference of foreign ministers which was followed by a number of bodies which it had been impossible to convene previously or which had been inactive for a long time.

None of these conferences led to actual inter-Arab cooperation. The basic conflict between the UAR and the majority of the other Arab countries remained unresolved. The UAR leadership made it quite clear all through this period that it continued to strive towards the establishment of an Arab union, with a regime after its own pattern and under its leadership, and that it saw in the Arab peoples—in contrast to their leaders—willing partners in this endeavour. There were, however, no reports or specific charges during this period, as there had been previously, that the UAR was engaged in revolutionary and subversive efforts to overthrow unsympathetic regimes in other Arab countries; whereas in his letters to King Hussein, Abdel Nasser reiterated the UAR's aims and policies, he also said he believed in the right of every Arab country to a policy suited to its own circumstances. All other Arab governments continued to advocate a policy of "Arab solidarity"—namely cooperation of independent states within the framework of the League and otherwise and non-interference in one another's affairs.

The dispute also encompassed the nature of the internal regime ("Arab socialism versus reaction"), the international orientation, and the Arab-Israeli conflict—the major question before the League since its inception. As to international orientation, the question was one of anti-imperialism and "positive neutralism" versus various shades of cooperation of certain countries with the West and, on Jordan's part, anti-Communism as the main plank in foreign policy. Jordan, Lebanon, Libya and Tunisia were rejected by the UAR as candidates for the Belgrade conference of non-aligned nations on the grounds that they followed the policies of the West; Tunisia, however, was invited in the wake of the Bizerta crisis. As to the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Arab countries were agreed that it should be solved through the elimination of Israel, but they differed deeply on the means to this end. Whereas Abdel Nasser said an "independent and comprehensive Arab force" was needed, King Hussein would be content with inter-Arab coordination (see: The UAR-Jordan; the Abdel Nasser-Hussein correspondence) and Qasim continued to argue that the burden must be borne primarily by the former Palestinian Arabs themselves.

The Baghdad conference (January 30–February 4) was the first League Council meeting since 1958 to be attended by all League members. It was, to some extent, an endeavour by the protagonists of "Arab solidarity" to further their aim and to bring the UAR into cooperation with them on their terms. The way had been paved for such an attempt by Iraq's return to the League at the Shtura meeting (MER 1960, p 120) and the rapprochement of Iraq and Jordan in 1960 and it was to this end that these two countries now expended much effort towards bringing Tunisia back into the fold. They were aided by developments in the Arab-Israeli conflict—the issue of Israeli nuclear capacity and the progress of the Israeli project to utilize part of the Jordan river waters—which aroused Arab concern and, it was argued, made solidarity imperative. No controversial issue was discussed at the conference, it was noted, and the resolutions passed had been accepted in principle by all members in advance. While in Iraq and Jordan the conference was praised as an achievement of Arab solidarity, Cairo sources called on the Arab masses not to be misled by advocates of the doctrine of "non-interference in internal affairs," as every Arab had the right to criticize and even try to change certain situations according to his nationalist conscience; the real Arab solidarity was that of the people; cooperation through the League did not mean that the UAR should limit her commitments to the Arab struggle—and the Baghdad conference had changed nothing.

There was, however, a transient change, in the wake of the conference, in UAR-Jordan relations. King Hussein, while still being accused of promoting terrorist activities in Syria, wrote to President Abdel Nasser calling for Arab solidarity on the basis of equality. Correspondence followed in which the two leaders set out their differences as to inter-Arab, international and internal policies but agreed, for the time being, to disagree. The propaganda warfare between the two countries ceased and an uneasy truce followed. UAR relations with Tunisia, on the other hand, remained openly strained, though representatives of the two countries at Baghdad had reached a measure of agreement on co-existence. President Bourguiba was the only Arab leader during the ensuing period to attack Abdel Nasser openly and was denounced in turn.

With the above exception, however, the atmosphere which prevailed in inter-Arab relations in the period February-June was the quietest since the beginning of 1957. It was preserved by convening inter-Arab bodies but refraining from either discussing at all or deferring matters of contention. Thus the committee of the directors of "Palestinian machineries" (February 11-16) and the Palestinian Experts' Committee (May 29-June 7), which both met for the first time, dealt with the "Palestinian Entity" scheme (which had been sponsored by the UAR but opposed by Jordan as calculated to bring about her dismemberment). The Arab Defence Council (June 10-18), which met for the first time since 1954, dealt similarly with the questions of the Jordan waters (again a matter of controversy between the UAR and Jordan), a unified military command and other matters. A special committee on amending the League Charter (June 15) eliminated from its report all points of controversy. The Economic Council which found Iraq and the UAR at loggerheads—the UAR advocating economic union and Iraq cooperation only—also referred the matter to the League Council. The Council meeting at ministerial level, to which most of these issues were referred, and which was due to be held in Casablanca in September, never took place, since inter-Arab relations had meanwhile been disrupted by the Kuwait crisis.

The oil-rich Shaykhdom of Kuwait became formally independent on June 19, with an exchange of notes terminating the 1899 agreement between Britain and the Shaykh of Kuwait. Six days later, on June 25, Gen. Qassim, the Iraqi PM, proclaimed Kuwait an integral part of Iraq on historic-legal as well as anti-imperialist grounds, and stated that he intended to "liberate" it. With the exception of Ibn Saud's wars in the Arabian peninsula, this was the first time since Arab political entities emerged in the wake of World War I that one Arab state laid claim to sovereignty over another sovereign state, be it even tiny and newly independent. It was thought that, apart from considerations of internal policy, Qassim's motives might have been a wish to forestall possible UAR and Saudi Arabian encroachments as well as to gain, by means of an "anti-imperialist" feat, a leading position in the Arab world which had hitherto escaped his reach.

With various degrees of emphasis, differing arguments and, it was thought, differing motives, all Arab countries supported Kuwait's independence. Saudi Arabia immediately offered Kuwait her support, and claimed that Kuwait and Saudi Arabia were one country; her stand was attributed to rivalry with Iraq over oil resources and in the Persian Gulf in general. The UAR differentiated between a "genuine Arab union" which she advocated, and "annexation" which she could not accept; observers thought that her attitude might have derived from rivalry with Baghdad for Arab leadership and oil. Jordan was careful not to give offence to Iraq, expressing fear for the precariously-balanced Arab solidarity. Tunisia proclaimed the right to self-determination.

On July 1, after reports appeared on Iraqi troop concentrations—which were denied by Iraq—British and Saudi Arabian troops entered Kuwait, at the request of the Kuwaiti government. Thus it happened—it was generally remarked—that troops of a foreign power led by Arab nationalists to be the imperialist power par excellence were called on to Arab soil by an Arab government because of an inter-Arab conflict. Cairo accused Qassim of having brought this about and even of collusion with Britain. The question now became one of the Arabs being able to replace the British force in safeguarding Kuwait. Britain herself officially welcomed action by the League. (For a synopsis including the non-Arab aspects of the crisis, see below: The Kuwait Crisis.) There followed two-and-a-half months of inter-Arab manoeuvring, in which the League SG was especially active, around two main questions: (1) the admittance of Kuwait to the League, categorically demanded by Saudi Arabia and vehemently opposed by Iraq; (2) Kuwait's demand that an Arab force be set up to relieve the British troops and protect her independence. Alternatively, it was suggested that Qassim renounce his claim; he, however, reiterated it.

Kuwait was admitted to the League at the Council meeting of July 20 whereupon Iraq declared that she would boycott all League meetings in which Kuwait was represented. Discussions on the establishment of an Arab force started immediately after the Council meeting; however, the first Arab contingent arrived in Kuwait only seven weeks later, on September 10. The force consisted of contingents from Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tunisia and the UAR and, by mid-September, comprised some 3,000 men; it was under the dual control of the League and the participating countries, and had a Saudi Arabian commander-in-chief. All British forces had withdrawn by October 10.

The Kuwait crisis, though it isolated Iraq, did not in fact terminate the period of "Arab solidarity." While showing up anew the depth of inter-Arab dissensions, it also produced, in the Arab force, an example of actual cooperation between the UAR and her antagonists in the framework of the League, even though it took a long time to accomplish. At the same time, all the countries which advocated "Arab solidarity," except Saudi Arabia, were careful to avoid giving offence to Iraq as much as the situation allowed, and direct relations between them and Iraq did not in fact deteriorate.

Another outcome of the crisis was that Kuwait, in return for the Arab support, made arrangements for the utilization of some of her plentiful oil revenues to aid the development of the "have-not" Arab countries; support for such a move was also voiced in the West, and it was thought that by sharing their oil wealth the Gulf shaykhdoms might preserve peace in their area.

The Bizerta crisis in mid-July—when French and Tunisian forces engaged in battle following President Bourguiba's demand for evacuation of the Bizerta naval base, brought forth a show of solidarity by all Arab countries in the midst of the Kuwait crisis. It also occasioned at long last a truce between Tunisia and the UAR. UAR support for Bourguiba, Abdel Nasser said, was based on the famous old Arab saying "my brother and I against the foreigner" in spite of the quarrels of yesterday (the first part of this saying goes: "I against my brother"). All Arab countries offered assistance including volunteers; there were no reports that volunteers actually reached Tunisia but some financial and medical assistance did.

The Arab force in Kuwait had not yet settled down when the break-up of the UAR opened a new chapter in inter-Arab relations, relegating the Kuwait crisis to the sidelines. The Syrian military coup d'état of September 28 ended the first experiment of a voluntary union of two independent Arab states; it had lasted three years and seven months. (The other such experiment, the Arab Federation between the Hashimite Kingdoms of Iraq and Jordan, set up on February 14, 1958 as a countermove to the establishment of the UAR, was terminated after five months by the Iraqi revolution.)

The insurgent army officers made it clear from the beginning that they were revolting against what they termed "tyrannic Egyptian rule" over Syria as well as against the "socialist laws" imposed during the year. During the day, in negotiations with Field Marshal Amer, it was reported, they demanded the rescinding of these laws and the conversion of the union into a federation in which Syria would have equal status with Egypt. Abdel Nasser, however, resolved that, in his words, "the situation allow[ed] for no bargaining or a middle-of-the-road solution." He refused to condone a situation whereby a form of union would be preserved but actual control of Syria would have passed from his hands into that of the insurgents. He ordered the dispatch of forces from Egypt by air and sea, to land in the Aleppo-Latakia area which, during the day, was still controlled by pro-UAR commanders. When in the late evening these areas came under the control of the insurgents, Abdel Nasser recalled the forces to avoid a situation, as Cairo explained, where Arabs would be fighting each other while their enemies, Zionism and imperialism, lay in wait; in addition, a shooting war would only have deepened the rift. Some 120 paratroopers landed before receiving orders to return; they surrendered the next morning. On the morning of September 29 the Syrian Arab Republic was established. Egypt retained the name of the United Arab Republic.

Arab government reactions on the day of the coup were generally non-committal, due partly to uncertainty as to the aims of the leaders of the coup and its outcome. This, however, changed the next day, when Jordan recognized Syria's independence; King Hussein extolled the coup d'état as a "blessed upsurge" and vilified Abdel Nasser whom only a short time before he had addressed as his brother in Arabism. The Iraq government, during the following days, made clear its sympathies with Syria. Bourguiba praised Abdel Nasser for his orders to avoid bloodshed but also told him that Arab unity should be founded on the consent of the people. All other governments remained either publicly non-committal or expressed sympathy with the UAR; Morocco and Sudan were conspicuous among the latter.

On October 1 Abdel Nasser instituted a diplomatic blockade of Syria by cutting off relations with Jordan and Turkey, which had recognized the new republic on September 29. On October 5, however, he called off the blockade because, he said, it was the Syrian people which would suffer from it; he called for internal unity in Syria but said the UAR itself would withhold recognition until after the Syrian people had freely decided on the road it would take.

Iraq and Tunisia accorded recognition to Syria on October 9; Saudi Arabia—on October 10; Lihya—on October 19; Yemen—on October 25; Lebanon—on November 8; Morocco—on December 16. Sudan had not yet accorded recognition by the end of the year. Syria was admitted to the Arab League on October 28.

There was relatively little reflection in the speeches of the Arab leaders and in publicists' comments of the significance of the union's failure in the historical context of the Arab quest for unity versus Arab divisions. Gen. Qassim remarked that Arab as other empires had always been doomed to failure; he therefore advocated fraternal links between the Arabs (p. 165 a). Arab comment in the main wished to see in the failure a lesson from which to learn for a new attempt. (For detailed analyses of the causes of the failure, see pp. 605-7, 617 ff.)

The political impact of the event was manifold. The powerful and aggressive nucleus of a potential all-Arab union had ceased to exist. Iraq, Jordan and Lebanon now had as their neighbour a weak Syria in place of a strong UAR. Syria, which before the union had been torn between rival factions and was the prime objective in the contest for hegemony between Egypt on the one hand and Iraq and Jordan on the other, might now possibly be returned to this traditional role. Abdel Nasser had lost his foothold in the fertile crescent and, it was generally assumed at the time, had been most gravely weakened. Soon, however, it was once more Abdel Nasser who was giving direction to the inter-Arab struggle.

Two weeks after the secession, Syria presented a project for a loose Arab confederation. The plan was thought to have been prompted by internal political considerations. Cairo's reaction was hostile, that of Iraq and Jordan non-committal, and soon the issue faded out. At the beginning of November, Syria and Iraq concluded an economic agreement which they proclaimed as the initiation of "real Arab solidarity." Otherwise, there was no move by the countries opposed to Abdel Nasser to strengthen their position. In Syria, the government strove to stabilize the regime. Iraq was preoccupied with the Kurdish revolt and the Kuwait crisis, which still estranged her from Saudi Arabia. King Hussein felt himself much strengthened and his policies justified—"my confidence in myself is growing," he declared (p. 146)—and he waged an all-out propaganda campaign against Cairo, but he made no attempt to rally anti-UAR forces.

In the UAR, on the other hand, a sense of direction was soon felt. It appeared from remarks by President Abdel Nasser and by publicists that the Egyptians felt "bitterness and pain" and disappointment at Egypt's Arab venture and there was a desire that Egypt should now keep to herself. Egypt's Arab consciousness which, it was pointed out, had not yet grown very strong, had now suffered a severe shock. Abdel Nasser, however, immediately told his people that Egypt would continue to adhere to Arabism and to lead the Arab struggle. Abdel Nasser resolved on a new policy, in keeping with the main conclusion he had drawn from the Syrian coup, namely, that it had been engineered by "reaction" which had allied itself with imperialism with a view to undoing the revolutionary socialist achievements. He resolved, therefore, "to fight imperialism in the palaces of reaction"; the mistake of compromising with reaction on grounds of national policy would not be repeated. Socialism, this doctrine was further developed, must precede the union, as reaction could otherwise exploit "local chauvinism" in order to strike at the union. Therefore, said Abdel Nasser in a speech on December 23, the UAR was raising the banner of socialism in the Arab world. In this struggle, Abdel Nasser's chief spokesman explained, Egypt would act in a two-fold role: as a state on the formal level and as a revolution on the popular level, cooperating with the struggling people everywhere in the Arab nation; preference would be given to the revolutionary role. (At the beginning of 1962, this doctrine was finally termed "unity of aim before unity of ranks.") Initiative, however, in the inter-Arab struggle which followed the Syrian secession, was by no means one-sided.

The new Syrian leaders showed no more willingness to come to terms with Abdel Nasser than he with them. While Cairo attacked them as "capitalist reactionaries and imperialist lackeys" and asserted that the people in Syria were pro-UAR and opposed the "separatist regime," the Syrians denounced Abdel Nasser and expressed the hope that the Egyptian people would also be able to "free" itself of his rule. Syria charged Cairo with launching a subversive campaign against it from Lebanese territory. Contacts between the two states were kept to the bare minimum, such as were necessitated by the repatriations which were effected indirectly through Lebanon and through the good offices of the Arab League. Cairo did not recognize Syria even after the elections and clearly did not accept the "separatist regime" as there to stay.

King Hussein, as has been related above, was the first to break the truce with Abdel Nasser. Cairo soon accused him of having plotted to destroy the UAR even while he was corresponding with Abdel Nasser.

In the case of Saudi Arabia, however, it was Cairo which, towards the end of October, opened the attack by accusing King Saud of participation in plots in Syria, and Saudi Arabia's endeavour to preserve her former peaceful relations with Cairo proved futile.

Again, it was Imam Ahmad who made the first step to change his relationship with Cairo who he published a poem in December attacking the nationalization policy; two weeks later, the UAR announced the dissolution of the United Arab States federation between the UAR and Yemen, which had been formally established in March 1958 but never actually implemented.

UAR relations with Iraq remained strained. Cairo viewed with hostility the development of friendly relations between Iraq and Syria, claiming that Qasim intended to draw Syria into a union with Iraq. Qasim was severely criticized also on other counts; however, no all-out propaganda campaign was conducted against him as was the case with the countries mentioned above.

The Lebanese government endeavoured to pursue a policy of neutrality but both internal and external factors repeatedly involved her in inter-Arab conflicts; in particular, her territory was utilized as a base for subversive activities against Syria, by Jordan before the secession and afterwards by Cairo, according to Syrian charges (see pp 141, 163-4).

The remaining Arab countries were less involved in the conflict.

Sudan kept out of inter-Arab affairs and identified herself primarily with African nationalism; at the same time, she was careful to promote friendly relations with her powerful Arab neighbour, the UAR.

The Gulf sheikhdoms strove to develop friendly relations with all Arab countries.

The Algerian Provisional Government, though in the political field it was closest to the UAR, received financial and other aid from most of the Arab countries. As in 1960, it was not very satisfied with the practical (as opposed to the verbal) political support it received.

Morocco, though it came close to Cairo through co-operation in the Casablanca group (see pp 48 ff), also further developed friendly relations with the UAR's opponents.

By the end of the year, the UAR was isolated among the Arab countries of the Middle East but took the offensive, even more so than before the Syrian break-away, on the oft-repeated assumption that in her revolutionary policies of anti-imperialism, quest for union, and "Arab socialism" she truly represented the universal aspirations of the Arab people. Each of the other Arab ME countries was primarily occupied with its own affairs, and though they were opposed to Abdel Nasser's aspirations, they took no steps towards concerted action. The Arab League was boycotted by Iraq while the UAR was "prepared to freeze its effectiveness" if it were to impede her movement (p 161 b). The UAR also withdrew its contingent from the Arab force in Kuwait.

THE LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES

(jāmi'at ad-duwal al-arabiyyah)

MEMBERSHIP

Kuwait Admitted. On July 20 the State of Kuwait, which had become formally independent on June 19, was admitted to League membership by a majority vote at the Council's meeting in Cairo. It was the eleventh member (compare MER 1960, p 123). (Arab Obs., July 23; see also below: The Kuwait Crisis.)

Syria Admitted. Following the break-up of the UAR, and the re-establishment of Syrian independence, the Republic of Syria was readmitted to the League on Oct 28, becoming its twelfth member. (Egypt retained the name of UAR.) (Hayat, Oct 29)

THE LEAGUE SECRETARIAT

Special Activities of League SG: (See: The Kuwait Crisis; Relations Between Syria and the UAR.) Abd al-Halîq Hassûnah, an Egyptian, continued to hold the post of Secretary-General.

Arab League Office in New Delhi. Dr Clovis G. Maksûd was appointed head of the League's office in New Delhi.

In April he was said to have reported to the League SG on the activities of the office, the sympathy of the Indian authorities, and the encouragement of PM Nehru. (Hayat, April 5)

Assistant SG. In March at its 35th ordinary session, the Arab League Council swore in Dr Sayyid Nawfal as assistant SG of the League. (Hayat, Eg. Gaz., March 21)

GENERAL ACTIVITIES 1961

The Council of the Arab League met six times during the year.

(1) An extraordinary Council meeting to the form of a conference of Arab foreign ministers took place in Baghdad from Jan 30 to Feb 4. This meeting had been resolved upon by the Arab foreign ministers' conference at Shura in Aug 1960. Tunisia rejoined the Council at this meeting.

(2) The 35th ordinary session took place in Cairo from March 21 to April 1 at the level of ambassadors.

(3) An extraordinary meeting at the level of ambassadors took place in Cairo, from July 4-20, to deal with the Kuwait crisis. Kuwait was admitted at this meeting and consequently Iraq boycotted the council meeting from this session on.

(4) An extraordinary meeting at the level of ambassadors took place in Cairo on July 24, to deal with the Bizerta crisis.

(5) The 36th ordinary session took place in Cairo on Sept 14-19, at the level of ambassadors. The session was originally to be held at Casablanca on Sept 9, at ministerial level; the change was thought to have been due to the Kuwait crisis.

(6) An extraordinary meeting in Cairo on Oct 28 admitted Syria to the League.

The Joint Defence Council held its third session on June 10-18 in Cairo. (The second session took place in Jan 1954.)

The Economic Council met twice during the year, in April in Baghdad and in June in Damascus.

For other conferences, see text.

THE LEAGUE BUDGET 1961/62

The draft budget of the Arab League for the fiscal year beginning July 1961 totalled £1,125,000, of which £623,000 was to be spent on Arab propaganda abroad. (R. Baghdad, March 8 [W 16])

In Jan it was reported that Iraq had promised to pay its debt of £750,000 to the League. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Jan 14)

Yemen requested the reduction of its share in the League's budget which, it was reported, it had not paid since 1947 (Ruz al-Yusuf, Feb 20). In Sept its contribution was reduced from 2.2% to 1.1% of the budget. (Mid. Mir., Sept 23)

Kuwait's contribution was fixed at 13% of the budget. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 19)

LEAGUE CHARTER REVISION ISSUE

NOTE: For English text of Charter see: J.C. Hurewitz: Diplomacy in the Near and Middle East, Van Nostrand, Princeton, 1956, Vol II, pp 245 ff.

Baghdad Conference Calls for Meeting of Special Committee. One of the resolutions adopted by the Arab foreign ministers' conference in Baghdad on Feb 4 invited the special committee for amending the League Charter to meet at a date to be fixed by the SG. [The Council had requested a meeting of this committee as far back as Sept 1959; see MER 1960, pp 123-4.] (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6])

The Tunisian FM said on the eve of the Baghdad conference that his country advocated amending the Charter, as did others, but there would have been no need for this, if Art. 8 of the Charter, stipulating non-interference in member-states' internal affairs, had been properly observed. (R. Amman, Jan 26-IMB, Jan 27)

A Jordanian paper commented that amending the Charter would solve nothing; the Baghdad conference should rather discuss the behaviour of Arab leaders. (Manar, Feb 2)

Meeting of the Special Committee: Proposed Amendment. The special committee met on June 1 in Cairo. All member-states were represented. Previously, the secretariat had submitted a memorandum to member-states, pointing out that Art. 19 of the Charter provided that the Charter could be amended by a two-thirds majority and containing the following suggestions (compare MER 1960, p 123):

(1) Amending Art. 8: to make resolutions binding by majority vote instead of unanimity on all member-states, whose constitutions should be amended so as to make League resolutions binding and to ensure their being put into effect.

(2) Establishment of an Arab People's League (jāmi'ah arabīyah sha'biyah), alongside the existing League, to represent parliaments, organizations, trade unions and other "people's institutions" in the Arab states. This League, Cairo papers said, would be free to act without the restrictions which obstructed the present League's activities and would rally the Arab popular forces to work for the unification of the Arab nation. This League "would be more responsive to events" than the present League. The memorandum left open the question of the election of League members as well as the implementation of its decisions. This proposal, the Arab Observer said, had been under consideration since 1955.

(3) Establishment of an Arab Court of Justice for the trial of member-states which fail to comply with the League's resolutions or deviate from the general Arab policy approved by the League; the Court would be empowered to impose economic sanctions or other punishments. The Court was specifically mentioned in Art. 19 of the Charter as an amendment which might be introduced.

(4) A Syrian proposal made in 1948 for preventing member-states from conducting negotiations with any foreign country for military or economic pacts without prior approval of the League Council.

(5) A later Syrian proposal to set up a "United Arab States" as a nucleus for a "complete Arab union."

(6) Proposals made by three members in connection with the functions of the League SG and his assistants.

(7) Regulations for cooperation between the League and the UN as well as other international bodies. (Hayat, May 4; Haqā'iq, May 5; Arab Observer, May 7; Eg. Mail, May 27)

The committee received proposals for amendments also from Morocco, Iraq and Tunisia. (Hayat, June 2, 4)

The chairman explained that the committee's function was to prepare a report on the various proposals and observations relating to the revision issue, to be submitted to the foreign ministers' conference scheduled to meet in Casablanca in Sept. (Hayat, June 8)

The Iraqi Plan, which, according to the Iraqi representative, served as the basis for the discussions, included the following main points:

(1) League membership should be open to every independent Arab state without the need for a Council resolution; (2) the Council should be granted an "obligatory legal right" to settle differences between member-states—at the request of any member of the League—by peaceful means, including resort to the Arab Court of Justice which should be established; (3) the Council should be summoned if aggression against any member occurred or seemed imminent and would decide by a two-thirds majority on measures to counter the aggression; (4) abolition of the unanimity principle in favour of the majority principle in adopting Council resolutions; (5) a ban on the conclusion by Arab states of agreements or treaties inconsistent with the Charter; (6) the Council should meet in rotation in the various member-countries; (7) the Council should meet for one session a year; (8) League secretariat personnel should be selected according to personal qualifications; (9) no member should be allowed to quit the League.

The Iraqi representative added that the commission had "agreed" to proposal no. 2 [including 3] but proposals 4, 5 and 9 had met with opposition. The commission tended to favour proposals 6, 7 and 8 [all of?] which had also been proposed by Tunisia. (R. Baghdad, June 20 [22], IMB, June 21)

ple's League,—see above.] The head of the UAR delegation, Dr Muhammad Hasan az-Zayāt, said his country viewed the issue in the light of Art. 19 of the Charter, which said that any amendment should aim at the promotion of closer relations among Arab countries. He cited UAR achievements and efforts in this respect, such as the merger between Egypt and Syria, the union with Yemen, its adherence to the Arab Mutual Defence Pact and its advocacy of Arab economic union. (Arab Observer, June 11)

Binding Majority Vote Opposed. Before the meeting, a Cairo source said Lebanon was the only state to oppose a binding majority vote instead of the present system (Eg. Mail, June 27). But according to other sources, this proposal was opposed also by others as being inappropriate at the present time. (Akhbar al-Ubū', Jordan, July 14); Jordan and Yemen were specifically mentioned in this context. (MENA, June 7 [9])

Proposals Dropped to Move League HQ From Cairo. Question of Venue of Council Meetings. One of the reported Tunisian proposals, supported by Iraq and Jordan, was to move the League HQ from Cairo. The UAR representative later said that the sponsors of this proposal had withdrawn it, and it would not be submitted to the League Council. (MENA, June 10 [13]; Hayat, June 15; Akhbar al-Ubū', July 14)

A related question concerned the venue of the League Council. A Cairo paper remarked that Art. 10 provided that Cairo was the permanent seat of the League while the Council could assemble wherever it chose; it was therefore incomprehensible why some countries should wish to amend this Article. (Ruz al-Yusuf, June 5)

Tunisian Proposal for Non-Interference Reported Rejected. A Tunisian proposal regarding interference by Arab League members in each other's affairs (according to Al-Hayat, regarding the definition of aggression) was rejected. (MENA, June 10 [13]; Hayat, June 15)

Two Amendments Agreed Upon. According to Al-Hayat, the committee agreed to two amendments, authorizing the SG to convene the Council in cases of emergency and setting up an Arab Court of Justice. (Hayat, June 15)

On June 15 the committee completed its work after having prepared a report to be submitted to the conference of Arab foreign ministers scheduled to be held in Casablanca in Sept [which did not take place]. (R. Cairo, June 15 [17])

Iraqi Call for Reform of League. In Oct the Baghdad Al-Bayān called for a reform of the League which had fallen under the influence of one country. The article attacked the SG for serving unilateral interests. In order to fulfil the hopes of the Arab people, the basis of the League Charter should be modified. (Iraq Times, Oct 8, quoting Bayan, Oct 3)

THE ARAB LEAGUE AND AFRICA

[The subject of Africa featured in most Arab League conferences and other inter-Arab meetings. Discussions mainly centred around ways and means of combating Israeli "infiltration" into the continent. Most decisions did not advance beyond the recommendation stage. (For details, see index.) One exception was a tour of West Africa by a delegation representing the Arab chambers of commerce and industry.]

Offices To Be Opened in Africa. The Permanent Arab Information Committee, at its meeting in Cairo (Feb 18-23), recommended to the League Council to open an information office in Accra, provided that this did not impede the setting-up of such an office in Dakar, as proposed by Iraq. (MENA, Feb 23 [25]; Eg. Gaz., Feb 24)

In Dec it was reported that a League request for permission to open an office in Accra had been approved by Ghana. (Akhbar Sa'ah, Dec 20)

Projected Technical Assistance. The League was reported to be planning the dispatch of Arab aviation experts as well as doctors and youth instructors to work in Ghana for the purpose of combating Israeli penetration. (Manar, May 21)

In Sept a Lebanese report said the Arab states had decided to grant 500 scholarships to youths from Africa and Asia (Nahar, Sept 16). [By the end of 1961, there were no reports of League assistance to Africa or any concerted Arab effort in this sphere.]

Economic Mission. Between July 18 and Aug 15 an economic delegation representing the chambers of commerce and industry of Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia and the UAR, the Arab League Secretariat and the Federation of Arab Chambers of Commerce, toured eight West African countries: Nigeria, Ghana, the Ivory Coast, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Guinea, Senegal and Mali. The aims of the tour were given as: (a) to strengthen commercial relations and to open new markets for Arab products; (b) to put an end to Israeli activities in Africa and to explain the Palestine problem. (Mawt, May 25; Jihad, July 16, 19; MENA, July 15 [W 20]; The Listener, Monrovia, Aug 2; Mid. Afr., Aug 19)

The decision on the tour had been taken during the board meeting of the Federation of Arab Chambers of Commerce, held in Beirut in Nov 1960 (see MER 1960, p 125). The delegation was headed by Burhān Dajāni, an officer of the federation.

[The delegation had meetings with ministers, officials and chambers of commerce.] In Guinea they were received by President Sekou Touré, who was quoted to have said that lack of unity among Arabs and among Africans was the reason for lack of solutions to the problems of Palestine and Algeria. He added that it was necessary that goods from Arab states should reach Guinea directly. (Hayat, Aug 9; Palestine, Aug 16)

African press reports emphasised the anti-Israeli character and purpose of the delegation's tour (Nigerian Tribune; Daily Times, Lagos, July 20) and there was some criticism on this score (e.g. Nigerian Tribune, July 21; Liberian Age, Aug 11; Abidjan-Matin quoted in West Africa, London, Aug 19)

The Arab press quoted members of the delegation on the great success of the tour and its impact on Afro-Arab relations to the detriment of Israeli activity in the continent.

The delegation found that the Arab communities in West Africa played an important part in the economy of those countries and would be of great help in advancing Afro-Arab economic relations.

The UAR (Southern Region) member of the delegation said that the delegation had recommended the following Arab activities in Africa: (a) invitations to African heads of state and ministers to visit the Arab states; (b) the offer of loans; (c) the holding of permanent commercial exhibitions; (d) the setting up of firms, banks and shipping lines; (e) the offer of a larger number of scholarships; (f) the strengthening of relations at governmental level and (g) the dispatch to Africa of experts, doctors and teachers. (Akhbar Sa'ah, Aug 23; Ahram, Aug 26)

Burhan Dajani, head of the delegation, added further recommendations which were all to be forwarded to the Conference of Arab Chambers of Commerce due to be convened in Casablanca. He said the League should initiate a joint Arab-African building and contracting company, and Arab petroleum-producing countries should set up refineries in African countries and export their oil to those countries. (Hayat, Sept 3; Zaman, Iraq, Sept 13; Jaridah, Sept 15)

A Beirut daily reported that African diplomatic representatives had expressed dissatisfaction at Dajani's report, complaining that it contained inaccuracies and "certain briefings in favour of UAR policy in Africa." (Nehar, Nov 22)

THE ARAB LEAGUE COUNCIL

NOTE: No official reports on the Council proceedings were published except for the agreed resolutions, and its deliberations were mostly secret.

EXTRAORDINARY SESSION: CONFERENCE OF ARAB FOREIGN MINISTERS IN BAGHDAD

(January 30-February 4)

Date, Place, Participants. A League conference of Arab foreign ministers was held in Baghdad from Jan 30 to Feb 4. This was the first League Council meeting in Baghdad, and the first meeting since 1958 at which all members were represented. (Zaman, Jan 30-Feb 5)

The conference had been scheduled by the Arab foreign ministers in Shura to take place immediately after the fifteenth session of the UN General Assembly (see MER 1960, p 130).

On Iraqi insistence, the League Secretariat agreed to hold the conference in Baghdad instead of in Cairo, thus fulfilling an Iraqi demand, pending since summer 1959, to have such a conference take place in its capital. (Zaman, Jan 6, 7; Hayat, Jan 7; R. Cairo, Jan 4-IMB, Jan 5)

The foreign ministers of Iraq, the UAR, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia (as of Jan 31), Libya, Sudan and Yemen, and the Deputy PM of Morocco participated as full members. The Foreign Minister of the Algerian Provisional Government, the brother of the exiled Imam Ghālib Ibn Ali of Oman, and representatives of the Palestine Arab Higher Committee attended some of the meetings as observers. (Zaman, Jan 31-Feb 5)

The Political Setting. [As set out in MER 1960 (see: Synopsis, pp 115-6), an improvement had been apparent in the inter-Arab atmosphere towards the end of 1960, based on the realignment of the majority of the Arab countries in favour of "Arab solidarity" as opposed to Arab union favoured by the UAR. Nonetheless, throughout the conference, propaganda warfare continued between the UAR on the one hand and Jordan and Tunisia on the other.]

UAR Bid for "Union of Arab Peoples" Versus Demand for "Arab Solidarity." The basic divergence between the governments of the UAR and the other Arab countries was analyzed in two articles on the eve of the conference and after its conclusion by Al-Hayat's well known political commentator, writing under the pseudonym of "Arab Elder Statesman" (shaykh arabi qadim).

President Abdel Nasser, he wrote, advocated an appeal to the Arab countries to unite with the UAR or at least to coordinate their international and social policies with her. The UAR supported revolutionary movements in the Arab countries and regarded the Arab League as an instrument for executing her policies. According to this doctrine, the UAR was truly representative of the feelings and aspirations of the Arabs everywhere and denied the right of the Arab governments to represent the citizens of the respective countries, considering them the obstacle to complete Arab unity. Consequently UAR propaganda denounced Arab governments and at the same time glorified the Arab peoples.

In contrast, a doctrine propounded by Iraq and Jordan and enjoying the sympathy of Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia and Libya argued that the true way to Arab union lay through the gradual evolution of Arab society, through Arab solidarity freely arrived at, and through cooperation within the Arab League. Non-interference in each other's internal affairs must be observed. According to this theory, the real obstacles in the way of a full union were not to be found in the Arab governments but in internal factors, deeply-rooted in the various Arab countries and their peoples, which could not be changed simply by changing governments or regimes.

[This analysis was borne out by the behaviour of the two opposing camps during the conference and their comments upon it after its conclusion, as will be seen below.]

The writer concluded that Arab leaders could meet, but results would be nil so long as they adhered to their diametrically opposed attitudes. The writer thought that the period in which President Abdel Nasser's doctrine of Arab nationalism was predominant had ended and the balance had tilted in favour of the other doctrine, namely cooperation and coordination of policy within the League. The writer thought that the efforts to conciliate Tunisia fitted into the policy of Iraq and Jordan, designed to form a strong group which would take the initiative within the League, and if necessary oppose the efforts of the UAR. (Hayat, Jan 29, Feb 12)

No Prospects Seen For Effective Anti-UAR Grouping. Before, during and after the conference, intimations appeared of an anti-UAR grouping. A Lebanese commentator thought that Iraq, in order to embarrass the UAR, might urge the adoption of decisive resolutions on the Palestine question and Arab solidarity, but a common front on Arab solidarity, presented by Iraq, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, could not bear fruit so long as President Abdel Nasser dominated Syria and conducted a policy of conciliating Arab rulers and stirring up Arab public opinion at one and the same time. Further, Iraq, Jordan and Saudi Arabia were not agreed on the Palestine question: e.g. Iraq advocated the establishment of a "Palestine Republic," which Jordan opposed. The author concluded that Iraq would not succeed in setting up a "permanent, effective and worthwhile anti-UAR front."

Amman Radio attributed Cairo's indifference to the conference [the UAR mass media gave it only scant coverage] to its knowledge "that the conference will not bring it any positive results." (R. Amman, Jan 31 [Feb 2])

On Feb 4 Dr Mahmūd Fawzi, the UAR FM, said in a press conference in Baghdad that there had been "trends" at the conference but it was inaccurate to call them groupings. (Zaman, Hayat, Feb 5)

After the conference, a Cairo daily said that extensive efforts had been made to isolate the UAR and place her in an embarrassing position, but the UAR delegation had successfully counteracted these efforts. (Akhbar, Feb 10)

The choice of Baghdad as the meeting place was also seen in the context of the anti-UAR struggle. Amman Radio claimed that it was indicative of "a victory for the Arab group (majmū'ah) in its long struggle against Cairo's misconduct," compelling Cairo to abandon its illusions of leadership, and was a step towards the implementation of the principle of equality among the Arab states (R. Amman, Jan 30-31 [Feb 1]). UAR stations did not comment on this topic (BBCM, IMB, IMH). After the conference, a Cairo daily wrote that "certain Arab states believed that proposing and choosing Baghdad would embarrass the UAR, but it did not." (Akhbar, Feb 10)

Tunisia's Participation Through Iraqi Mediation. On Jan 6 the League secretariat officially requested Iraq to exercise its influence in reversing a Tunisian decision to boycott the conference. [Tunisia had been boycotting the League since 1958, immediately after becoming a member, because of its strained relations with the UAR—see MER 1960, pp 126-31, 164-3.] (Zaman; Hayat, Jan 6-8)

On Jan 18 the Iraqi Minister of the Interior left for Tunisia, carrying a message from Gen. Qassim to President Bourguiba asking for Tunisian participation in the conference in the name of Arab and Islamic solidarity (Zaman, Jan 18, 21). King Hussein sent a message to Bourguiba to the same effect (Jihad, Jan 25). President Bourguiba's reply was brought to Baghdad by the Foreign Minister, Sadok al-Moqaddem. (Zaman, Jan 25; Hayat, Jan 27-29). It reportedly included the following points: (a) no dispute existed between Tunisia and the League; (b) Tunisia's boycott of the League stemmed from its strained relations with the UAR; (c) if Tunisia participated in the meeting, her representative would raise her complaints against the UAR; (d) Tunisia wished to obtain an assurance from the UAR that the latter was ready to settle the dispute. (Hayat, Jan 25)

It was reported that efforts, mainly Lebanese, were under way to persuade the UAR to consider the Tunisian request. (Hayat, Jan 26)

On Jan 30 Baghdad announced that Tunisia would participate in the conference (R. Baghdad, Jan 30-IMB, Jan 31). On Jan 31 the Tunisian delegation headed by the Foreign Minister arrived in Baghdad. (Zaman, Jan 31-Feb 1)

Iraq's mediation efforts were hailed by the Iraqi press and radio. Jordanian and some Lebanese papers praised the "Arabic orientation of the Tunisian leaders," while the UAR press disregarded the whole matter. (Zaman; Raq Times; Hayat; Jaridah; Amal; L'Orient; Jihad; Falastin, Jan 18-29; BBCM, IMB, Jan 18-30)

When the conference was in session, a Cairo commentator said that the real reason for President Bourguiba's decision was his wish "to tone down severe resolutions that the conference might take against France" (V of A, Feb 4-IMB, Feb 5), while after the conference a Lebanese [pro-UAR] daily wrote that Bourguiba's intention was to play "the role of an imperialist agent" in the solution of the Algerian question. (Hawadith, Feb 10)

The Economist thought that Tunisia's return to the League was due to President Bourguiba's frustration in trying to formulate policies calculated to appeal to all Africans and Arabs. "Without some footing in the League, he found himself at a dead end." (Economist, Feb 4)

The Agenda. On Jan 30 SG Abd al-Khālīq Hassūnah announced that the agenda, as approved in secret session, included the Algerian question, the "Palestine Question" (for sub-headings of which see below: Resolutions), the Omani question at the UN, the amendment of the League Charter, the Casablanca conference, Mauritania, "Southern Yemen," nomination of representatives of Arab countries to UN posts and the need to acquaint the world with Arab progress, Arab nationalism and Arab questions in general. (Zaman; Hayat, Jan 31; R. Baghdad, Jan 30-Feb 1 [Jan 31-Feb 2]; Jāmi'at ad-dūwal al-arabiyyah: Taqrir al-amin al-amm ila majlis jāmi'at ad-dūwal al-arabiyyah fi dawr in-'iqdiki al-iddi al-khāmis wa-ath-thalāth, March 31, 1961—The Arab League: Report of the SG of the Arab League to the Arab League Council Ordinary 35th Session, March 31, 1961, pp 62-70; further referred to as Report of the SG)

Following the opening ceremony, the conference went into secret session, on which Al-Haydi's correspondent, Salim Habāqi, reported as follows:

Tunisia-UAR Dispute. The first secret session on Jan 30 dealt with the Tunisian-UAR dispute without the participation of the Tunisian delegation, which had not yet arrived. According to Habāqi, "the atmosphere was rather tense." The UAR delegate voiced reservations regarding the Tunisian demands, but Hashim Jawād, the Iraqi FM, intervened, urging the member-states to forget their grudges and to present a united front in face of Israeli atomic threats. Other delegates presented similar arguments and consequently it was resolved to invite the Tunisian delegation to take its place at the conference, to call on the UAR and Tunisia to settle their disputes and to ask some of the ministers to mediate (Hayat, Jan 31, Feb 1). Following a dinner which Jawād gave at his home for the foreign ministers of the UAR and Tunisia and a prolonged discussion with the participation of SG Hassūnah, the two parties agreed to "annul the minutes of the Arab League Session of Oct 18, 1958" [wherein Tunisia accused the UAR of subversion, and subsequently withdrew] and to hold additional private meetings between the two ministers. (Zaman, Feb 1-2; Hayat, Feb 2)

The Tunisian FM told the press that a settlement had been agreed upon on the basis of the Shura conference resolution on Arab solidarity, namely that relations among Arab states should be based on mutual respect and equality, that an end be put to propaganda campaigns and that political refugees be prevented from carrying out activities liable to disturb inter-Arab relations (R. Baghdad, Feb 5 [7]). An agreement was also reported whereby Sālah ben Yūsuf (President Bourguiba's major political antagonist) who was then touring West Germany, would not return to Cairo [where he lived in exile]. (Hayat, Feb 7)

The Algerian Question was discussed in three prolonged secret sessions on the basis of a memorandum submitted by Krim Belkacem, FM of the APG (Zaman, Feb 2). Sharp differences arose over certain proposals by Morocco and the UAR. (For details, see pp 174 b, 175.)

The "Palestine Question." Emile Ghuri, representative of the Arab Higher Committee, asked the member-states to establish the "Palestinian Entity," set up a "Palestinian Army" and stop by force any Israeli attempt to divert the River Jordan.

In the secret discussion, it was reported, the various items concerning the "Palestine question" were discussed as a whole, following an Iraqi proposal seconded by the UAR. (Zaman, Feb 1-4; Hayat, Feb 2-3)

Resolutions. On Feb 4 the conference unanimously approved a 16-point resolution. The official communiqué enumerated the various items and on most of them merely stated that appropriate plans or decisions had been approved. (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6]; Zaman; Hayat; Jaridah, Feb 5; MEA, April 1961; Report of the SG)

A summary of the official communiqué, together with some unofficial remarks, are given herewith:

1. The Algerian Question: (See special heading.)
2. The Palestine Question in the UN. It was reported that the ministers had unanimously decided to charge the UN with responsibility for the refugee problem, to work for the appointment of a custodian for "Arab properties" in Israel and for the enlargement of the Palestine Conciliation Commission (Akhbar al-Yaum, March 18). (This line had already been adopted at the 15th UN General Assembly and was further pursued at the sixteenth session.)

3. Diversion of the River Jordan: The conference approved plans for opposing Israel's work in diverting the waters of the River Jordan (for details, see p 218).

4. "Israel's Attempt to Produce the Atomic Bomb": Plans were approved for counter-action (see also p 223 a).

5. Iran-Israel Relations: It was decided to continue efforts with the Iranian authorities "so that the latter may truly respect relations with the Arab countries when dealing with Israel."

6. Cyprus-Israel Relations: Member-states having diplomatic representatives in Cyprus would watch Israel's activities there and report to the SG.

7. Israeli Activity in Africa: The issue was referred for detailed study by the Palestinian Machinery Committee.

8. Plans for advancing the Omani cause at the UN were approved.

9. Mauritania: The conference approved, over Tunisia's objection, a Moroccan proposal that member-states should make further efforts to prevent the admission of Mauritania to the UN.

10. Amending the League Charter: The Committee for Amending the Charter was invited to meet at a date to be fixed by the SG.

11-14. Nomination of Arab Members to International Organizations: The conference decided to support various Arab nominees to international organizations, among them Mongi Slim of Tunisia, for the presidency of the UN General Assembly's 16th session.

15. Casablanca Resolutions: The member-states which had not participated in the Casablanca conference were requested to consider its resolutions. (One country, not named, voted on this resolution with a reservation.)

16. The "Southern Yemen" Question was referred to "the next meeting" of the Council. (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6]; Zaman; Hayat; Jaridah, Feb 5; MEA, April 1961)

Arah Solidarity, Stopping Inter-Arab Propaganda Campaigns. Though these issues were not on the agenda, the conference dealt with them following a telegram from the Imam of Yemen, who called on the member-states to stop mutual "radio and press campaigns" in order to strengthen Arab solidarity and pave the way for an Arab summit conference. The SG reminded the participants of the Shtura conference resolution on this subject (see MER 1960, p 130) and urged the member-states to behave accordingly. (Zaman, Feb 1-3; Hayat, Feb 2, 3, 5)

Jordanian political circles were quoted to the effect that for Jordan it was of the utmost importance that member-states should pledge themselves fully to respect Art. 8 of the League Charter providing for non-interference in the internal affairs of other member-states. (Falastin, Feb 2)

During the conference, Gen. Qassim received the various delegations (R. Baghdad, Jan 31-Feb 3-IMB, Feb 1-4). Al-Hayat reported that he discussed the possibility of a summit conference to prepare "a general Arab plan that will push Arab nationalism forward," but indicated that before such a meeting could take place, a sincere effort should be made to settle disputes and to stop press and radio campaigns between the Arab countries. (Hayat, Feb 2)

On Feb 5, the day after the conclusion of the conference, King Hussein ordered the Jordanian radio and press to refrain from answering attacks by "certain Arab countries" in response to the wish expressed at the Baghdad conference and with the "desire to clear the Arab atmosphere" (R. Amman, Feb 5 [7]). This move was highly praised by Jordanian and Lebanese papers. (Hayat, Feb 5; BBCM; IMB, Feb 5-8; Jaridah, Feb 5-6; Jihad; Difa, Feb 6-7)

On Feb 6 the Damascus and Cairo stations stopped their special programmes on Jordan and attacks on Tunisia, but the Voice of the Arabs continued to attack Hussein in its general programme. (BBCM; IMB, Feb 7-10)

A Damascus daily commented that Arab solidarity could not be achieved by stopping radio warfare or by verbal rapprochement. Real Arab solidarity would find its expression in genuine cooperation in implementing the Baghdad resolutions, in free intercourse between the Arab people everywhere, in increased trade and in enabling the poor Arab countries to benefit from Arab natural resources. The paper concluded that the UAR sought the cooperation of all in achieving such genuine, and not merely superficial, solidarity. (Nasr, Feb 7)

Comment: The Arab Conflict Unresolved. Al-Hayat's "Arab Elder Statesman," whose analysis of the rift between the Arab countries has been quoted above, wrote after the conference that no controversial issue had been discussed and that the resolutions passed had been accepted in principle by all members in advance. The Arab League could not unite the Arab governments and the dispute between the Arab countries remained unresolved. (Hayat, Jan 29, Feb 12). [For similar comment see Hayat, Feb 5, 7; Nahar, Feb 2, 5; Amal, Feb 4, 6; Times, Feb 6.]

Iraq and Jordan: The Conference A Success. Arab Solidarity Stressed. Both the Jordanian and Iraqi radio and press covered the conference extensively.

Iraqi sources stressed the part played by PM Qassim and FM Hashim Jawad in bringing about the "success of the conference and the achievement of Arab solidarity." (R. Baghdad, Jan 31-Feb 5 [Feb 1-7]; Akhbar; Mustaqbal; Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 1-5; Zaman, Feb 3; Ahali, Feb 3, 8, 10)

The Jordanian Al-Manar commented that the conference had helped to proclaim a fact long known, namely, that the majority of Arab countries denounced the policy of mutual recriminations and believed in Arab solidarity based on confidence, equality and non-interference. (Manar, Feb 5)

UAR Makes Clear Struggle Continues. [The UAR comment during and after the conference made it clear that no basic change had occurred in the inter-Arab situation.]

The UAR radio and press paid little attention to the proceedings of the conference. (BBCM; IMB; Ahram; Gumhuriyah; Akhbar, Jan 25-Feb 10; IMH, Feb 22)

During the conference, the Cairo radio stations intensified their campaign against Jordan, and to a lesser extent against President Bourguiba. (BBCM; IMB, Jan 31-Feb 6; IMH, Feb 22)

On Feb 5, after the conference, Cairo radio recalled that the Shura conference had adopted unanimous resolutions on the very questions dealt with by the Baghdad conference, but they were immediately floated for a common Arab struggle was not in the interest of agents who depended on foreign support. This could be also the fate of the Baghdad resolutions. (R. Cairo, Feb 5 [7])

The Cairo Ruz al-Yusuf came out against those advocating "non-interference in the internal affairs of the other Arab countries," and called on the Arab masses not to be misled by this phrase. While there was much justification for non-interference in the regime, government, constitution, elections, etc. of other countries there were many issues which could not be regarded as an "internal affair" of this or that country, such as the attitude to the questions of the Arab refugees, Palestine, Algeria or imperialist bases on Arab territory. These matters were highly important to every Arab anywhere and he had the full right to comment, criticize, and even try to change certain situations according to his nationalist conscience. The argument of "non-interference" was employed by certain Arab leaders to cover up dangerous intentions, which might eventually lead to the isolation of their countries from the Arab world, but this trick used by the agents and the hirelings could not hinder the holy march of Arab nationalism. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Feb 6)

Mubammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram [and an unofficial spokesman for President Abdel Nasser], wrote that nothing new had occurred in Baghdad because the basic factors defining relations among the Arab governments had not changed. For instance, the only point of disagreement between the UAR and King Hussein was imperialism. The UAR was at war with imperialism, but to King Hussein imperialism meant his throne, and to imperialism Jordan was a base. "The result is that the UAR and His Hashimite Majesty cannot but be themselves and defend their existence and future."

Arab solidarity, Haykal said, had existed before the Baghdad conference. "The real Arab solidarity is that of the people: it is the rulers who differ about progress." About the Arab League, Haykal said that it should be supported but not asked to do the impossible. "Cooperation through the Arab League does not mean that the UAR should freeze its commitments to the Arab struggle for the sake of reaching unanimous agreement." (Ahram, Feb 10)

THIRTY-FIFTH ORDINARY COUNCIL SESSION

(March 21-April 1)

On March 21 the 35th ordinary session of the Arab League Council opened at the League headquarters in Cairo, at ambassadorial level. All member-states took part. Representatives of the Algerian Provisional Government (APG) and the "All-Palestine Government" participated in some of the meetings. (Hayat; Eg. Gaz., March 22-28)

The meetings were secret as usual. The Council heard the SG's report on developments in the Arab world since the last Council session. (Eg. Gaz.; Hayat, March 21-22; Report of the SG)

Resolutions. The Council unanimously passed resolutions endorsing the recommendations of the committee of the heads of the "Palestine Machineries" (with some alterations—see below: The "Palestine Question"); supporting the APG's stand in the negotiations with France; approving recommendations for the nomination of Arab and other candidates to membership or posts in international organizations; approving the report of the Office for the Boycott of Israel, and endorsing the Economic Council's recommendations on the boycott [at its seventh session—see MER 1960, pp 139, 187]; approving the recommendations of the Permanent Information Commission; urging member-states to settle their outstanding contributions to the League information offices overseas (the Sudanese and Yemeni delegates voiced their reservations); requesting the Defence Council to reconsider at its next session a "powerful, practical policy towards Israel" and towards the states aiding it; deciding to implement the Arab Collective Security Pact and inviting all Arab states to join it; deciding to request Arab delegations at the UN to frustrate, together with friendly nations, colonialist attempts to enforce a unilateral settlement of the Palestine issue. According to Al-Hayat, the Council had passed certain "confidential resolutions on the relations of Iran and Malaya with Israel."

On some subjects on the agenda, no resolutions were reported, e.g.: "Israel's recruiting of Jewish youth in western countries to serve Zionist ambitions"; formation of an Arab union for ex-servicemen and war-victims; social and cultural affairs; administrative, financial and legal matters; the budget of the "All-Palestine Government" for 1961-62; and the establishment of a permanent technical office for Arab unity affairs. (Eg. Gaz.; Ahram; Hayat, March 22, April 2)

EXTRAORDINARY SESSION ADMITS KUWAIT TO LEAGUE

(July 4-20)

Between July 4-20, the League Council in extraordinary session dealt with the Kuwait crisis. On July 20 the Council decided unanimously, with Iraq absent, to admit Kuwait to the League. Iraq protested and announced that it would boycott all League meetings at which Kuwait was represented. (Zaman, July 20-21; see also: the Kuwait Crisis)

EXTRAORDINARY MEETING ON BIZERTA CRISIS

(July 24)

On July 24 an extraordinary session of the League Council took place in Cairo to discuss "French aggression against Tunisia." Iraq did not participate since

THE JOINT DEFENCE COUNCIL

Kuwait was represented at the meeting (Ahram, July 25). The Council passed resolutions supporting the Tunisian stand. (Eg. Gaz.; Hayat, July 25; see also: Tunisia and the Arab countries of the ME)

36TH ORDINARY COUNCIL SESSION

(September 14-19)

The session took place in Cairo at ambassadorial level. Members of ten Arab states took part. Iraq boycotted the meeting since Kuwait participated. (Hayat; Eg. Gaz., Sept 15)

Change of Venue, Level and Date. The session had originally been scheduled to take place in Casablanca on Sept 9, with the participation of foreign and economic ministers (Hayat, Aug 5; Ahram, Aug 16), and it had been expected to pass resolutions on important economic issues referred to it from the June session of the Economic Council, especially the issue of Arab economic union. (Akhbar al-Yaum, June 28; Ahram, June 30; Hayat, July 14; Jihad, July 2)

Early in Sept Jordan requested the postponement of the meeting, because of its preoccupation with the forthcoming elections. The SG announced that the foreign ministers would meet in New York while attending the UN General Assembly. (ANA, Sept 3 [5]; Eg. Gaz., Sept 11)

Al-Hayat commented that this change was a consequence of the Kuwait crisis which had paralyzed the League. The general idea prevailing in Cairo was "not to charge the League with anything important, so that it may rest and let others rest." (Hayat, Sept 12)

Resolutions Adopted. On Sept 19 the Council passed resolutions calling on the Arab countries to coordinate their stands at the 16th session of the UN General Assembly; referring Oman's application for membership in the League to the next meeting of the foreign ministers; calling for contributions in support of the Omani national struggle; recommending to the Arab states the recognition of the Republic of Chad and other newly independent states in Africa; recommending the postponement of Arab recognition of the Republic of South Africa [following the withdrawal of the Union of South Africa from the Commonwealth and its reconstitution as the Republic of South Africa on May 31]; urging member-states to support the resolutions passed by the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Nations concerning Arab issues and world peace (Libya expressed its reservations as it had not participated in the conference); approving nominations of Arab countries to membership of executive bodies of international organizations; and recommending measures for collecting contributions for an Arab information fund. The Council also passed resolutions on Algeria and the "Palestine question" (see relevant headings). (Hayat; Eg. Gaz., Sept 20)

According to MENA, the Council and its subcommittees also passed resolutions concerning the preparation of documentary films on the Arab countries, the holding of Arab trade fairs, the establishment of ex-servicemen's associations and of a special section for Palestine in the Higher Institute for Arab Studies. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 18; MENA, Sept 19 [21])

THE JOINT DEFENCE COUNCIL

(April-June)

Background Note. [The Joint Defence Council was established under the Treaty for Joint Defence and Economic Cooperation which was approved by the League Council on April 13, 1950, and came into force on Aug 23, 1952. The treaty, also known as the Collective Security Pact (mu'ahadat ad-difa' al-muhtarak), provided for an automatic collective security system. Member-states undertook to aid the attacked state by all means, including armed force, "immediately, individually and collectively." The treaty also provided for consultations and joint defence measures in case of threat of war, for the coordination of the armed forces and the preparation of collective means of defence. To implement these measures, the treaty established a Joint Defence Council, consisting of the foreign and defence ministers of the member-states, assisted by a permanent military commission consisting of representatives of the general staffs. Decisions taken by a two-thirds majority of the Council were to be binding on all members. By supplementary protocol signed in Feb 1951, a consultative military organization (hay'ah istishariyah askariyah) was formed, consisting of the chiefs of staff, to supervise the permanent military commission and to report to the Council.

The treaty was originally sponsored by Egypt as a counter-move against an Iraqi-Syrian union. During 1953-54 the Council and commission were fairly active in efforts to secure military coordination and cooperation. However, with the intensification of the inter-Arab con-flikt from the end of 1954, these institutions ceased to function.

The Joint Defence Council met only twice before 1961, in Sept 1953 and Jan 1954.

In 1961 the following were signatories to the treaty: Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco (joined in June), Saudi Arabia, the UAR (Egypt and Syria) and Yemen.]

Sixth Conference of the Military Organization. This committee met in Cairo from April 22-26, following a resolution of the League foreign ministers' conference at Baghdad. The conference was attended by the chiefs of staff of the states signatory to the Collective Security Pact. Representatives of Morocco, Libya and Sudan attended as observers; Tunisia was not represented. Gen. Ali Amer, the UAR CGS, presided.

The conference, it was reported, was to formulate concerted Arab plans to counteract Israel aggression, with special reference to Israeli atomic capacity. (Hayat, April 5; Ahram, April 22-26)

No official statement was issued regarding the subjects discussed. It was reported that discussion took place on a plan to set up a unified Arab army, to deal with Israel. (Kul-Shay, April 8, 22)

Al-Hayat disclosed that the conference had recommended the establishment of an atomic research department at the Arab League secretariat and urged diplomatic measures to prevent an Israeli military parade in Jerusalem (for which, see pp 214-5; Hayat, April 22-26). The possibilities of acquiring non-conventional weapons (R. Cairo, April 22-IMB, April 23) and standardizing military ranks in the Arab armies were also discussed. (Masa, April 26)

An official spokesman stated that the conference had been most successful and complete agreement had been reached. The resolutions would be submitted to the Joint Defence Council (Ahram, April 27). [No resolutions were published.]

The Joint Defence Council (June 10-18). On June 10, the third conference of the Joint Defence Council opened in Cairo with the participation of the foreign and defence ministers, and the chiefs of staff of Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, the UAR and Yemen. Libya, Morocco and Sudan were represented by observers (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., June 10-11). Tunisia did not participate.

The agenda reportedly included the following items: the drawing-up of a unified military plan to prevent Israel's diversion of the Jordan River as well as a plan to frustrate the conspiracies of countries supporting Israel at the UN; the proper implementation of the Collective Security Pact and the desirability of the adherence of additional Arab countries to the pact; Israeli atomic research; the Palestinian Entity and army; the recommendations of the Arab consultative military organization (see above) and of the Palestine Experts' Committee (see below: The "Palestine Question" (Eg. Gaz., June 10; Hayat, June 10-11))

The Council's proceedings were officially kept secret. Salim Habāqī, Al-Hayāt's special correspondent, reported that an atmosphere of sincere cooperation prevailed. First, the whole development of the Palestine question since 1947 was reviewed. The Council then analyzed Israel's intentions and concluded that the best way to frustrate Israel aggression was by reactivating the "Collective Security Pact." (Hayat, June 14, 20; Ahram, June 15)

At the fifth session, the Council divided into two groups. The defence ministers, with the military experts, discussed ways and means of implementing the pact, including the setting-up of a unified command, the nationality of the C-in-C (according to para. 5 of the Military Annex to the Treaty, he should belong to the country with more forces in the field than any of the other states—unless he were elected in another manner) and various military questions arising out of a unification of command. (Jaridah; Ahram, June 13-16; Hayat, June 13-20)

The foreign ministers, on the other hand, discussed the political aspects of the Palestine question, the activities of the Palestine Conciliation Commission; Israel's work on the diversion of the Jordan river; Israeli atomic research, Jewish immigration and the settlement of the Negev; President Kennedy's messages to Arab heads of states, and questions connected with the forthcoming session of the UN General Assembly (Gumhuriyah, June 11-16; Hayat, June 13-17, 20; R. Cairo, June 11-16;

R. Amman, June 11-17-IMB, June 12-18). The Palestinian Entity was not discussed. (Falastin, June 20)

Decisions Deferred. On June 15, the Council discussed the military recommendations, but according to Al-Hayāt, "at this stage, signs of disagreement became apparent. Some Arab countries expressed reservations and asked to be given enough time to study the various proposals, in the light of their territorial position and their means" (Hayat, June 16, 20). Consequently, the conference resolved to refer the political questions to the next meeting of the League Council and the military ones to "a special meeting to be convened within a few months." It also resolved to consider the Tripartite Declaration invalid. (Hayat, June 18-24; Falastin, June 21, 24)

The Cairo press reported that the Council had unanimously agreed to appoint an Egyptian officer as C-in-C of the Arab armies (Ahram; Gumhuriyah; Akhbar, June 17-18). Hashim Jawād, Iraqi FM, stated that Iraq did not object to a UAR commander, provided the UAR furnished most of the men and equipment. (ANA, June 19 [21])

An official statement said that the Council had unanimously passed resolutions "ensuring the common Arab interest and upholding Arab solidarity in all fields of activity" and referred to the adherence of Morocco (see below) to the pact as a "success." (Hayat; Eg. Gaz., June 19)

Morocco Adheres to Treaty. During the conference on June 13, Morocco joined the Joint Defence Treaty (Hayat, June 14, 19). The representatives of Libya and Sudan expressed their countries' full support of the Arab cause and readiness to provide assistance in case of aggression [but they did not join the treaty]. (Hayat, June 13-14)

Comment—"Council a Failure." Al-Hayāt commented that "the Arabs everywhere are accustomed to reading without the slightest enthusiasm about the League resolutions, for they are sure that they will remain paper decisions," and added that the delegates who passed the resolutions could not oblige their governments to implement them. (Hayat, June 20)

A western correspondent, writing from Beirut, said: "Public opinion in the Arab world, which had been led to expect some clear-cut decisions on the questions of policy towards Israel, appears to be confused by this familiar tactic, (of issuing a vague communiqué on the Council) and confusion is already being compounded by contradictory statements made about the conference by those who took part. These conflicting statements appear to confirm what is generally supposed—that the Defence Council meeting found Jordan and the UAR at cross purposes on measures to be taken to contain Israel, and in particular, to counter Israeli intentions to divert the river Jordan." (Glasgow Herald, June 20)

THE "PALESTINE QUESTION"

THE "PALESTINIAN ENTITY" AND THE "PALESTINIAN ARMY"

SYNOPSIS

As set out in MER 1960 (p 132), the projected establishment of a "Palestinian Entity" (PE) and a "Palestinian Army" lost much of its intensity as an issue in inter-Arab relations in the course of 1960, in the wake of the relative improvement in the inter-Arab atmosphere. The issue continued, however, to be a matter of inter-Arab controversy and no joint action was taken by the Arab countries to put into effect any proposal to organize the Arab refugees politically or militarily. This state of affairs continued throughout 1961.

During the first half of the year, while inter-Arab relations continued to improve, and a truce was established between the UAR, the major proponent of the PE scheme, and Jordan, its major opponent, there was some institutional progress on the inter-Arab plane. For the first time, meetings were held of the heads of the "Palestine machineries" of the Arab foreign ministries as well as of the Palestine Experts' Committee, but it was probably because they did not deal decisively with the PE question that meetings of these bodies could be held at all. With the deterioration of inter-Arab relations following the Kuwait crisis and the break-up of the UAR, no more was heard of these bodies during the rest of the year.

At the Arab League Council meetings, including the Arab foreign ministers' meeting in Baghdad (Jan 30-Feb 4), the issue of the PE was avoided.

Meanwhile, the UAR—in the Gaza strip and in Syria—and Iraq continued some efforts on their own to organize former Palestinians politically or militarily. Syria, however, after the break-up of the UAR, disbanded the "Palestinian National Union" which had been established there in 1960, and showed herself wary of the Arab refugees on her soil because of their pro-Nasser sentiments.

The "Arab Higher Committee," which had formerly enjoyed the protection of the UAR and lately had begun to cooperate with Iraq, now also started to cooperate with Jordan. Thus the committee's realignment had gone full circle, since Amin al-Husseini, its head, and the Hashimites had been arch-enemies for some 40 years (compare MER 1960, p 133: Jordan Denies Existence of Arab Higher Committee); Saudi Arabian contributions to the committee were also reported to have been resumed. In the UAR, on the other hand, the disbanding of all independent Palestinian organizations was advocated on the ground that they had done disservice to the cause.

While thus there was no progress at all in giving substance to a "Palestinian Entity," representing the "Palestinian people," the Arab states at the UN and elsewhere endeavoured to further this cause by portraying it as a struggle of the "Palestinian people" on the Algerian pattern (see: The Arab Refugees).

VIEWS AND POLICIES

The "Entity" Plan. A UAR source said that the plan adopted by the Arab foreign ministers in 1959 (see MER 1960, p 132), and which met with Jordanian obstruction, comprised the following points: (1) A national assembly, representing all Palestinian Arabs, whether refugees or not, would be elected under the supervision of the League secretariat. (2-3) The assembly would meet every year. At its first meeting, it would formulate a constitution which would incorporate an Arab nationalist charter for the liberation of Palestine in cooperation with the Arab countries. It would formulate its internal regulations. (4) The assembly, at its first session, would elect a ten-man executive council with specific portfolios and a president. (5) The executive council would represent the Palestinian Arabs internationally and in the Arab world; it would be responsible for policy on, and take part in the struggle for Palestine. Its headquarters would be in Cairo "in order to be near the League" and it would have a permanent delegation at the UN. (Akhbar al-Yawm, Dec 31, 1960)

Jordan: "Comprehensive Plan." On Jan 10 Musa Násir, the Jordanian FM, restated in the Jordanian Parliament what he said was "Jordanian public opinion" on the Palestine issue: The issue concerned all Arabs, and no Arab state must take unilateral action. The whole issue required deep and comprehensive study, on which action would be based. Meanwhile, no half-measure such as the PE project must be taken. (Jihad; Difa, Jan 11)

On Jan 17 the PE was debated in the Jordanian Senate and severely criticized; the Senate decided to shelve the issue. (Jihad, Jan 18)

Abdel Nasser: A Matter for All Arabs with UAR as Vanguard. In his only speech during the year addressed specifically to the Arab refugees (Damascus, March 3), Abdel Nasser made no mention of the PE or the "Palestinian army." (Compare also MER 1960, p 171, Synopsis.) He said the Palestine issue was not one which belonged to the "Palestinian people" alone but to all Arabs. "The restoration of our rights" in Palestine involved a struggle with imperialism and its stooges and with Zionism, the unification of the Arabs and the building-up of civil and military strength. The UAR was the vanguard in this struggle and in these efforts. (Nasser's Speeches, pp 74-7)

Iraq: Palestinians Urged to Selfreliance "Like Algerians." On Nov 2 Gen. Qasim, addressing a meeting organized by the Arab Higher Committee in Baghdad, urged the Palestinians to rely on themselves, not to listen to any promises, to unite their ranks; to refrain from quarrels and to shoulder their own burden like "the Algerian heroes." "Following the line of sisterly Algeria, you have to proclaim to the entire world the existence of your structure [entity]..." he said. He called on them to prepare for the battle "to clear your holy land of the Zionists and the treacherous elements and for the proclamation of the immortal Palestine republic." He promised Iraq's help in "the liberation battle." (Iraq Times, Nov 3)

Independent Syria Warns Palestinians Against UAR. On Nov 28 Dr Izzat an-Nus, the Syrian FM, said in a public speech that Syria had always placed the Palestine question above Arab differences and would continue to sponsor the Palestinians' struggle. He urged the Palestinians to direct their energies "in collaboration with the whole Arab nation to liberate Palestine." He accused "the self-styled advocates of Arabism" [the UAR leaders] of prejudicing the Palestine cause and of discriminating against the Palestinians as compared with their own people. He accused "a small group of Palestinians" of "blindly following those who wish evil on our country as they did on the Palestinians in the past." This group, he said, endeavored to split the refugees and distract their attention from their vital problem. (R. Damascus, Nov 28 [30]; Ayyam, Nov 29)

CONFERENCE OF HEADS OF "PALESTINE MACHINERIES"

(mu'tamar ru'asā' ahjikat falastin)
(February–September)

[In Sept 1959 the Arab foreign ministers at their conference in Casablanca decided that the Arab governments should set up special "machineries" (jihāt) in their foreign ministries to handle and coordinate Palestinian affairs; see MER 1960, p 133.]

On Feb 11, the first meeting of the heads of these machineries opened in Cairo. All League member-states, except Tunisia, were represented. (Ahram, Feb 11–12)

Abd al-Khāliq Hassūnah, the League SG, announced that the conference would not discuss the Palestinian Entity; this would be done by a special committee [see below: The Palestine Experts Committee]. The purpose of the machineries conference was to work out "a perfect and positive policy" on the various aspects of the Palestine issue and Israeli plans and conspiracies, to follow Zionist activity abroad and to draw up plans to counteract it. (Akhbar, Cairo; Hayat, Arab Observer, Feb 12)

Resolutions: The Organizational Set-Up. On Feb 16 the conference passed the following resolutions:

"Palestine Machinery": Every Arab country should set up a "Palestine Machinery" attached to its foreign ministry and headed by an official of ambassadorial rank. This staff should comprise the following departments: (a) The Political Department, to study the political aspects of the Palestine problem; (b) "the Department for Occupied Palestine," to follow internal developments in "occupied Palestine" with special reference to the Arab minority and Arab properties there; (c) the Arab Refugees Department, to follow UNRWA activities and deal with problems arising between the Agency and the Arab governments; (d) the Department for Anti-Israel and Anti-Zionist Activities, with special reference to immigration, the combating of Israel's penetration into Africa and Asia and cooperation with the boycott offices; (e) the Military Affairs Department, to deal with armistice questions and follow "Israel's aggressive activities."

Duties of Heads of the Palestine Machineries. The heads of the Palestine Machineries should meet periodically for planning and coordination; the reorganization of the Palestine Department of the Arab League Secretariat should also be their concern. The League SG would convene the conference twice annually with the consent of the majority of the members; the SG or three members could call special meetings. The chairmanship would be held in rotation. The Palestine Department of the League Secretariat was to cooperate with the machineries, supply them with information, prepare the agenda for the directors' conference, supervise the implementation of its resolutions and report on the activities of the machineries to the League Council.

Activities: Other resolutions called on the directors to interest themselves in the implementation of resolutions on combating Israel activities in Asia and Africa; called on the League to strengthen its information agencies, in order better to serve the refugees' cause, and to cooperate with Arab communities in Latin America in combating Zionism; asked the League Secretariat to prepare a report on Arab properties in the "occupied land" and called on the Arab countries to work for the establishment of an international commission to investigate the conditions of the Arabs in "occupied Palestine." (Akhbar, Feb 17; Nida', al-Awdah, Gaza, Feb)

In March the League Council approved these recommendations, but its political committee decided that "the machineries should be headed by high officials" instead of by "ambassadors" as suggested by the conference. (Akhbar, March 26; Hayat, March 26, 28–30)

Second Meeting of Conference. On July 29 the second meeting of the conference opened in the Old City of Jerusalem with the participation of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the UAR, Lebanon, Sudan, Yemen and Morocco. Iraq, Tunisia and Libya were not represented. The Kuwaiti representative joined the conference on July 31. (Hayat, July 30; Jihad, Aug 1)

The agenda included reports on the activities of the machineries, "Zionist anti-Arab" activities, Israel penetration in Asia and Africa, Arab properties in Palestine, and Jewish immigration to Israel. (Jihad, July 30)

On Aug 1, the conference closed after adopting eight secret resolutions and deciding that the next session was to be held in Rabat. (R. Amman, Aug 1 [3]; Hayat, Aug 3)

It was reported that the conference had recommended that Arab women be used in propaganda for the Palestine cause; that Arab women's organizations strengthen relations with such organizations in Asia and Africa; and African and Asian women leaders be invited to visit the Arab countries; that broadcasts be made in African languages; that action be taken against Israel's efforts to obtain Jewish assets [the owners of which had perished at the hands of the Nazis] in Swiss banks (see p 316 b); that pressure be exercised on East European governments not to permit the immigration of their Jewish citizens to Israel; and that Arab propaganda be intensified. (Akhbar al-Yawm, Sept 16)

THE "PALESTINE EXPERTS COMMITTEE"

(lajnat khubarā' qādiyat falastin)
(May–June)

Background Note. [The convening of a five-man committee of "Palestine experts" to prepare a comprehensive Arab policy on the "Palestine question" had been decided upon by the League Council in Feb 1960, as the Council itself was deadlocked on the "Palestinian Entity" (PE) project and related issues. The establishment of the committee met with difficulties (see MER 1960, pp 127, 130, 134–5). With the relative improvement in inter-Arab relations, as exemplified by the Baghdad conference (Jan 30–Feb 4), it was found possible to convene the committee.]

Meeting in Cairo (May 29–June 7). On May 29 the Palestine Experts' Committee met in Cairo. The participants were League SG Abd al-Khāliq Hassūnah (chairman); Ahmad Shukairy, Saudi Arabian Minister of State for UN Affairs; Rafiq al-Husseini, Jordanian Minister of Economy; Fu'ad Amoun, Director-General of the Lebanese Foreign Ministry; Qāsim Hasan, Ambassador at the Iraqi Foreign Ministry; Mahmud Riyad, Political Adviser to President Abdel Nasser; Amin Hilmi, Director of the Palestine Department at the UAR Foreign Ministry; and Dr Nawfal, Assistant SG of the League. (Hayat; Eg. Gaz., May 30)

The Arab Higher Committee protested against the League's "deliberate policy" of excluding Palestinians from the discussions. It called on the participants to prepare an agreed Arab plan to save Palestine and to give substance to the PE. (Hayat, May 30)

No Agreement on Palestinian Entity. On the committee's deliberations which were not made public, Arab sources reported as follows:

(a) On Israel's diversion of the Jordan river, recommendations were forwarded to the Arab Defence Council scheduled to meet in June. (Eg. Gaz., May 30)

(b) Regarding President Kennedy's messages to Arab heads of states, (see p 197 h) the committee prepared "agreed points" to be embodied in the replies. (Ahram, May 31; Hayat, June 23)

(c) The preparation of a common Arab plan "for the frustration of potential Israel aggressions" and recommendations regarding "attacks on the armistice lines," were referred to the Arab Defence Council. (Eg. Gaz.; Ahram, June 1)

(d) Regarding the PE, the committee completed drafts to be submitted to the Arab Foreign Ministers at their next meeting. (Eg. Gaz., June 2) According to MENA, these drafts were designed to enable the Palestinian Arabs to play a part in "liberating and restoring Palestine." To do this, they would have to be strengthened financially, politically and morally. (Eg. Gaz., June 2)

It was reported that the Jordanian representative had opposed the establishment of the PE and related proposals. He maintained that Jordan represented the PE both by reason of geography and the number of Palestinian refugees on its soil. (Gumhuriyah, June 2; R. Beirut, June 4-IMB, June 5)

Assistant SG Dr Nawfal declared that the committee had prepared a plan to ensure the entity of the Palestinian people and to establish an organization (hay'ah) to represent them (Hayat, June 8). The Jordanian delegate declared that the committee resolutions were not binding on the governments represented. (R. Amman, June 7 [9])

Meeting in Bhamdun: No Plan on PE. (June 26-29) On June 26, the committee resumed its meetings in Bhamdun, Lebanon "to meet members of the Palestine people." The committee received delegations of the Arab Higher Committee, the Palestinian Women's Union and the Palestinian Arab Youth Organization. (Arab Observer, June 11; Hayat, June 27-29)

It was reported that the Arab Higher Committee had asked the committee to establish political machinery, to be approved and supported by all the Arab states, to represent the Arabs of Palestine. This body should have no bearing on the status quo on the Western Bank of the Kingdom of Jordan or the Gaza Strip. SG Hassunah objected to the word "only" when told by a member of the delegation that the Arab Higher Committee was the only body representing the Arab refugees. (ANA, June 29 [July 1])

According to Al-Hayati, the committee discussed the setting up of three alternative bodies to establish the PE: a provisional government, an organization which would become the official government at a later date, and a committee for the liberation of Palestine. Finally, on June 29, it was decided to refer the PE question to the League Council and the question of a Palestinian army to the Arab Defence Council. (Hayat, June 28, 30)

On June 29 there were conflicting statements by SG Hassunah and members of the committee as to whether or not the gathering should be considered as ended and as to the venue of the next session (ANA, June 29 [July 1]). [No additional session took place during the year.]

THE "PALESTINIAN ARMIES"

Iraq: "The Palestine Liberation Army" (see also MER 1960, pp 137-8). Twenty Palestinians were among the 575 graduates of the second reservists' [officers] course which graduated in Baghdad on April 30. Gen Qasim, addressing the graduates, pledged that Iraq would back the "force of Palestinian brothers" with money, arms and men "until the usurped parts of the homeland are liberated." (R. Baghdad, April 30 [May 2])

According to Baghdad radio, a daily programme entitled "Those Who Will Return" (al-e'idin) was prepared and presented by the "Palestinian Liberation Army" (PLA) under the supervision of the Iraqi 5th Division HQ. (R. Baghdad, May 15-IMB, May 16)

Haji Amin al-Husseini, head of the Arab Higher Committee, visited the PLA in July and was received by the GOC, 5th Div. (Zaman, July 9)

On Nov 15 the commander of the Iraqi Reserve [Officers] College disclosed that a new unit of the PLA would shortly join the college. (Zaman, Nov 16)

On Nov 17 Gen. Qasim issued instructions "to accept a large number of Palestinian students residing in sister Arab countries into the Iraqi military academies in order to train them as officers and leaders of the future Palestinian army." (Zaman, Nov 19)

Egypt and the Gaza Strip (see also MER 1960, p 138). On July 23, a symbolic "Palestine army" unit took part in the Egyptian revolution anniversary parade in Cairo. (R. Cairo, July 23 [W 27])

Lt-Gen. Yusuf al-Agrudi, governor of the Gaza Strip, disclosed in an interview published in Oct that "Palestine has now a real army which is undergoing intensive training in the most modern methods of warfare" and as a result "the general morale in the strip is very high." (Qunwat al-Musallahah, Oct 1)

THE ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE

(al-hay'ah al-arabiyyah al-ulya)

[For background on the Committee see MER 1960, p 132: Rift Between the UAR and Amin al-Husseini.]

The Committee's Policies. In Feb the Arab Higher Committee convened a congress in Beirut to discuss "the development of the Palestine problem during the last 13 years."

In addition to reaffirming "the Arab identity of Palestine" and calling on the Arab governments to coordinate their policies in combating Israel, the congress passed resolutions: (a) calling for the establishment of "responsible official machinery to deal with all matters connected with the Palestine issue" including the "mobilization of the Palestinian Arabs," while emphasizing that this should not involve the separation of the West Bank from the Jordanian Kingdom or the changing of the present status of the Gaza Strip; and (b) calling on Palestinians everywhere to refrain from involvement in party politics or other internal problems of the Arab countries. (Hayat, Feb 28)

The first of these resolutions was brought by the Arab Higher Committee before the League's Expert Committee on Palestine at its session in Beirut in June (see above). The second resolution found an echo on Nov 27 [on the eve of the Syrian general elections]. Zaki al-Tamimi, Director of the Committee in Damascus, urged the Palestinian refugees in Syria to avoid interference in Syrian domestic affairs. (Ayyam, Nov 28)

[Both resolutions were aimed at keeping the committee and its adherents out of inter-Arab rivalries. The reference to the West Bank of Jordan should be noted in the context of the rapprochement between King Hussein and the Committee, for which see below.]

Al-Hayat saw in these resolutions "a new start" on the part of the Palestinians to take their destiny in their own hands, and called on the Arab governments to give them the opportunity to work for their cause. (Hayat, March 2)

Various Activities. During March the Higher Committee sent missions to the UAR, Iraq and Jordan, "to explain the need for placing the Palestine question above internal or inter-Arab differences, and to urge them to place full financial and military support at the disposal of the Palestinian Arabs to continue their struggle to liberate Palestine." (Hayat, March 29)

In May Hajj Amin al-Husseini visited India. (Times of India, Bombay, May 16)

Cooperation with Iraq. In July Hajj Amin al-Husseini visited Baghdad as guest of the Iraqi government. He was received by Gen. Qasim among others and also visited the "Palestinian Liberation Army." On his return to Beirut, Hajj Amin declared that his mission to Iraq had been very successful. (Zaman, July 9; ANA, July 9 [11])

In Aug an office of the Arab Higher Committee was opened in Baghdad, headed by Ziyad al-Khatib. (Zaman, Aug 14, 28, Oct 15)

Cooperation with Jordan; Saudi Arabia. On Sept 16 Emile Ghuri, member of the Arab Higher Committee, was received for a two-hour talk by King Hussein. Ghuri told the press that he had received "constructive advice" from King Hussein on the solution of the Palestine problem and the coordination of Arab Higher Committee policy with that of the Jordanian government, especially at the UN General Assembly. (Falastin, Sept 17; Manar, Sept 17-18)

Subsequently [the pro-UAR] Beirut daily Al-Hawadith claimed that the rift between King Hussein and the Committee had ended with a private donation of £5,000 to the Committee from King Hussein, that the King was considering Amin al-Husseini for the premiership of Jordan, and that the Committee's relations with Saudi Arabia were back to normal and Saudi Arabian donations and support had been resumed. The Arab Higher Committee issued a "complete denial," adding that its relations with all Arab countries had always been excellent and there was nothing to prevent the Committee from accepting financial support. (Hayat, Sept 19)

A UAR Opinion Against Palestinian Organizations. In May Mamduh Rida of Ruz al-Yusuf called for the abolition of all Palestinian organizations working in the UAR, such as the Arab Higher Committee; the Palestine Club; the General Union of Palestinian Students, etc. Rida wrote that "since the Palestine catastrophe none of the above-mentioned organizations has made any positive or constructive contribution to the liberation of Palestine." On the contrary, they had so behaved as to undermine the holy cause. One of them had constantly collected contributions from all over the world "to distribute them amongst a small group of swindlers" [probably a reference to the Arab Higher Committee]. Rida suggested, "as many Palestinian students had asked," the setting up of the Palestinian National Union in Egypt, similar to that existing in the Gaza Strip and in Syria. (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 8)

THE "PALESTINIAN NATIONAL UNION" IN THE UAR

The PNU in The Gaza Strip and Syria. [Before the break-up of the UAR, the authorities continued efforts to organize the inhabitants of the Gaza Strip and the refugees in Syria in the Palestinian National Union (PNU) (see also MER 1960, p 136) claiming that thus they were implementing the PE. In independent Syria, the National Union was disbanded.]

In Jan the first [and last] elections to the PNU took place in the Gaza strip. Suffrage was open to men only. Three hundred and fifty-four candidates out of 935 were elected by 53,224 votes.

The Egyptian Military Governor of the Gaza strip expressed his admiration of the "electoral awareness amongst the Palestinians," and promised suffrage for women at the next elections. He said the final objective of the elections was to create a "free Palestinian public opinion," and to prepare the refugees for the "holy march" to liberate Palestine. (R. Cairo, Jan 16, V of A, Jan 20-IMB, Jan 17, 22)

INTER-ARAB ECONOMIC RELATIONS

THE ECONOMIC COUNCIL

THE QUESTION OF ECONOMIC INTEGRATION

Synopsis: The Council met twice during the year, in April and June, to complete discussion of the items on the agenda of the seventh session which held its first meeting in December 1960 (MER 1960, pp 138-9). On the central issue of Arab economic union, the session ended in deadlock over opposing projects presented by the UAR and Iraq. The UAR advocated a scheme of economic union (which it had first proposed in 1957), in keeping with its aim of establishing a comprehensive Arab union; Iraq proposed a gradual approach, starting with a multilateral commercial agreement, again in keeping with its general policy of inter-Arab cooperation instead of union. With the deterioration of inter-Arab relations following the Kuwait crisis—which broke out immediately after the Council meeting in June—and the disintegration of the UAR, the whole issue lost any shred of actuality.

Economic Council Meeting in Baghdad (April 10-17). The second meeting of the seventh session of the Council opened in Baghdad on April 10 at ministerial level. Delegations from the UAR, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Kuwait, Lebanon, Yemen, Iraq, Algeria, Sudan,

Libya and Tunisia participated (the last four were not members) (Zaman, April 11; Arab Observer, April 16). The Agenda contained several items which had been deferred from the Dec 1960 meeting in Cairo: completing the discussion on an economic unity scheme, including the creation of an Arab common market, the removal of restrictions on inter-Arab trade, ratification of agreements on the establishment of the Arab Financial Foundation and the formation of Arab oil pipeline, tankers and airline companies; the exemption of Arab companies and organizations from local nationality restrictions. (Hayat, March 2; Eg. Gaz., March 15; R. Baghdad, April 7-IMB April 8)

The Council resolved to set up the World Arab Airlines organization, with a capital of 17m. dinars, and the Arab oil tankers company, based on Kuwait, with a capital of 35m. dinars; to amend the Arab Financial Foundation agreement so as to exclude foreign capital and influence and to increase its capital to £25m. The Council decided to defer the other items on the agenda to its next meeting, to be held in two months' time. (R. Baghdad, April 17 [19]; R. Beirut, April 18-IMB, April 19; Mid. Mir., April 22; Arab Observer, April 23)

Economic Council Meeting in Damascus Ends in Deadlock Over Economic Union Scheme. (June 17-24) On June 17, the third meeting of the seventh session of the Council opened in Damascus with the participation of all member-states and non-member observers. The agenda contained the items left over from the previous meeting (Hayat, June 18) and, later on, "the possibility of Israel joining the European Common Market" was added to the agenda. (Eg. Gaz., June 21)

The UAR and Iraq presented opposing proposals on the question of Arab economic integration.

The UAR proposal, in the form of a draft 20-point agreement, called for complete economic union between the Arab countries by means of a customs union, unification of foreign trade policies, including joint trade agreements with other countries, and a large degree of co-ordination of their labour, fiscal and commercial legislation; a permanent body, the Union Council, with its head office in Cairo, would supervise the implementation of the agreement. An Arab common market, to be achieved within ten years, would be the main basis of this Arab economic union.

Iraq submitted a memorandum, in the form of a draft 15-point agreement, on ways and means of achieving an inter-Arab "complementary economy" and technical co-operation. The Iraqi proposal, allowing for differences in the economic structure and stages of development of the various Arab countries, sought to achieve economic co-ordination through the Economic Council itself. The EC was to be converted into an independent structure which would include a permanent committee of economists as well as a technical bureau. It would submit its suggestions and projects to the Arab states for consideration and implementation within the limits of their capabilities and their constitutional systems. A general secretariat for economic affairs would convene the EC when necessary, continuously supervise the work of the co-ordinating committee and the technical bureau and assist in implementing the Council's resolutions. The post of secretary should be filled in rotation by each Arab country for a three-year term. Under this proposal, the Arab common market would initially take the form of a multilateral commercial agreement providing for customs exemption from 25% to 100% on agreed lists of goods, which would be extended from time to time in accordance with the development of the Arab economies. These proposals were based on the principles incorporated in the 1958 trade, economic and technical cooperation agreements concluded between Iraq and the UAR.

The UAR opposed the Iraqi proposal. A UAR spokesman pointed out that already in 1957 the EC, with the participation of Iraq, had approved the UAR-proposed agreement for economic union; only Lebanon had expressed reservations. A detailed UAR note to the Council said that the advocates of the Iraqi proposal had "shown a studious wish to avoid unity." The difference in economic standards between the Arab countries, cited by Iraq as an underlying reason for its proposals, in fact strengthened the argument for economic integration which would raise income levels in all countries. The Iraqi delegation argued, the note went on, that the economically-developed countries would benefit at the expense of the backward countries; the UAR, however, was of the opinion that "it will be among the duties of economic unity to crystallize industrial potential in [the] various Arab countries." (Before the conference opened, Dr Fakhr al-Kayali, leader of the UAR delegation, said that the UAR paid no heed to rumours alleging that her attitude was dictated by reference to her future interests as an industrial state; her market would provide a guarantee for the success of industries in other Arab states, and in addition every country would be able to protect its products, if necessary.) Iraq also argued that the union council to be established under the economic union agreement was to have jurisdiction which would infringe on the sovereignty of member states; to this the UAR delegation commented that council decisions would require the approval of two-thirds of its members.

Shaykh Abdallah al-Tariqi, the Saudi Arabian Minister for Oil and Mineral Resources, announced his country's support of the UAR proposal. He remarked that the Iraqi proposal would entrust everything to an Economic Council, the decisions of which would not be binding on Arab countries.

The meeting concluded on June 24 without reaching an agreement on the issue. The delegates merely decided to refer the questions of the economic union, the Arab common market and the Iraqi proposals to the meeting of the League Council to be held in Casablanca (which did not take place).

Other items referred to the Council were the removal of restrictions on inter-Arab trade and "the exempting of Arab companies from local nationality conditions." (The last point, raised by Lebanon, had been included in the Iraqi proposals.)

The Council advocated measures to frustrate Israel's entry into the Common Market and recommended the setting-up of a technical committee to follow Israel's progress in this respect. It recommended that the Arab states should participate with a joint pavilion in the 1964 World Fair in New York.

Amman Radio called the conference "another big stone in the colossal pyramid of failure." (R. Damascus, June 17 [20], June 24 [27]; R. Baghdad, June 18, 19 [20]; R. Amman, June 25 [27]; Eg. Gaz., May 30, June 15, 17, 20, 22-25; Mid. Mir., June 24; MEED, June 23, 30)

Eighth Session of EC Postponed. On Dec 7 it was announced that the eighth session of the Arab Economic Council, due to be held on Dec 7 in Cairo, had been postponed until March 1962. (MENA, Nov 6 [8]; R. Amman, Dec 7-IMB, Dec 8)

JOINT ECONOMIC UNDERTAKINGS

Arab Aviation Company. (See MER 1960, pp 139-40.) Aviation experts from League member-states met in Baghdad from March 26 to April 4 to continue discussions on the creation of an Arab aviation company. (Zaman, March 26, 28-31, April 1-5; Eg. Gaz., March 27)

The April meeting of the Economic Council in Baghdad approved the experts' recommendations. According to MEED, the capital would be £17m. to which Iraq and the UAR would subscribe 20% each, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait 15%, while Lebanon and Yemen agreed to subscribe towards the remaining 30% capital and other Arab countries were also invited to subscribe. The company was to operate eight jet aircraft on international routes between the Middle East and North and South America and South Africa not served by existing national Arab airlines, which would continue to operate on their present routes. Meanwhile, representatives of the participating countries had gone to Montreal for discussions with IATA on matters relating to the company [which had not yet been established by the end of the year]. (R. Baghdad, April 17 [19]; MEED, April 14)

In April the Economic Council adopted amendments proposed by Iraq and Kuwait. Iraq requested that foreign capital should be excluded from the foundation's funds [it had made the same proposal in regard to the aviation company], that the foundation itself should be "strengthened" and its funds invested in projects which came strictly within the scope of its charter. A Kuwait proposal to raise the foundation's capital from £20m. to £25m. through her participation with £5m. was also accepted. Thereafter, Iraq officially signed the agreement and undertook to subscribe 3.2m. dinars. (R. Baghdad April 17; R. Beirut, April 18-IMB, April 18, 19; Mid. Mir., April 22)

A Cairo paper wrote that six Arab countries had signed the agreement—Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and the UAR. Libya, Morocco, Sudan, Tunisia and Yemen had been expected to sign at the EC meeting but had not done so. Meanwhile, the foundation existed in name only because, of the six signatories, only the UAR had submitted the ratification documents. Some of these countries had told the League SG that the ratifications were on their way but money would not be forthcoming for some months. (Akhbar al-Yaum, April 29)

On May 1 it was reported that the UAR had made available to the League £1 million as its first instalment on account of its share in the foundation's capital. (Ahram, May 1; R. Cairo, May 1-IMB, May 1)

Two weeks later, it was reported that the League Secretariat had rejected a Lebanese proposal that the members of the foundation's board of directors should be appointed in proportion to the shares acquired by each country; consequently, Lebanon would postpone its adherence to the foundation. (Jaridah, May 14)

The final allocation of shares of £10,000 each was as follows: Iraq—320 shares; Jordan—56; Kuwait—500; Lebanon—113; Libya—38; Saudi Arabia—291; Sudan—120; UAR—1,006; Yemen—56. All the countries except Sudan, it was reported in June, had by now agreed to take up their shares. (Wahdah, Damascus, June 20)

Arab Oil Pipeline Company. In April the Economic Council meeting in Baghdad decided over Saudi Arabian opposition to defer discussion of the proposal to establish an Arab oil pipeline company until it had been fully studied by a committee of economic experts. (R. Baghdad, April 13-IMB, April 14; R. Baghdad, April 17 [19]; Arab Observer, April 23)

On Nov 11 the experts' committee met in Cairo with the participation of the UAR, Lebanon, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Iraq, Syria and Jordan were not represented. (R. Cairo, Nov 11 [14])

The Arab Oil Tankers' Company. In April the Economic Council at its meeting in Baghdad approved the establishment of an Arab Oil Tankers' Company with a capital of 35 million dinars and with Kuwait as its headquarters.

It was stipulated that instruments of ratification would be deposited with the Arab League Secretariat within nine months. (R. Baghdad, April 17 [19]; Arab Observer, April 23)

[No practical steps to implement the decision had been reported by the end of the year.]

Arab Transit Agreement. (See MER 1960, p 140.) In April the Iraqi Ministry of Trade proposed the establishment of a committee to study the question of Iraq's adherence to the transit agreement. (R. Baghdad, April 26 [W, May 4])

In June it was reported that the Arab Transit Committee, comprising Lebanon, the UAR, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, might be convened in the near future to discuss proposals submitted by Iraq. (Hayat, June 30)

INTER-ARAB CONFERENCES

The Islamic Congress in Jerusalem (al-mu'tamar al-islami fi al-quds). Jerusalem, Jan 15-17. [An Islamic congress was first convened in Jerusalem in December 1931, sponsored by Hajj Amin al-Husseini, the then Mufti of Jerusalem. In Dec 1953 a similar congress was organized by Jordan, mainly as a counter move to the Islamic Congress sponsored at that time jointly by Egypt and Saudi Arabia, with Anwar Saadat as its SG. The Muslim Brethren, the adversaries of the military regime in Egypt, became active at the Jerusalem congress. The SG of the congress was Sa'id Ramadan, son-in-law of the late Supreme Guide of the Brethren, Hasan al-Bana. The congress had a permanent office in Jerusalem. See also p 363 on the activities of the congress in regard to Africa.]

The conference was attended by Muslims from Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Tunisia, Libya, Iran, Pakistan, Algeria, Chad and Europe.

On Jan 14 the permanent office of the conference organized a mass rally to celebrate the anniversary of the Prophet's ascension (mir'aj). King Hussein, addressing the rally, said that the Arabs' two great enemies were Zionism and Communism. He made a plea for Arab unity and collaboration based on fact rather than imagination. He said that Zionism was planning to swallow up the Arab world, while Communism "had gained somebody from amongst us and used him to disrupt our ranks for its purposes... by shaking faith in the hearts of the people," and when he failed to do this he did not hesitate to tread the path of crime, and reverted freely to every kind of underhand plot.

The congress passed resolutions: calling on the Muslim world and leaders to consider Islamic principles and laws in their legislation, educational systems, etc as well as in international relations, criticizing "the hesitation displayed by Arab states in drawing up political, military and economic blueprints for the recovery of Palestine which would become binding upon all of them," and urging joint Arab efforts to prevent the passage of Israel shipping through the Gulf of Aqaba, to prevent Israel from diverting the Jordan river waters, and to counteract Israel's penetration into Africa. The congress also called for unity among Muslim and Arab leaders, and for an Arab boycott of France until she recognized Algeria's independence. It accused the Communist authorities in the USSR of persecuting "millions of Muslims" and of attempting to stamp out their religion, and appealed to Arab and Muslim nations to work, within the framework of the UN, for the liberation of Muslims in the Soviet Union from Communist imperialism. (Al-Nadwa, Jan 15, 19; Mid. Mir., Jan 22—the dates given in the latter source are not correct.)

Congress of Arab Oil Workers' Federation (mu'tamar ummal al-batrāl al-arab) (Cairo, Jan 19-22). This was a constituent congress convened by the Egyptian oil workers union and attended by delegations from the UAR, Libya and Aden. Anwar Salim, an Egyptian, who served as chairman, said he had received cables of support and apology for non-attendance from oil workers in Tunisia and the Lebanon.

The participants declared their support for all Arab liberation movements, and decided to collaborate with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions. They recommended the setting up of trade unions for oil workers in all Arab countries, that efforts be made to persuade oil unions in Iraq, Lebanon and Tunisia to join the Federation, and that the Federation participate in the forthcoming Arab oil conference. Mukhtar al-Tallali of Libya was elected council chairman of the Federation and Anwar Salim SG; Abdallah Ubayd of Aden became one of the vice-chairmen. (Ahram, Jan 20; eg. Gaz., Jan 20, 23; R. Cairo, Jan 19 [21]; MENA, Jan 21, 22 [W 26])

Sixth Arab Lawyers' Conference (mu'tamar al-muhamin al-arab) (Cairo, Feb 1-6). The conference took place as scheduled (see MER 1960, p 143). It declared that the "merger between Egypt and Syria is a prelude to an all-embracing unity between the different parts of the Arab world," called for the removal of artificial barriers between the Arab countries and expressed the view that the "ends of Arab nationalism cannot be served except within the framework of freedom of thought and expression." The conference expressed its support for all Arab causes, from Mauritania (in support of Morocco's claim) and Algeria to the Arab South and the issue of the Jordan waters. The conference also recommended that each Arab state should set up a constitutional court and that the Arab League should establish a high court of justice, and resolved to hold the seventh conference in Jerusalem during the second half of 1962. (Mid. Mir., Feb 11; eg. Gaz., Feb 12)

Fourth Arab Scientific Congress (al-mu'tamar al-ilmi al-arabi ar-rabi) (Cairo, Feb 2-9). The congress was attended by 272 representatives of scientific organizations from the UAR, Iraq, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan. Mustafa Nazif, the chairman of the Arab Science Union (al-ittihād al-ilmi al-arabi), stressed the importance of scientific development in the Arab countries and of coordination between them. The congress recommended the establishment of a central Arab co-ordinating body for scientific research, translation and standardization of scientific terms, the issue of a scientific magazine, and the "revival of the Arab scientific legacy." (Hayat, Feb 3, 10)

Permanent Arab Information Committee (al-lajnah ad-dā'imah lil-ilm al-arabi) (see MER 1960, p 143, under: Arab League Information Standing Committee.)

The third session of the Committee took place at the League headquarters in Cairo from Feb 18-23. All League member-states, as well as Qatar, were represented; it was presided over by Sa'ad Afrah, Minister Plenipotentiary at the UAR Foreign Ministry.

The Committee adopted the following recommendations, to be submitted to the Arab League Council:

(1) to counter Israeli infiltration in Africa, the Arab states should study the requirements of the African states, send experts there, and open an office for Arab propaganda in Accra, provided this did not impede the setting up of such an office in Dakar as proposed by Iraq; (2) the Arab states should double their information efforts in Eastern Europe against Jewish immigration into Israel; (3) a Spanish-language magazine should be distributed in Spain and Latin America to expound the Arab cause; (4) the League Secretariat should publish an Arab news bulletin for distribution abroad; states should provide the Secretariat with information and the Secretariat should appoint correspondents in the member-states; (5) the Secretariat should call a conference of foreign and Arab specialists in Arab studies; (6) member-states should exchange information material and radio and television programmes; (7) an Arab information week should be held annually in all the Arab countries on March 22, the day of the establishment of the Arab League; (8) £3,000 should be offered as a prize for the best Arab film dealing with an Arab national topic; (9) a commemorative Arab stamp should be issued during the propaganda week; the proceeds to go to the League's information fund.

Two secret resolutions were adopted regarding Israel's "exploitation of the Eichmann trial" and on "countering Israeli propaganda in America." (MENA, Feb 23 [25]; eg. Gaz., Hayat, Feb 24; Mid. Mir., March 4)

The fourth session of the Committee took place in Sept. (Akhbar al-Ubū, Jordan, Sept 29)

Meetings were also reported on June 5 and on Oct 9. (MENA, June 5 [7]; Akhbar Sa'ah, Oct 11)

Conference on Standardization of Arabic (Rabat, April 3-7). The conference met at the invitation of the Moroccan government. The Algerian Provincial Government, Jordan, Lebanon, Libya, the UAR, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tunisia and Morocco were represented. The Moroccan Minister of Education spoke of the need to make Arabic the language of science, culture and civilization in all its aspects. (R. Rabat, April 3 [6])

Seventh Arab Social Affairs Experts' Conference (Cairo, April 15-20). Experts representing ten member-states of the League, observers from the ILO and a number of other local and international organizations attended the conference. The conference recommended (1) the Arab countries to request the ILO to recognize Arabic as an official language; (2) the establishment of labour departments in the League offices in foreign countries to counteract Zionist activities; (3) the establishment of a labour advisory council in each Arab country; (4) the establishment of special machinery in each Arab country where it had not yet been set up, to handle workers' social insurance; (5) the introduction of vocational training programmes; (6) the establishment of labour inspectorates and, (7) the encouragement of Arab women to assume responsibilities in social affairs. (Eg. Mail, April 15; MENA, April 15 [18]; Hayat, April 22)

Seminar on University Education in the Arab Countries. (Benghazi, May 3-17) University teachers from various Arab countries participated. The recommendations of the seminar, which were to be submitted to the Arab League, included: the formation of an Arab Universities' Federation, facilitating the admission of Algerian and Palestinian students to the Arab universities; the teaching of sciences in Arabic; and coordination and cooperation between the universities. 29th Arab Medical (Physicians') Conference (al-mu'tamar al-tibbi al-arabi—sometimes al-atibba' al-arab), (Cairo, May 24-8) (see also MER 1960, p 134). About 1,000 physicians participated, representing physicians' associations and medical societies in Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, the UAR and Yemen.

The conference decided to set up an Arab Medical Federation to be composed of all the medical practitioners in the Arab world, with a permanent HQ in Cairo. The leaders of the delegation signed the organic law of the federation and agreed on its immediate implementation. The federation's aim would be to promote the interests of the Arab world, cooperation among members of the profession, study of endemic and epidemic diseases and the teaching of medicine in Arabic. An Arab medical conference would be held annually. The conference also decided to form an Arab Health Organization, within the framework of the federation, with permanent HQ in Cairo, to carry out scientific research, combat diseases and epidemics in the Arab states and coordinate health planning. The conference made recommendations on health planning and education to the Arab governments. The thirtieth meeting was to be held in Baghdad. (Eg. Gaz., May 28, 29; MENA, May 28 [W, June 1]; Arab Observer, June 4)

The First Arab Education Conference (al-mu'tamar al-tarbiyyi) (Cairo, June 24-July 3) was attended by delegations from ten states and four amirates. The conference adopted resolutions and recommendations regarding the development of education curricula, including a uniform oath for teachers in all Arab countries. (Ahram, June 24, July 4; MENA, June 24 [W 29]; R. Baghdad, July 8 [W 13])

The Arab Emigrants' Conference (mu'tamar lil-mugh-taribin al-arab) opened in Cairo on July 22 and was attended by 220 delegates; 100 of them represented the "Union of Muslim Arab Emigrants in Canada and the US" led by James Muhammad Khalil; the other 120 were Christians representing Syrian and Lebanese associations in the US.

The conference, which met at the Arab League HQ, was opened by SG Hassūnah. He urged those present to enlighten American public opinion on matters relating to the Arab world and reminded them that they were "ambassadors of true friendship." The delegates were also addressed by UAR ministers and high officials who spoke of Arab democracy, Arab socialism and positive neutralism and told the delegates that it was important to be loyal to the old homeland as well as to the new. They also accused the US and Canadian press of an anti-Arab and pro-Zionist attitude. James Muhammad Khalil said that the delegates, on their return to America, would be able to describe the UAR people's love for Abdel Nasser and the progress achieved under his leadership.

The delegates were taken on tours of the UAR and entertained by the UAR authorities. (Eg. Gaz., July 18, 23; MENA, July 23 [25]; Ahram, July 23)

First Conference of Graduates of the Arab Community Development Centre (al-mu'tamar al-awwal li-khariji markaz tanmiyyat al-mujtama' al-arabi), (Beirut, July 25-Aug 2). This conference of graduates of the Sir al-Liyan centre, located in Egypt, was attended by delegates from Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tunisia, the UAR, Yemen and the Arab League Secretariat. There were representatives from the WHO, FAO, ILO and UNRWA. The conference passed 62 recommendations stressing the need for government programmes to develop the Arab community in the social, health, educational and other fields, including the sending of technicians to over-populated villages and Bedouin areas, agricultural education, increased health budgets and better health services, combating of illiteracy, mobilization for "the great fight against ignorance"; encouragement of the cooperative movement and greater opportunities for Arab women to show their abilities. (Hayat, July 25, Aug 2, 3; Mid Mir., July 29, Aug 5)

The Conference of Aviation Companies (Bhamdun, Lebanon, Aug 16-21) was attended by representatives from the UAR, Lebanon, Jordan, Tunisia and Kuwait, who met to coordinate air transport between the Arab countries. The participants agreed on a joint publicity campaign for tourism to the Arab countries, air transportation by Arab airlines within Arab countries and between Arab and other countries, and standardization of technical terms. The next meeting was to be held in Jerusalem in 1962. (Eg. Gaz., Aug 17; Hayat, Aug 23)

Arab Teachers' Conference (Beirut, Aug 21-25). This conference, sponsored by the Lebanese Teachers' Union, was attended by representatives of teachers' unions from Lebanon, Morocco, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, the UAR, Tunisia, Aden and Oman. The unions in the UAR (an Egyptian and a Syrian union), Iraq, Tunisia and Lebanon agreed to create an Arab Teachers' Federation (ittihād al-mu'allimin al-arab). The federation's secretary would temporarily be located in Cairo. Muhammad Sa'id al-Aryan was elected SG of the federation. The Conference, sponsored by the UN Regional Social Affairs Office in Beirut, was attended by delegates from Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, the UAR and Yemen. There were also representatives of the Arab League Secretariat and UN bodies. The conference discussed ways and means of achieving balanced economic and social planning and recommended, inter alia: (1) the establishment of a body for economic and social development planning in each Arab country; (2) the carrying out of social research for development planning; (3) a proper balance in the social and economic development budgets. (Hayat, Nov 7-11, 14; Mid. Mir., Nov 11)

Representatives of Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria and a delegate from the Arab League Secretariat attended the conference, which recommended the establishment of centres in Damascus, Beirut and Amman for regional meteorological information for aircraft flying over member-states. The League Secretariat representative described the recommendation as a realistic solution to a three-year-old problem; each of the four participating countries had, since 1958, sought to have a single regional centre established on its territory. (Hayat, Nov 16, 17; Mid. Mir., Nov 18)

The Arab Tourist and Travel Offices' Conference (Beirut, Dec 2-5), was attended by representatives of travel offices from Bahrain, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, and the UAR. The Conference urged Arab countries to facilitate inter-Arab travel and to abolish entry visas for tourists from friendly countries on the basis of reciprocal treatment. Alternatively, the issue of an "Arab visa," valid for all Arab countries, was suggested. The Conference urged reduction in fares between Arab countries; a joint tourist policy towards foreign countries and towards foreign tourists travelling to the "occupied parts of Palestine." The resolutions were submitted to all Arab governments. (Hayat, Dec 3, 6; Mid. Mir., Dec 9)

The Ninth Conference of the Arab League Permanent Committee for Communications (lajnat al-muwassalat ad-d'imah at-tib'ah li-jam'at ad-duwal al-arabiyyah) (Rabat, Dec 9-22). The Conference was attended by representatives of Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Tunisia, the UAR, Yemen, the Algerian Provisional Government and a delegation of the League Secretariat. The Conference approved recommendations concerning sea, air and land transport and referred them to the member-states. (R. Rabat, Dec 9 [W 14]; Hayat, Dec 10; Mid. Mir., Dec 30)

THE KUWAIT CRISIS

Kuwait achieved full independence on June 19 by an agreement with the UK in the form of an exchange of notes between the British Political Resident in the Persian Gulf and the Ruler of Kuwait. The agreement of 1899 was terminated, taking into account the fact that the Ruler's government had "the sole responsibility for the conduct of Kuwaiti internal and external affairs." At the same time the United Kingdom undertook to assist the government of Kuwait at the latter's request. Both the Kuwaiti and the British governments repeatedly emphasized that the agreement had been concluded between two equal parties, that Kuwait had been independent previously, and that the agreement had merely formalized an existing situation. The UK initially intended the British Political Agent to remain in Kuwait with the same functions, but after the advent of the Kuwait crisis the title of the Agent was changed to Consul General, and in September he was appointed Ambassador—with no personal change taking place.

Six days after the declaration of independence, PM Qasim of Iraq proclaimed Kuwait an integral part of Iraq on historic-legal as well as anti-imperialist grounds. Legally, the Iraqi case was based on the argument that prior to World War I Kuwait had been a district of Basra province—then under Ottoman rule—and that the Kuwaiti Shaykh had had no authority to sign the 1899 agreement with Britain, being merely an Ottoman district commissioner. After the war the British had separated Kuwait district from Basra province, which by then constituted part of the Iraqi State. The new agreement, the Iraqi argument went on, was nothing more than a device to perpetuate British imperialist domination over Kuwait as well as over the Gulf area in general. Qasim said that Iraq would "liberate" "this section of [her] territory," but he was ambiguous as to the means to be employed; he said that Iraq always resorted to peaceful methods but added that these were useless in dealing with imperialism.

It was thought that apart from considerations of internal policy Qasim might have been motivated by the wish to forestall possible UAR and Saudi Arabian encroachments, and by means of an "anti-imperialist" feat, to gain a leading position in the Arab world which hitherto had eluded him. A fortnight after first making his claim and after the landing of British forces in Kuwait, Qasim himself stated that he had never meant to annex Kuwait by force but that his intention had been to state Iraq's claim before the world.

Kuwait declared her determination to safeguard her independence, putting forward historical and legal arguments of her own. The government entered into consultations with the UK and requested the support of the Arab League and governments.

All Arab countries supported Kuwait's independence, but with different degrees of emphasis, different arguments and, it was thought, different motives. Saudi Arabia immediately offered Kuwait her support, and claimed that Kuwait and Saudi Arabia were one country; her stand was attributed to rivalry with Iraq over oil resources and in the Persian Gulf in general. The UAR differentiated between a "genuine Arab union" which she advocated, and "annexation" which she could not accept; observers thought that her attitude may have stemmed from rivalry with Baghdad for Arab leadership and oil. Jordan was careful not to give offence to Iraq, expressing fear for the precariously balanced Arab solidarity. Tunisia proclaimed the right to self-determination. The Lebanese government, as usual, tried to remain neutral.

Meanwhile the UK had assured Kuwait of her support, and naval moves towards Kuwait started apparently on June 28 or 29. The UK was in close consultation with the US on the matter, and it was pointed out that the US as well as Britain had interests in Kuwaiti oil. At the same time the British government let it be known that it welcomed efforts by the Arab states to safeguard Kuwait's independence.

On June 29 unconfirmed reports of Iraqi troop concentrations on the Kuwaiti border were heard in Cairo, and on June 30, in Washington also. On the latter day the UK announced that she had taken precautionary measures in regard to the situation. The US contacted the Iraqi government and obtained assurances of Iraqi peaceful intentions; the UAR called on the "Iraqi people" to remain within the "principles of the Arab struggle," and King Saud cautioned Qasim not to take irresponsible steps.

On July 1 British and Saudi Arabian troops entered Kuwait at the request of the Kuwaiti government. On the same day, but only after the Kuwaiti announcement that it had asked for military assistance, did Iraq officially deny the reports of her alleged troop concentrations and affirm that she would "recover Kuwait district by all peaceful means." Five days later there were about 7,000 British troops in defensive positions in Kuwait, supported by air and naval forces. PM Macmillan stated that this measure had been taken purely for purposes of defence, following evidence of Iraqi troop concentrations and in accordance with Britain's treaty obligations and the Ruler's request. The Opposition supported the move. The much smaller Saudi Arabian force took up positions in a separate area; reports on liaison between the two forces were denied, the UK and Saudi Arabia having no diplomatic relations, and being in dispute over Buraimi.

The Arab countries were now involved in a situation in which troops of a foreign "imperialist" power were called onto Arab soil by an Arab government because of an inter-Arab conflict. Cairo accused Qasim of having brought this about and even of collusion with Britain. The question now became one of the Arabs being able to replace the British force in safeguarding Kuwait. Britain herself officially welcomed action by the League.

Meanwhile the issue came up in the Security Council (July 2-7) following a complaint by Kuwait of an Iraqi threat (July 1) and an Iraqi complaint of a threat to her territory by British forces (July 2). The USSR, whose first reaction to the Iraqi claim had been non-committal, now supported the Iraqi stand in denying Kuwait's sovereignty and calling for the withdrawal of the British forces. The UAR, then a member of the Council, avoided espousal of either side and presented a resolution urging that the question be solved by peaceful means and calling on the UK to withdraw her forces immediately; the resolution was supported by the USSR. The UK proposed a resolution in support of Kuwait's independence and welcoming steps by the Arab League to restore tranquillity to the area; this resolution was vetoed by the USSR on the grounds that it made no reference to the withdrawal of the British forces. The US expressed her support for the action taken by the UK and Saudi Arabia in extending military assistance to Kuwait. No resolution was adopted.

There followed two and a half months of inter-Arab manoeuvring, in which the League SG was especially active, around two main questions: (1) the admittance of Kuwait to the League, categorically demanded by Saudi Arabia and vehemently opposed by Iraq; (2) Kuwait's demand that an Arab force be set up to relieve the British troops and protect her independence. Alternatively, it was suggested that Qasim renounce his claim; in fact, he reiterated it. Kuwait made it clear that in return for the support of the Arab countries she was prepared to use part of her oil revenues to aid in their development.

Kuwait was admitted to the League at the Council meeting of July 20, whereupon Iraq declared that she would boycott all League meetings in which Kuwait was represented and demanded SG Hassinah's resignation.

Discussions on the establishment of an Arab force started immediately after the Council meeting; however, the first Arab contingent arrived in Kuwait only seven weeks later, on September 10. The force consisted of contingents from Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tunisia and the UAR, and by mid-September comprised some 3,000 men; it was under the dual control of the League and the countries participating, and had a Saudi Arabian commander-in-chief. The withdrawal of British forces had started previously—on July 19, when the situation had somewhat cleared—and was completed on Oct 10.

At the end of September the Kuwait crisis, which had dominated inter-Arab relations for three months, was relegated to the sidelines by the break-up of the UAR. Two weeks later the UAR announced the withdrawal of her contingent from the Arab Force on the grounds that anti-UAR intrigues were being planned by "imperialists and their stooges"; at the same time there were reports of political friction in the force between Egyptian officers on the one hand and Syrian, Jordanian and Saudi Arabian officers on the other. The UAR-Egyptian contingent was actually withdrawn at the beginning of December; the Syrian troops which had originally formed part of the UAR contingent also left.

Kuwait's application for UN membership was considered by the Security Council on November 30. The State of Kuwait had meanwhile been recognized by over 60 countries. The application was sponsored by the UAR and supported by the UK, but vetoed by the USSR which supported the Iraqi stand and asserted that Kuwait "continues to remain a British colony." In consequence of the Soviet support, Iraq now grew ever closer to the USSR.

In December there was renewed tension, occasioned by a spate of ambiguous statements by PM Qasim, all of the same pattern as mentioned above. The seizure of Goa by an Indian force (December 18-19) was frequently referred to in Iraqi commentaries. Kuwait protested to the Security Council and, at the end of the month, the UK took what was officially described as "small-scale precautionary (military) measures," namely slightly reinforcing the British ME Command (with HQ at Aden). But this time reaction to the British move differed from that of June. While Iraq protested to the Security Council that the British measures threatened her security, Kuwait announced that she had not asked for British help. The Arab League, which now maintained a force in Kuwait, announced that the defence of the Arab lands was an Arab responsibility. Cairo, which since the break-up of the UAR regarded itself subject to a concerted offensive by "imperialism and Arab reactionaries," charged that the British move was directed against her as well as against Qassim, in a conspiracy against liberation movements in the ME.

KUWAIT GRANTED INDEPENDENCE

(June 19)

Background: History, Oil, Population. The Shaykhdom— with a population of 321,621 according to a census in 1961—consisted of the town of Kuwait and the surrounding desert area (see map). The town was believed to have originated in the 18th century, when several families of the Anayzah tribe migrated from the interior of the Arabian Peninsula to the shore of the Persian Gulf. The As-Sabah ruling dynasty dated from about 1756, when the inhabitants first appointed a shaykh to administer their affairs and represent them vis-à-vis the Ottoman authorities. Relations between Britain and Kuwait started in 1775, when for a brief period the main part of Kuwait was used as a station for British overland mail from India to the Mediterranean. The British East India Company protected the Shaykhdom against raids by Wahhābi tribesmen. However, to retain her autonomy Kuwait had to maintain good relations with the Turks who dominated the mainland. In 1871 Shaykh Abdallah as-Sabah accepted the title of Qaymaqam (district commissioner) under the Turkish Vali (governor) of Basra Vilayet (province), which after World War I became part of Iraq. Kuwait paid tribute to the Turks but did not come under direct Turkish administration.

Fearing Turkish occupation, Shaykh Mubārak, who became Ruler in 1896, appealed for British protection as a means of severing his ties with the Ottoman empire. At first Britain was not interested, but in 1899 she reconsidered her attitude, being apprehensive of Russian plans to build a port or coaling station there and German plans for a Berlin-Baghdad railway. To forestall these plans, Britain concluded an agreement with Shaykh Mubārak under which, in return for British protection, he undertook not to cede or dispose of any part of his territory without British consent. (For text, see below.) In 1904 a British Political Agency was established in Kuwait in spite of Turkish protests. In 1909 Britain and Turkey opened negotiations, which led to a draft agreement in 1913. Under this agreement, which was never ratified, Kuwait was to gain a measure of self-government, while Turkish and British rights were defined. In 1914 Shaykh Mubārak was assured by the British government that Kuwait would be recognized as an independent principality under British protection, on condition he cooperated in the capture of Basra.

After the First World War, Kuwait's boundaries with Iraq and Saudi Arabia remained undefined, with the result that rival tribes clashed over pasture rights. A conference was held in 1922 at Uqair to bring about a modus vivendi, and a treaty was signed between King Ibn Saud, representing Saudi Arabia, and Sir Percy Cox, representing Iraq and Kuwait. The agreement created two neutral zones, one between Saudi Arabia and Iraq and the other between Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

In the 'thirties large oil reserves were discovered in Kuwait. On Dec 23, 1934, Shaykh Ahmad granted a concession for oil exploitation (revised Dec 1, 1951) to the Kuwait Oil Company—owned equally by the American Gulf Oil Corporation and the British Petroleum Company. In 1961 Kuwait held third place among the world's oil-producing countries, and first place in the ME. In that year she produced 620 million barrels of oil, and her oil reserves were estimated at about a quarter of the known world total. According to American oil experts, Kuwait's oil potential was over 60,000 million barrels.

In 1961 income from oil was estimated at £200 million per year—90% of total government revenue, and income per capita of the population was about £1,500 a year, among the highest in the world.

Most of Kuwait's income was invested abroad, particularly in Britain, which added more weight to British interests in the country. An investment board, with the Shaykh's agent in London as chairman, was set up in 1953.

British-Kuwaiti Exchange of Notes. On June 19 notes were exchanged between the British Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, W. H. Luce, and Shaykh Abdallah as-Sālih as-Sabāh, the Ruler of Kuwait.

Luce referred to recent discussions between the Ruler and his predecessor about "the desirability of adapting the relationship of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the State of Kuwait to take account of the fact that Your Highness' Government has the sole responsibility for the conduct of Kuwait's internal and external affairs."

"The following conclusions were reached in the course of these discussions," the note continued:

"a) The Agreement of the 23rd of Jan 1899, shall be terminated as being inconsistent with the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait."

"b) The relations between the two countries shall continue to be governed by a spirit of close friendship."

"c) When appropriate the two Governments shall consult together on matters which concern them both."

"d) Nothing in these conclusions shall affect the readiness of Her Majesty's Government to assist the Government of Kuwait if the latter request such assistance."

The British Resident proposed that "the present Note together with Your Highness' reply to that effect shall be regarded as constituting an Agreement between the United Kingdom and Kuwait in this matter which shall continue in force until either party gives the other at least three years' notice of their intention to terminate it, and that the Agreement of the 23rd of Jan, 1899, shall be regarded as terminated on this day's date."

In his reply, the Ruler agreed that "Your Excellency's Note and my reply shall be regarded as constituting an Agreement between Kuwait and the United Kingdom in this matter." (Cmnd. 1409)

The 1899 Agreement was signed by Shaykh Mubārak as-Sabāh and Lt.-Col. Malcolm J. Meade, Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, on Jan 23, 1899. It stated that "Shaykh as-Sabāh of his own free will and desire does hereby pledge and bind himself, his heirs and successors not to receive the Agent or Representative of any Power or Government at Kuwait, or at any other place within the limits of his territory, without the previous sanction of the British Government; and he further binds himself, his heirs, and successors not to cede, sell, lease, mortgage, or give for occupation or for any other purpose any portion of his territory to the Government or subjects of any other Power without the previous consent of Her Majesty's Government for these purposes. This engagement also to extend to any portion of the territory of the said Shaykh Mubārak, which may now be in the possession of the subjects of any other Government." (Cmnd. 1409.)

"Kuwait Previously Independent." The exchange of notes was made public on June 19 in the House of Commons. The Lord Privy Seal (Edward Heath) pointed out that "for some time past, Kuwait had possessed entire responsibility for the conduct of its own international relations, and with the full support of HM Government has already joined a number of international organizations as an independent sovereign state." This development, he said, had rendered "obsolete and inappropriate" the terms of the Anglo-Kuwait agreement of 1899. (For transfer to Kuwait of jurisdiction and conduct of foreign relations, see MER 1960, pp 404-5; this volume, pp 449 b-450.) Heath said that the UK did not intend to maintain forces in Kuwait. The British Political Agent would remain, with the same functions, although these "had gradually been changing during recent years with the transference of jurisdiction." There had been no request by the Ruler of Kuwait to change the title of the Political Agent. If the Ruler decided to apply for UN membership, the UK would "warmly support it." (Hansard C, Vol. 642, Col. 954-8, June 19)

Later, on June 28, Mr Heath stated that as a result of consultations with the Ruler the title of the Political Agent would shortly be changed to Consular Representative (Hansard C, Vol. 643, Col. 448, June 28). This was done three days later; finally, in Sept, the former Political Agent was appointed Ambassador. (Faitin, July 2; Times, Sept 23)

The government of Kuwait issued a statement on June 19 giving the text of the agreement, which, it said, had been reached between "two equal parties after the UK has made a de jure recognition of Kuwait's independence and full sovereignty." The statement explained that para d) of the agreement (see above) did not mean that Kuwait "is obliged to seek assistance from a certain State or a certain source," or that such assistance was "imposed" on her. Kuwait was confident that she would "receive all the assistance she needs from sister Arab States." (R. Beirut, June 21—IMB, June 22; AWA, June 29)

Kuwait's Proclamation of Independence. On the same day Kuwait's independence was proclaimed by the Ruler in a special message to the nation, in which he called for the "welfare of the country and its continued progress and prosperity," for the strengthening of the "bonds of friendship and brotherhood with sister Arab States," and the "realization of the aspirations of the Arab Nation." He stated that Kuwait would apply for membership of the Arab League, the UN and other international organizations. (Manar, June 20; R. Baghdad, June 20—IMB, June 21; AWA, June 29)

Congratulations from Arab Rulers, Including Qassim. The proclamation of independence was immediately followed by telegrams of congratulations to the Ruler from all heads of Arab states. Among the first (June 20) were PM Qassim of Iraq and King Saud of Saudi Arabia. (R. Baghdad, June 20 [22]; Manar, June 21)

President Abdel Nasser on June 23 referred to Kuwait's independence as "a glorious historic event tremendously welcomed by all Arabs" (Eg. Gaz., June 24). Jordan sent a ministerial delegation to convey King Hussein's congratulations. (R. Amman, June 24—IMB, June 25)

QASSIM CLAIMS KUWAIT

(June 25)

[On June 25 Abd al-Karim Qassim, PM of Iraq, proclaimed Kuwait an integral part of Iraq and stated that he intended to "liberate" it.]

First Intimations. [On June 13 Iraq still voted for the admission of Kuwait to the ILO as an independent country at the ILO conference in Geneva. (Heath's statement—Hansard C, Vol. 642, Col. 449, June 28).]

In his cable of congratulations (June 20) Qassim made no direct reference to Kuwait's independence. He expressed his satisfaction at the "abrogation of the illegal, forged and internationally unrecognized" agreement of 1899, which, he declared, had been "falsely concluded with Shaykh Mubārak as-Sabāh, Qaymaqam of Kuwait, who belonged to Basra province (vilayah), without the knowledge of his brothers in Kuwait and the then legal authorities in Iraq."

Qasim warned the Ruler of "plots and intrigues of the British imperialists," who divided the ranks inside the homeland to ensure that "they will remain behind the scene," and said that Iraq would never be deceived by these tricks. (R. Baghdad, June 20 [22]; Zaman, Iraq Times, June 21)

The next day, a Baghdad Radio commentary said that Britain was only pretending to grant independence to Kuwait, in order to deceive the Kuwaiti people and "other conscious people, who would not hesitate to make every sacrifice the Kuwaiti people ask for to fulfil national aspirations." (R. Baghdad, June 21 [23]; see also Ahd al-Jadid, Fajr al-Jadid, June 22)

Qasim Claims Kuwait as Part of Iraq. On June 25 in a press conference in Baghdad, Premier Qasim for the first time stated publicly Iraq's claim to Kuwait as an "indivisible part" of her territory.

Qasim presented his case in the framework of a denunciation of imperialism in general and British imperialism in particular. The main issue, he said, was to put an end to imperialism, which, he charged, was "intriguing against the security of Iraq." It (the UK) was trying to create a federation under its domination of shaykhdoms of the "Eastern Arab South" with Kuwait as its cornerstone, which would block Iraq's approaches to the Indian Ocean. This was a complementary step to the establishment of the Federation of the Amirates of the South (Aden protectorates), which was also designed to control the approaches of the Arab countries to the Indian Ocean. The UK had also endeavoured to bring Kuwait into the Commonwealth, but as Iraq had foiled this attempt, the deceitful agreement of June 19 had been signed to achieve the same purpose by other means.

Kuwait, however, was an integral part of Iraq, Qasim declared, reiterating that the Shaykh of Kuwait had had no authority to sign the 1899 agreement as he was a mere district commissioner of the Ottoman Basra province. This forged agreement, he said, was never internationally recognized.

The new agreement, Qasim said, was "a blow to the independence of Iraq and the aspirations of the Kuwaitis." It had been signed by a ruling clique of "irresponsible persons" serving the interests of the imperialists. Iraq did not recognize its legality, as Kuwait was part of Iraq; no one except Iraq could sign agreements on her behalf. Iraq had therefore decided, he said, "to protect the Iraqi people in Kuwait and to demand all the land, arbitrarily held by imperialism, which belongs to the province of Basra." "When we say this, it means that we can execute it," he declared, and added that a decree would be issued appointing the Shaykh of Kuwait as "qaymaqam of the district of Kuwait" under the authority of the Basra province.

The Shaykh of Kuwait, Qasim said, would be warned that if there was any violation of the people's rights, he would be "severely punished and regarded as an insurgent." At the same time, he expressed his hope that the "esteemed Shaykh" (al-jalil) would not stand as an obstacle in the way of the prosperity of the "entire Iraqi people from the north of Zakho [Iraq's northernmost town] to the south of Kuwait."

Qasim did not specify how the incorporation of Kuwait was actually to be brought about. At one point he said: "We will liberate this section of the Iraqi territory." Again he stated: "We are capable of obtaining all our rights. But we always resort to peaceful means... But I assure you that peaceful methods are useless with imperialism..." [There was no reference to military preparedness.] (Zaman, June 25; R. Baghdad, June 25 [27])

Iraq's Case: Kuwait Formerly Part of Ottoman Basra Province. A memorandum stating Iraq's claim to Kuwait was delivered by the Iraqi Foreign Ministry to diplomatic representatives on June 26. It explained that until the outbreak of World War I Kuwait had belonged to the liwa (province) of Basra, both being under Ottoman rule. The district commissioner (qaymaqam) of Kuwait was appointed by the Sultan, and derived his administrative authority from the Ottoman authorities in Basra. "British colonialism," which had made several attempts to gain access to the Arab Gulf area in 1899, had concluded a "secret" agreement with Shaykh Mubarak under which the latter ceded to the British rights that he did not possess, but the Shaykh had maintained his allegiance to the Sultan and his representative in Basra. An attempt by the British in 1913 to "separate Kuwait from Iraq" by means of an agreement with the Ottoman Empire had not materialized (the source below gives the details of the draft agreement), and only after the First World War had Britain been able by occupying Iraq to separate Kuwait from her. The document stated that the "imperialist agreement" of June 1961 actually "secured the continuance of British protection over Kuwait" through the British undertaking to extend assistance to the Shaykh on request and the provision for consultation on matters of common interest. The government of Iraq declared that Kuwait was an integral part of Iraq; it was determined to resist imperialism and "safeguard the unity of the people in Iraq and Kuwait." The Iraqi claim to Kuwait was presented in detail in a Foreign Ministry paper. (The Truth About Kuwait, Iraq Ministry of Foreign Affairs, July 1961)

Previous Iraqi Claims. Claims over Kuwait had been raised by previous Iraqi governments. In 1938 King Ghazi made such a claim, and in 1958 Premier Nuri as-Sa'id negotiated with Britain and the US for Kuwait's admission to the Arab Union (of Iraq and Jordan) (Hayat, June 25). While Qasim made no reference to these facts, they were briefly referred to in the Iraqi Foreign Ministry paper as claims made by "governments of Iraq before the revolution" who could do no more than present their claims to the British government, "since they were not free to plan their policy." (The Truth About Kuwait)

On June 25 Baghdad Radio broadcast messages of support to Qasim from the Iraqi Chief of Staff, state organizations and prominent individuals.

Regular radio programmes were cancelled on June 25 and 26, and military bands played patriotic songs. (R. Baghdad, June 25, 26 [27, 28])

[The Iraqi press supported Qasim's move without reservations.]

ON QASSIM'S MOTIVES AND INTENTIONS

Qasim: To Alert World Opinion. A fortnight after his declaration of June 25 (and after the landing of British forces in Kuwait), Qasim said that he had never meant to annex Kuwait by force and that his intention was to state Iraq's claim. In a press interview on July 6, he maintained that the claim had already been included in his inaugural speech of July 14, 1958, when he mentioned the creation of "a popular republic based on complete Iraqi unity." His motive in re-stating it on June 25, he said, was to arouse public opinion. "The world has paid an adequate attention to our declaration," he declared, "and this subject occupies the world press and international politics." (Hayot, July 7)

Forestalling UAR and Saudi Arabian Encroachments. Arab diplomats in Lebanon, who did not expect a military move by Iraq, regarded Qasim's statement as a manoeuvre to prevent the UAR gaining control of the Shaykhdom. Although there appeared to be no opposition in Kuwait, especially after the introduction of the extensive welfare schemes, it was reported that such as remained had more affinity with the UAR than with Iraq. (NYT, June 27, 30; Economist, July 1)

The Financial Times thought that Qasim might have been expecting Saudi Arabian and Egyptian encroachment in the Persian Gulf and wanted to establish Iraq's claim as "a basis from which to compromise later." (Financial Times, July 3)

"Attempt to Divert Attention from Internal Failures." This motive was attributed to Qasim by the UAR and other Arab press, as well as by British and American opinion. All were convinced that he did not mean to use force. (For UAR opinion, see Akhbar, July 5; Akhbar al-Yawm, July 8)

Western diplomats were reported as believing that Qasim's action was motivated by his failure to carry through the reforms he had promised. (Newsweek, July 24)

"Manoeuvring for Leading Position in the Arab World." The Times wrote that Qasim was seeking to portray himself as "the most anti-imperialist" of the Arab leaders. As his domestic position was weak and he had "clearly failed to capture the tide of Arab nationalism," he was attempting to rally home and foreign support by "forcing Britain into colonialist costume," casting Kuwait as "victim or stooge" and the UAR as accomplice. The paper doubted whether Qasim contemplated a military move, which would have involved the risk of British military intervention, as well as a "solid front of Arab opinion." (Times, June 27)

Another opinion was that as Qasim was negotiating a new agreement with the Iraq Petroleum Company, the Kuwait claim served as "an admirable cover for a deal with the imperialists" and could serve, without costing a penny, as "a popular rallying cry for months and years to come." (Time, July 7)

No Definite Plan. [Some opinion was doubtful whether Qasim had any plan at all, or was even disparaging.]

The Economist said the move as "one of General Qasim's periodic brainstorms" and said that this was generally believed in Lebanon. It doubted whether he intended to seize Kuwait by force, because "he would have acted first and talked afterwards." The paper suggested that he wanted "to test Kuwaiti courage and the reaction everywhere else." (Economist, July 1, 8)

Another observer doubted whether Qasim had any "consistent plan" and thought his announcement looked more like "a sudden impulsive gesture." (Financial Times, July 3)

Muhammad Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, was puzzled by the "new addition to the great mysteries of the strange man who nowadays rules in Baghdad." (Ahram, July 2)

KUWAITI AND BRITISH REACTIONS TO QASSIM'S DECLARATION

(June 26-30)

Kuwait: "Determined to Protect Her Territory." The Kuwaiti government secretariat issued a statement on June 26 declaring that Kuwait was "an independent Arab state with full sovereignty, recognized internationally." The statement continued: "The Kuwaiti Government backed by the entire Kuwaiti people is determined to protect and defend Kuwaiti territory [and] is fully confident that all friendly and peace-loving countries, especially sister Arab States, will support it in preserving its independence." (R. Kuwait, June 26 [28]; also the sources immediately below.)

The Case for Kuwaiti Independence. Kuwait rejected Qasim's historical claims and maintained that throughout her history she had been an independent entity and had not been under Ottoman rule. She had concluded the 1899 agreement with Britain as an independent legal entity and had been recognized as such by Iraq in all communications between the two countries. (Documents in proof of this assertion were cited in the Kuwaiti publications given below.) It was also emphasized that Iraq had supported Kuwaiti requests to join international organizations, the latest case being Kuwait's admission to the ILO on June 13. ("The Kuwaiti-Iraqi Crisis" and "The Truth About the Crisis Between Kuwait and Iraq," Government of Kuwait, Printing & Publishing Department, no date)

Kuwaiti Political and Military Measures. Mass demonstrations in support of the Ruler were reported in Kuwait. Army forces were sent to the borders. The Kuwaiti Army then consisted of 3,000 troops armed with British weapons: tanks, armoured cars and 12 planes. Its commander was Mubarak Abdallah as-Sabäh, a Sandhurst graduate. (NYT, June 27; Times, July 8)

At the same time Kuwait entered into consultations with Britain with regard to the situation (Times, June 30), and sent dispatches to leaders of Arab countries asking for their moral support. (Eg. Gaz., June 27)

The Deputy Ruler of Kuwait, Abdallah Mubarak as-Sabäh, met the SG of the Arab League on June 26 to discuss the situation. The Ruler sent a letter to the League, protesting against Qasim's statement and expressing confidence that the League would support Kuwait. (MENA, June 27 [29]; BBC in Arabic, June 27-IMB, June 27)

Britain: First Reactions Cautious; Obligation to Assist Kuwait Stressed. On June 26 a British Foreign Office spokesman said that the dispute was primarily a matter between Iraq and Kuwait. He said, however, that Britain was pledged to come to Kuwait's aid under the June 19 agreement. On the same day a Ministry of Defence spokesman said that no action had yet been taken to put troops in readiness. The Times noted that the Foreign Office was determined to play down anxiety over Qasim's claim.

Close consultations took place between the Ruler of Kuwait and the British Political Agent, Sir John Richmond. In Iraq, the British Ambassador, Sir Humphrey Trevelyan, met Foreign Minister Hashim Jawad. He was reported to have stated that Iraq's threat to Kuwait's sovereignty would be a matter of grave concern to Britain. (NYT, June 28; Times, June 27, 30)

On June 28 D.W. Healy, MP (Lab.), asked in the House of Commons whether the government had received a request for assistance from the Ruler of Kuwait in view of the Iraqi claims. The Lord Privy Seal, Edward Heath, replied that the government "have assured the Ruler of their support." Healy said that, as the dispute seemed to be essentially an Arab problem and the Iraqi government had evidently "isolated themselves from the rest of the Arab world," it would be a mistake for Her Majesty's government "to come more forward" in support of Kuwait. Heath agreed that the Arab countries as a whole had reacted in support of Kuwait, but stressed that under the June 19 agreement the UK was pledged to come to Kuwait's assistance if requested. (For source see below.)

British-US Consultations. Heath was asked by G.D.N. Nabarro, MP (Cons.), whether there had been full consultations between the UK and the US government, as both countries were interested in the large oil output from Kuwait. He wanted to be assured that there would be "no action by the Government without full support from the US." Heath replied that the UK was in close consultations with the US. (Hansard, Vol. 643, Col. 448-9, June 28)

UK Starts Military Preparations. On June 29 the Ministry of Defence stated that, in view of Heath's statement, "it is natural that we should take any measures which may be necessary to increase the readiness of our forces for this purpose," but no comment could be made on any detail of the movement of forces. The Times commented that the UK was facing a dilemma: as the government was clearly determined to respond to a request from the Ruler, it had to make advance preparations in order that this assistance would be effective, while, on the other hand, it did not wish, by doing so, to provoke Iraq into action (Times, June 30). Naval moves towards Kuwait started apparently on June 28 or June 29 at the latest. (Reuters, June 29; NYT, June 30) [For details see pp 91-2]

UK Justifies Military Moves; Asks Arabs to Safeguard Kuwait's Independence. On June 30 a Cabinet meeting, held to study the latest reports from Kuwait, approved a Foreign Office statement which said that "the Government has certain obligations to the Government of Kuwait" and that it had to take some "normal precautionary measures" in the face of a "declared threat to this small independent State" of annexation by "a more powerful neighbour." The government had "informed a number of friendly Governments in the ME and elsewhere of their deep concern at this situation" and had expressed the hope that they "will use their moderating influence with the Iraqi Government so that Kuwait may continue her development as an independent Arab State..."

The governments informed were reported to be the US, all the Arab States with which the UK maintained diplomatic relations, and Turkey, India and Pakistan.

The Times wrote that this was expected to help counter Arab distaste for British military moves. The paper thought that the quarrel would gradually "dissipate itself in negotiations," but said that the UK had to take precautionary measures because Qasim's actions were not "predictable by normal criteria." If no action had been taken, the paper continued, all trust in British protection among the other shaykhdoms in the Persian Gulf would have been destroyed.

The Times believed that stability in the ME could best be achieved by "encouraging the self-interest of the Arab countries" to work out this problem "in their own terms, as long as these do not include fighting." Therefore the UK welcomed attempts by the Arab League and by other Arab states to urge moderation. (Times, June 27, July 1)

The Economist wrote that the risk of waiting to see whether Qasim was bluffing had to be weighed against the difficulties of "trying to dialogue the Iraqis from Kuwait bad it turned out that he was not bluffing." (Economist, July 8)

FIRST ARAB REACTIONS

(June 26-July 3)

Saudi Arabia: Immediate Support; "Kuwait and Saudi Arabia One Country." On June 26 in answer to the Ruler's message, King Saud assured him of his full support: "We are fully prepared to meet any danger which brotherly Kuwait may face." On the same day the Saudi Arabian Chief of Staff, Gen. Ibrahim Hasan, visited Kuwait for talks with the Ruler. (R. Kuwait, June 26 [28]; Bilad, June 27)

At the same time Saud cabled the following statement to Arab heads of state: "It must be well known to all that Kuwait and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia are one country. Whatever affects Kuwait consequently affects the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and vice versa." (R. Mecca, June 26 [28]; Bilad, June 27)

After an emergency meeting under the chairmanship of the King on June 27, the government proclaimed that it "has decided to take the necessary positive steps to preserve its (Kuwait's) independence and sovereignty." (R. Mecca, June 27 [29])

On June 27 Saud informed the Iraqi Ambassador of his "grief" at Qasim's statement on Kuwait. He urged Qasim to allow wisdom, prudence and Arab interests to prevail. (R. Mecca, June 27 [29])

On June 27 Saud wrote to Hasaniyah, SG of the Arab League, asking for an early meeting of the League to consider Kuwait's admission. (R. Damascus, June 28-IMB, June 29; Hayat, June 28)

Following the Chief of Staff's report on his visit to Kuwait, the King announced that he would use force for the defence of Kuwait if necessary. (R. Beirut, June 29-IMB, June 30; Hayat, June 29)

It was reported that he had moved several battalions to the Kuwaiti border. (NYT, June 29)

Al-Bilad, Jeddah, explained that Saudi Arabia must be the first to react against the Iraqi move because of her close ties with Kuwait, based on blood relations, common cultural heritage and joint struggles in the past. (Bilad, June 28)

Saudi Arabian Stand Attributed to Rivalry with Iraq. Al-Hayat wrote that Saudi Arabia feared Iraqi expansion in the Arabian peninsula and acquisition of control over new oil resources. Relations with Kuwait had sometimes been hostile, but Saudi Arabia had now decided to strengthen the ties between the two countries in order to forestall Iraqi designs in the Persian Gulf. (Hayat, July 2)

UAR Supports Kuwait. Differentiates between "Genuine Arab Union" and "Annexation." The first reaction from Cairo was non-committal. Cairo Radio reported Qasim's claim on June 25 without comment. The next day it quoted foreign sources to the effect that Qasim's declaration was only a manoeuvre to distract public opinion from Iraq's internal problems, and that it had caused the postponement of the departure of British troops from Kuwait. (R. Cairo, June 25-27-IMB, June 26-28)

The UAR attitude was officially declared only on the night of June 27, when Abd al-Qadir Hatim, Minister of State, broadcast a statement in the name of President Abdel Nasser. The President believed, Hatim declared, that all relations between Arab nations should be determined only according to "principles initiated by the long struggle of the Arab nation." The "historic destiny" of the Arabs was the creation of "genuine Arab unity." However, the UAR considered that this should not be based on the traditional European example and on "regional demands based on the text of old treaties," and she could not accept the principle of "annexation." While the UAR had emerged from a union between Egypt and Syria, and therefore could not but support any trend towards unity, she believed that this unity should be "a unanimous expression of Arab popular will based on free choice."

Believing that it was the duty of the stronger Arab nations to give disinterested support to the smaller ones, the UAR regretted the "surprising situation" that had been created between Kuwait and Iraq. She believed that "the great Iraqi people" had other claims to unity with Kuwait, "better, deeper and more lasting" than documents of the old Ottoman Empire. As the Iraqi and Kuwaiti people were of the same Arab nationality, "this in itself is a link and extension between them capable of creating political unity" if based on "unanimous popular will in both countries."

The declaration ended with the hope that the crisis would be solved in agreement with "Arab principles." The UAR could not imagine a situation where Arab soldiers would have to face each other in battle. (R. Cairo, June 27 [29]; Eg. Gaz., June 28)

The Deputy Ruler of Kuwait said that the statement had proved that President Abdel Nasser was "a wise and inspired leader" who dealt with Arab affairs with "absolute frankness." (R. Cairo, June 29 [July 1])

The New York Times wrote that Abdel Nasser's pledge of support was expected to swing over most of the Arab nations and the Arab League to support of Kuwaiti independence. (NYT, June 28)

Abdel Nasser answered the Kuwaiti Ruler's cable (see above) by saying that the UAR was following the situation "with much attention and anxiety" and regarded the independence of Kuwait as an expression of the "free will of its people." He stressed the UAR's belief that relations between the Arabs should be governed by principles "emanating from their continuous struggle" and declared that the UAR would endeavour to "defend these principles against any danger." Abdel Nasser answered King Saud's letter in similar terms (Eg. Gaz., June 30). While Cairo Radio continued to criticize Iraqi policy in cautious terms along the lines of Hâtîm's statement, Al-Gumhuriyah openly attacked Qassim, suggesting that perhaps Britain was behind his attitude, and also that "internal causes" had prompted Qassim "to play this comedy." (BBCM, June 30, July 1; Gumhuriyah, June 30)

Comment: Cairo Rivalry with Baghdad for Arab Leadership. Oil. The New York Times commented that the UAR's attitude stemmed from the long rivalry between Cairo and Baghdad for the leadership of the Arab world. Some observers thought that she wanted to prevent Iraq from swallowing Kuwait not only because it would enrich Iraq, but also because Cairo itself would have liked a share of Kuwait's wealth. (NYT, July 10)

This same view was expressed by Al-Hayât (Lebanon), which added that Qassim's claim had brought Iraq again, for the first time since 1958, into the forum of Arab activity, and that the UAR weighed this situation from the angle of inter-Arab propaganda as well as of Qassim's prestige. By supporting Kuwait, Abdel Nasser had secured her as an ally, as well as improving relations with Saudi Arabia after a long period of estrangement. (Hayat, July 2)

Jordan Non-Committal; New Arab Dissensions Feared. On June 26 King Hussein answered the Ruler of Kuwait with a promise that Jordan "will always remain the supporter of right and justice and will continue in its endeavour for the welfare... of the entire Arab nation" (R. Kuwait, June 26 [30]). He answered King Saud's cable in similar terms. (R. Amman, June 27 [30])

Amman Radio, while expressing a sympathetic attitude towards Kuwait, refrained from attacking Iraq's policy. It quoted, however, foreign sources to the effect that Qassim's declaration had aroused surprise in Amman, where it was feared that the situation might divide the Arab world. (R. Amman, June 27-IMB, June 28)

In Amman the King reportedly told the Iraqi Ambassador that Iraq's claim to Kuwait would receive no support from Jordan. (R. Cairo, June 27-IMB, June 28; Economist, July 1)

At the same time, Qassim received the Jordanian Ambassador in Baghdad, Wafsi al-Tal. An official bulletin issued on July 1 described the meeting as "a cordial interview which covered good relations between the two brotherly countries." The Ambassador also met Foreign Minister Jawad and was reported to have denied "fabricated reports" that Jordan intended to send troops to Kuwait (Iraq Times, July 2). Earlier (June 30) the Jordanian Minister of Defence, Wafsi Mirza, also denied such reports. (R. Amman, June 30 [July 3])

Lebanon: Officially Neutral; Mediation Discussed. Extensive government consultations took place in Lebanon during the days following Qassim's declaration. At a Cabinet meeting on June 28 it was decided that Lebanon would study the situation further before adopting a definite stand.

In Parliament several delegates criticized the government's irresolute attitude and demanded the adoption of a decisive official stand. Government supporters maintained, however, that Lebanon's position enabled her to take the role of a mediator and she should therefore remain neutral. A proposal to send a delegation to congratulate Kuwait on her independence was defeated by a large majority. (Hayat, June 28, 29, 30)

On June 29 the PM publicly expressed the hope that the crisis would not develop to such a degree "that it would harm all the Arabs," who needed a united front against "Zionist aggression" more than ever. On July 1 he said that Lebanon's optimism during the past few days had been borne out. (Hayat, June 30, July 2)

Support for Qassim's Move in Lebanese Press. [While pro-UAR papers adopted an anti-Qassim attitude and Al-Hayât (June 27, July 2) was also critical of his move, several Lebanese papers openly supported it.] Michel Abu Jawdah wrote in An-Nahâr: "We are with Iraq, even though Iraq might lose." He maintained that Kuwait had not yet acquired the features of a state, and compared the case of Iraq and Kuwait to that of France and Monaco, or the Chinese People's Republic versus Nationalist China. The paper argued that the Arab League could not admit to membership a country which was regarded by a League member as an integral part of its territory (Nahar, June 28, 29). As-Zamân also approved of Qassim's decision (Zaman, June 28). Another writer in An-Nahâr said that the Arab peoples' sentiments were on Qassim's side. The annexation of Kuwait by Iraq would have the same meaning for the UK as the nationalization of the Suez Canal, and its success would serve as an example to Saudi Arabia, who would then annex the other Gulf protectorates. He called Qassim's move "a master-stroke," recalling the July revolution and causing embarrassment to the entire world (Nahar, June 28). Al-Jaridah also expressed sympathy for Qasim's move, claiming that Iraq's policy in the Persian Gulf could develop national and progressive movements in the area while checking UAR and Saudi Arabian influences. (Jaridah, June 28)

Tunisia: Support for Self-determination; Comparison with Mauritania. On July 1 President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia, in reply to the Ruler of Kuwait's cable of July 1 expressed full support for the independence of Kuwait. "Every people has the right to determine its own fate," he declared. (Hayat, July 2)

Earlier, on June 30, an official statement rejected Arab unity based on forceful annexation, and expressed the same points of view as the UAR statement of June 27 (see above). (R. Tunisia, June 30 [July 3])

The Tunisian paper Al-Amal asked why those Arab states that had recognized the independence of Kuwait objected to that of Mauritania and supported Morocco's demands. (R. Tunisia, June 29 [30])

Libya Supports Kuwait. King Idris sent a message of congratulations to Kuwait on June 29 expressing Libya's wish to strengthen friendly relations between the two countries. (R. Kuwait, June 29 [July 1])

The Libyan PM, Muhammad Ibn Uthman as-Sa'id, delivered a note to the Iraqi Ambassador calling upon the Iraqi government to refrain from steps that would endanger peace in the ME. (R. Cairo, July 3-IMB, July 4)

Sudan Congratulates Kuwait on Her Independence. President Abdu of Sudan sent the Ruler a message congratulating him on Kuwait's independence. (R. Umdurman, June 26 [29])

Algeria Non-committal. On July 3 the representative of the Algerian Provisional Government in Cairo, Ahmad Tawfiq al-Madani, expressed regret over the crisis between Kuwait and Iraq. He told the press that his government hoped the Arab front would maintain its unity and solidarity so that national aspirations would be realized. (Eg. Gaz., July 4)

Persian Gulf Principalities Support Kuwait. The Ruler of Qatar, Ahmad Al Thani, and the Ruler of Bahrain, Shaykh Salmān Ibn Hamad Al Khalifah, wrote to the Ruler of Kuwait announcing their support for Kuwait and denouncing Qasim's claims. (R. Kuwait, July 2 [4]; Hayat, July 6)

It was reported that the (exiled) Imam of Oman, Ghālib Ibn Ali, who resided in Dammam, Saudi Arabia, also supported Kuwaiti independence. (R. Cairo, June 26 [29])

The Arab League: Unanimous Vote for Acceptance of Kuwait Not Required. On June 26 an Arab League spokesman described Iraqi claims over Kuwait as surprising. He recalled that at the League Defence Council meeting in April Iraq had consented to Kuwait's membership in the Council and the other Arab organizations. It was reported from League circles in Cairo that Kuwait could be accepted as a member of the League on a majority vote, as there was no provision requiring a unanimous vote for the acceptance of a new member. Meanwhile, Hassānah, the League SG, revealed that the Secretariat had received no note from the Iraqi government explaining its attitude towards Kuwait. (R. Beirut, R. Cairo, June 27-IMB, June 28; Hayat, June 27)

The Arab countries were informed of the Kuwaiti complaint to the League (see p 122 b). The Secretariat was to confer on June 28 with Arab ambassadors in Cairo on the calling of an emergency meeting of the League to discuss the crisis. It was reported that Iraq strongly objected to a League discussion of the subject. (MENA, June 27 [29]; Hayat, June 29)

While Saudi Arabia was urging the earliest consideration of Kuwait's application, it seemed that the League Secretariat was uncertain how to proceed in this matter if Iraq opposed her admission. (Times, June 29)

League SG to Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. On July 1 Hassānah arrived in Baghdad where he said that he would also visit Kuwait and Saudi Arabia (see below). (ANA, July 1 [4])

WORLD REACTIONS

(June-July)

US Support for Kuwait's Independence. The State Department said on June 28 that the US regarded Kuwait as a "sovereign state" and would support her application for UN membership. The spokesman said that if Kuwait expressed a wish to establish diplomatic relations with the US "this country would probably agree." So far as he knew, however, the CENTO treaty had no provision for military assistance to Kuwait in the event of her being forcibly annexed to Iraq. (USIS, June 28)

British-US Common Oil Interests in Kuwait. (See also above: British-US Consultations.) A London paper wrote: "For the UK to be strong in this part of the world is in the interest of the whole Western Alliance, and particularly [emphasis in paper] of the US, which has a share in the oil of Kuwait." (Daily Express, July 1)

The New York Times wrote that in view of British-US interests in Kuwait's oil, "no matter how much we are in favour of independence for small countries, we can hardly be enthusiastic about any arrangement which would give somebody else control over the oil of Kuwait." (NYT, July 7)

Chinese People's Republic Congratulates Kuwait. Premier Chou En-lai cabled his congratulations to the Ruler of Kuwait on the attainment of independence. (R. Kuwait, June 30 [July 3])

On July 4 a Chinese paper said that Kuwait was entitled to independence and that Qasim's claim, which was disputed by Arab states, had created a complex situation which should be left for the Arabs to settle among themselves. (NCNA, July 4 [5])

Czechoslovakia and East Germany: Dispute an Arab Matter. Both countries commented that the dispute was clearly a matter to be solved by the Arab countries concerned and the Arab League. They denounced British assistance as imperialist exploitation of the situation. (R. Berlin, July 2, R. Prague, July 3 [4, 5])

USSR Non-committal; Concentrates on Demand for Withdrawal of British Forces. The USSR offered no congratulations on Kuwait's independence. Qasim's claim was reported briefly by Tass on June 27, and on June 29 Pravda wrote that the "imperialist powers" were hastening to exploit the crisis, and to protect their oil interests. The Soviet press did not touch upon the issue between

Iraq and Kuwait and did not express support for Qasim's claim. When British forces arrived in Kuwait, Soviet comment concentrated entirely on their presence, supporting both the Iraqi and the UAR points of view (see farther below); the main issue was declared to be the withdrawal of British forces, as threatening the security of Arab states in general. (Mizan, July/Aug 1961)

The Economist wrote that British support for Kuwait had simplified the Soviet attitude, which was at first non-committal, because now it could concentrate its attacks on "colonialism" and become the champion of both Iraq and the UAR. (Economist, July 8)

Iran Strongly Supports Kuwait. On June 21 the Shah sent a message of congratulations to the Ruler of Kuwait (Kayhan, June 27), and the Cabinet sent a goodwill mission, which discussed with the Ruler the conditions of the "70,000 Iranians" in the Shaykhdom. (Kayhan, July 2, 12)

Ettela'at [pro-government] wrote that Qasim's claim was unfounded; Qasim would have been wiser to support Kuwait against possible penetration by the UAR. Iran would support Kuwait, even if Qasim were to recognize Iran's claim to Bahrain, the paper said. (Ettela'at, June 25, 26)

Turkey Non-committal. On June 28 Foreign Minister Selim Sarper said that Turkey would not intervene. On July 1 President Cemal Gürsel declared that the problem was a matter that concerned the UK. (Cumhuriyet, June 29, July 2)

India Supports Kuwait's Independence. PM Nehru declared in New Delhi on June 30 that India would continue to regard Kuwait as an independent country. The government of India sent a communication to Iraq urging a peaceful approach to the dispute. (Times, July 1, 3)

Nationalist China Congratulates Kuwait. The Ruler received a cable of congratulations from Chiang Kai-shek. (R. Kuweit, June 30 [July 3])

REPORTED IRAQI TROOP CONCENTRATIONS; WEST AND ARABS CAUTION QASSIM

(June 29-30)

Unconfirmed Reports on Iraqi Troop Concentrations. On June 29 reports of Iraqi troop concentrations on the Kuwaiti border appeared in the Cairo press and broadcasts. (R. Cairo, June 29, 30 [July 1])

According to The Times, it was reported in Washington on June 30 that an Iraqi attack on Kuwait was to be launched the next day, but the origin of the information was obscure, and it was denied that such reports had reached the State Department. By the night of June 30, the paper added, there were still no confirmed reports of Iraqi troop movements towards the border, "though there may have been some movement into the Basra area." (Times, July 1)

(However, on July 3, after the British forces had landed, PM Macmillan stated that on June 29 and 30 "evidence accumulated" that reinforcements were moving into the Basra area, while the forces originally garrisoned there were in themselves sufficient to occupy Kuwait. An Iraqi denial came on July 1. See below.)

A report on June 29 that Iraqi torpedo boats in the Shatt-al-Arab had opened fire on Iranian boats carrying cargoes to Kuwait, was denied by Iraq and by the Iranian authorities. (R. Cairo, June 29-IMB, June 30; R. Baghdad, July 1 [3]; Kayhan, July 2)

On June 30 a Kuwaiti government spokesman denied knowledge of Iraqi troop movements towards Kuwait and said that all information to this effect had come from American broadcasts. (R. Amman, July 1-IMB, July 2)

British Precautionary Measures. At midday on June 30, the British Foreign Office stated that in view of the UK's obligations to Kuwait and the open threat to this small independent state of annexation by a more powerful neighbour, "the Government had to take some normal precautionary measures." It had informed friendly governments in the ME and elsewhere of its "deep concern," and had expressed the hope that they would use their moderating influence with the Iraqi government. (Times, July 1)

US Diplomatic Pressure on Iraq. On the same day State Department sources said that the US had brought diplomatic pressure to bear on Iraq not to attempt to seize Kuwait by force. The Times wrote from Washington that though the origin of the reports on Iraqi intentions was obscure, the State Department "obviously believed that some cautionary advice was necessary." Representations were made by the US embassy in Baghdad on June 28, and the Iraqi Ambassador in Washington was summoned on June 30. As a result, assurances were received that the Iraqi government contemplated only peaceful measures in establishing her claim to Kuwait. A State Department spokesman said on June 30 that he trusted this was the official policy of the government of Iraq. (Times, July 1)

UAR Appeal to "Iraqi People." Also on June 30, the UAR issued an appeal to the Iraqi people. Minister of State Abd al-Qādir Hātīm, stated that the UAR had received information that Iraqi armed forces had been ordered to move to the Kuwait border and that "some Baghdad circles" were seriously discussing the possibility of an armed intervention. The UAR government called upon the "great Iraqi people" to remain within the principles of the Arab struggle, which should come "before any personal glory or regional ambition." Some elements knew what they were doing, the UAR believed, while others did not realize the consequences of their actions. The crisis might benefit the enemies of the Arab nation. The UAR was confident that the Iraqi people would not act against their better judgement, and that no Arab would risk leaving the fate of the Arab nation at the mercy of international manoeuvring and imperialist intervention. (Eg. Mail, July 1)

King Saud Cautions Qasim. In a cable on June 30 King Saud called upon Qasim to refrain from taking irresponsible steps in Kuwait. He warned him of the possibility of foreign intervention in Arab affairs, and drew attention to the "concentration of Israeli forces" on the Syrian border, a danger which necessitated a united Arab front. (R. Mecca, July 1 [3])

BRITISH AND SAUDI ARABIAN FORCES ENTER KUWAIT

(July 1)

[At the request of the Kuwaiti government, as published on the morning of July 1, British and Saudi Arabian armed forces entered Kuwait on the same day.]

Kuwait's Request for Military Assistance. On July 1 at 10.30 GMT, Kuwait Radio broadcast a statement by the Supreme Council of the Kuwaiti government announcing that the Ruler had asked for Saudi Arabian and British military assistance—the latter in accordance with the exchange of notes of June 19. The announcement said that Kuwait had refrained from taking any active step since Qasim's declaration, hoping that he would change his mind. When, however, it became clear that "Qasim had begun to mass his forces along the borders" in preparation for invasion, the Ruler had applied for military assistance. King Saud had ordered the despatch of his forces, and the UK had immediately responded. "As soon as the crisis ends these forces will be withdrawn immediately," the statement declared. (R. Kuwait, July 1 [3], text of application for assistance in MEA, Jan 62) [Neither this statement nor that of PM Macmillan, cited below, made it clear at what time the requests for assistance were made.]

According to a British source the request for assistance was made on June 30 (Army Quarterly, Jan 1962), but this was not mentioned in The Times of July 1, reporting on the developments of the previous day.

The next day it was officially stated in Kuwait that the duration of the British forces' stay in Kuwait depended entirely on Qasim, that Kuwait did not contemplate a military treaty with the UK, and that she would welcome the good offices of Arab states or any other help from them to overcome the crisis. (R. Kuwait, July 2 [4])

Kuwaiti Complaint to Security Council. On July 1 the Kuwaiti government sent a complaint to the SC (see below). It cabled Foreign Ministers of Arab states informing them of this step and asking them to support Kuwait at the UN. (R. Kuwait, July 2 [4])

Iraqi Denials of Troop Concentrations. At 11.45 GMT on July 1, 1½ hours after the Kuwaiti announcement, the Iraqi News Agency issued an authorized statement "categorically" denying that there was any concentration of Iraqi troops "at a specific area of the homeland." The statement charged "imperialist circles" with the fabrication of unfounded news to distort Iraqi aims and "fishing in troubled waters." It was stressed that Iraq was "determined to recover the Kuwaiti district by all peaceful means." (R. Baghdad, July 1 [3]; Iraq Times, July 2)

British Forces Land in Kuwait. [British naval and troop movements toward Kuwait had begun already on June 28 or 29—see above.]

On July 1 over 600 marine commandos were flown ashore by helicopters from the commando carrier Bulwark. (The sources available do not state the exact time of these landings; according to Soldier they took place "only hours" after the Kuwaiti request for assistance.) Five days after the first landings, some 6,000–7,000 British troops (according to different sources) were deployed in defence positions in Kuwait, supported by air and naval units. (Hansard C, Vol. 644, Col. 214–17, July 11; Soldier, Sept) [The withdrawal of the British forces was started on July 19.] (For details of the British military operation see pp 91–2.)

On the morning of July 1, PM Macmillan had a talk with Hugh Gaitkell, Leader of the Opposition. Later, opposition leaders made it clear that they supported the government decision. Macmillan also met cabinet ministers and the chiefs of staff to discuss details of the operation. In a speech on the same day he said that he still trusted that threats against Kuwait were "no more than words." (Times, July 3)

Macmillan Explains British Action and Warns Qasim. On July 3 PM Macmillan explained the situation in the House of Commons as follows: "The Iraqi forces at Basra, only about 30 miles from the Kuwait border, were clearly quite sufficient to occupy Kuwait by a rapid movement against the modest Kuwait (sic). On June 29 and 30 evidence accumulated... that reinforcements, especially reinforcements of armour, were moving towards Basra. In these circumstances the Ruler felt it his duty to make a formal urgent request for British assistance under the exchange of Notes of June 19. Her Majesty's Government responded at once. British forces were landed in Kuwait, on the morning of July 1."

The PM declared: "Her Majesty's Government earnestly hope that counsels of moderation will prevail in Baghdad. Our forces are in Kuwait purely for defence purposes and in accordance with our treaty obligations. They will be withdrawn as soon as the Ruler considers that the independence of Kuwait is no longer threatened. They present no threat to Iraq, with whom we wish to maintain the friendliest possible relations. I am convinced that it was the duty of HM Government to act as they did."

In reply to questions, the PM again referred to the sending of troops as "what I hope will lead to the Government of Iraq having second thoughts." (For source see below.)

British Opposition Supports Move, Proposes UN Force. Hugh Gaitkell declared that, while the Labour Party approved the government's handling of the situation, they thought the UK should propose a UN force to protect Kuwait, which would help to "get rid of misrepresentation" of the UK action. Macmillan said he did not rule out any solution by a UN force, but "first things first." "The force that has been landed is at present the only effective method of maintaining the independence of Kuwait," he declared. It might be possible, at a later stage, to support the independence of Kuwait by arrangements "made upon a wider basis." (Hansard C, Vol. 643, Col. 1006–1012, July 3)

Saudi Arabian Forces in Kuwait. Saudi Arabian troops arrived in Kuwait on July 1 and 2 (Times, July 3). Accompanied by Kuwaiti officers, they took up positions in the triangular area where the borders of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iraq meet (R. Cairo, July 2–IMB, July 3). There were conflicting reports on the strength of these forces. Cairo sources said that they numbered over a thousand men (R. Cairo, July 4–IMB, July 5; Eg. Gaz., Aug 3). Another report said they numbered 150 (Hayat, Aug 8). [The smaller figure was probably nearer the truth.]

Liaison Between British and Saudi Arabian Forces Denied. On July 5 Baghdad Radio, as well as UAR sources, said that the Saudi Arabian troops were under British command (R. Baghdad, July 5 [7]; Hayat, July 11). The Times, however, reported that they were not in liaison with the British command, because there were no diplomatic relations between the two countries. (Times, July 5)

The Saudi Arabian embassy in Cairo denied these reports (MENA, July 6 [7]). On July 8 a Saudi Arabian paper wrote that the presence of Saudi Arabian and British forces in Kuwait did not signify any rapprochement between the two governments. (R. Mecca, July 8 [11])

The presence of Saudi Arabian forces in Kuwait was denounced in Iraq as "an unforgivable crime" and

"treasonable behaviour," for which they "will have to pay dearly." (Thaurrah, July 6, 7)

UAR-Saudi Arabian Consultations. On July 1 the Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister, Ibrahim al-Suwai, came to Egypt carrying a message to Abdel Nasser from King Saud. After a meeting also attended by Abd al-Hakim Amer, Vice-President and head of the armed forces, he left for home carrying a reply from Abdel Nasser, who, he stated, was in complete accord with the King's views and had expressed his anxiety to preserve Kuwait's independence. (R. Cairo, July 1, MENA, July 1, 2 [3])

Further British Statements on Iraqi Aggressive Intentions Denied. On July 3 the British C-in-C in the ME, Air Marshal Sir Charles Elworthy, alleged that Iraqi infantry were not far from the Kuwait border and that Iraqi armour was massing in Basra. Part of this movement had taken place before the British landing and part since, he said. He thought an Iraqi attack seemed unlikely, but the next day Brig. Derek Horsford, Commander of British ground forces in Kuwait said that he could see no reason to believe that Qasim was not going to attack. (Times, July 4, 6)

On July 6 Qasim denied troop movements. The proof that Iraq had no aggressive intentions was that he could have subdued Kuwait long before he made his claim on June 25, he said. (R. Baghdad, July 8-10)

No Armed Incidents Between British and Iraqi Troops. There were no incidents with the Iraqi army during the time that British troops were in Kuwait, except on July 25, when three British soldiers were captured by the Iraqis near the border. The soldiers said they had lost their way, while the Iraqis claimed that they had been engaged in sabotage. The soldiers were held without trial until Dec 13, when they were released by Qasim's orders. (R. Baghdad, July 27 [29]; Times, July 29; Daily Express, Dec 14)

ARAB REACTIONS TO BRITISH INTERVENTION (July 1-10)

UAR: Qasim Accused of Collusion with UK. Cairo Radio accused Qasim of hinging about the "imperialist" intervention in Kuwait by falling into a British trap. The UK, seeking a pretext to return to Kuwait, had instructed "certain circles in Iraq" to suggest to the officials there that the time was opportune to claim Kuwait. (R. Cairo, July 1, 2 [4, 5])

Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, wrote that, by declaring that he did not intend to use force only after the British forces had landed in Kuwait, Qasim had paved the way for British imperialism to remain in Kuwait for ever. (Ahram, July 2)

Al-Gumhuriyah said that the fact that Iraq continued with economic talks in London while condemning British intervention in Kuwait showed that Qasim had an understanding with the UK in the economic as well as other fields. (Gumhuriyah, July 3, 4)

UAR Demands British Withdrawal But Opposes United Arab Force. On July 5 the UAR issued an official statement denouncing the "large-scale military operations carried out by the British troops in the Arab [Persian] Gulf area and in Kuwait." The way the British had acted indicated "that the whole operation, if not predetermined, was at least dependent on the first opportunity for its justification." The UAR regarded the British troop concentrations as "an actual menace to the Iraqi people and the entire Arab nation." The UAR saw no reason to maintain British troops in Kuwait, as Iraq had already renounced her claims and she insisted on the immediate withdrawal of the troops as a condition for Kuwait's admission to the UN. (Eg. Gaz., July 6)

[In the Security Council the UAR submitted a resolution calling for the withdrawal of the British troops. See below.]

An Al-Ahram article commenting on Hugh Gaitskill's proposal for a UN force (see above), said: "We do not want Kuwait to become either a British or an international colony" or to share the fate of the Congo; Arab states should agree to preserve Kuwait's independence. (Ahram, July 4)

UAR Reasons For Not Supplying Military Assistance. On July 5 Hassanein Haykal explained why the UAR did not send forces to Kuwait, which would have made British forces unnecessary: (1) The UAR had received no such request from Kuwait and did not want to "arouse suspicion"; (2) The Ruler of Kuwait asked for British aid and the UAR could "never agree to participate in the same mission with the imperialist forces"; (3) The UAR did not believe in Arab forces facing each other in combat readiness. (Ahram, July 5)

Western sources believed, however, that as Abdel Nasser had always made a point of opposing imperialism and had often referred to the shaykhdoms as "imperialist lackeys," he could not afford to seem less anti-imperialist than Qasim. (Time, July 7; NYT, July 10)

Question of Passage of British Ships to Kuwait Through Suez. The Times wrote that "Port Said has taken very calmly" the arrival of British destroyers in the Suez Canal (Times, July 6). Baghdad Radio reported that the UAR authorities had provided all facilities for a speedy passage of the ships through the Canal. (R. Baghdad, July 4, 5 [7]). MENA published a denial of these reports. (MENA, July 5 [7])

Al-Ahram wrote on July 10 that the UAR would prevent military ships of any country from passing through the Canal if engaged in an invasion of an Arab country. "But so far not a single shot has been fired in the Kuwait dispute." Therefore, the paper wrote, the UAR could not allow itself to be pushed into a war with the UK for no clear reason. (Ahram, July 10)

Iraq Sees UAR Embarrassed Position. The UAR's denunciations of British troop concentrations were interpreted in Iraq as meaning that she had undertaken "a reappraisal of her position," but her attitude was still regarded as contradictory. The UAR was said to be "standing with imperialism against Iraq and with Iraq against imperialism" (Thaurrah, July 7). Another comment said that the UAR pronouncements were not "an expression of sincerity to the Arab nation" so much as "an oral arrangement to get out of an embarrassing situation in which the UAR government found itself landed after it had sided with the imperialists." (Sawt al-Ahram, July 9)

Yemen. On July 6 the Deputy of the Imam of Yemen in Cairo issued a statement on the British forces in Kuwait similar to that issued by the UAR the day before, see above. (R. Cairo, July 6 [8])

THE ISSUE IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

(July 1-7)

Kuwait Complaint of Iraqi Threat. On July 1 Kuwait cabled the Security Council complaining "in respect of the situation arising from the threat by Iraq to the territorial independence of Kuwait, which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security" (S/4844). Kuwait requested an urgent meeting of the Council, with the support of the UK in a letter from its representative to the President of the SC. (S/4845)

Iraqi Complaint of British Threat. On July 2 the Iraqi representative at the UN, Dr Adnan Pachachi, asked the SC to meet to consider "Complaint by the Government of the Republic of Iraq in respect of the situation arising out of the armed threat by the United Kingdom to the independence and security of Iraq, which is likely to endanger the maintenance of peace and security." (S/4846)

Iraq also sent a letter declaring that the complaint signed by "an individual who calls himself the Secretary of State of Kuwait" was not receivable, as Kuwait was an integral part of Iraq and "is not and never has been an independent state." (S/4848)

UK: Role of Forces Defensive Only. At the SC meeting of July 2 both complaints were placed on the agenda. The UK representative, Sir Patrick Dean, described the developments that had led the Ruler of Kuwait to ask for British assistance. Dean reiterated his government's official statement of July 1 (see above), and declared that British forces "will be withdrawn as soon as the Ruler considers the threat to the independence of his country is over." The British forces presented no threat to Iraq. "Our forces could only be employed in a combat role if Kuwait were to be attacked from across the border," he declared. [For source see below.]

UAR: Seeks Arab Solution. [The UAR was a member of the SC.] The UAR representative, Umar Luthi, said that the UAR hoped that this problem would be settled in accordance with "Arab traditions and principles." "We consider that no Arab is entitled to jeopardize the security of the Arab nation by exposing himself to possible imperialist intervention unless such action is necessitated by legitimate requirements of the struggle of the Arab nation." [For source see below.]

Iraq and USSR Condemn "British Aggression" and Deny Kuwaiti Independence. [Iraq was not a member of the SC.] The Iraqi representative questioned the "motives of the UK in bringing the complaint to the SC" as "the Government of Iraq has repeatedly stated that it would employ peaceful means to settle this difficulty and has denied the reports of troop concentrations." It was clear, he declared, that the UK intended to justify the "blatant act of aggression" it had committed by landing its forces in Kuwait. (S/PV 957, July 2)

The SC met again on July 5, and Kuwait asked to be allowed to participate in the discussions (S/4851). Zorin, the USSR representative, said that the USSR did not support the request. An Iraqi request to be allowed to address the Council on the question of Kuwait's participation was supported in the vote by the USSR alone. Zorin stated that "the delegate of Kuwait could scarcely be deemed to be acting as the representative of a sovereign state, inasmuch as effective power in the country is being exercised by the British occupation troops." The Iraqi representative made the same point. He reiterated that "the alleged defence of Kuwait is not, and has never been, the real reason for the British landing," and that "preparations to send armed forces to the Gulf area were made before the present crisis erupted." He urged the SC to "ensure the immediate withdrawal of this aggressive force," claiming that the UK aimed to create "dissension among the Arab states," and was using "gunboat diplomacy" to protect her oil interests and "consolidate British influence and power in the Gulf." He was supported by the USSR representative, who asked the SC to condemn Britain's intervention and call upon her to immediately withdraw her forces from Kuwait.

The Kuwaiti delegate agreed that "foreign" troops should be withdrawn, but only after "sufficient guarantees have been given that our land will not be violated in any way." He submitted documents to prove Iraq's previous recognition of Kuwait's sovereignty. (S/PV 958, July 5)

British Resolution Welcomes Arab League Action. On July 6 the UK presented a resolution calling "upon all states to respect the independence and territorial integrity of Kuwait" and urging "that all concerned should work for peace and tranquillity in the area." The SC was asked to welcome "any constructive steps which may be taken by the Arab League on the line of the present resolution." (S/4855)

UAR Resolution Supported by USSR, Calls for British Withdrawal. At the final meeting on July 7, the UAR also presented a resolution urging "that the question be solved by peaceful means" and calling on the UK "to withdraw immediately its forces from Kuwait." (S/4856)

The UAR representative explained that his draft resolution took into consideration the Iraqi undertakings to use only peaceful means in solving the question. He insisted that the presence of British forces further aggravated the problem.

The UK representative replied that the UAR, while supporting Kuwait's independence, was denying her one of the main attributes of independence, "the right to call on a friend and ally in time of trouble."

The UK resolution was supported by seven members, (Chile, Nationalist China, France, Liberia, Turkey, the UK and the USA). Ceylon, Ecuador and the UAR abstained. The USSR representative cast his veto against the resolution, on the ground that it made no reference to the immediate withdrawal of British forces, which, he said, was the main requirement of the situation.

The UAR resolution was supported by Ceylon, the UAR and the USSR, the rest of the members abstaining. (S/PV 960, July 7)

US Supports British and Saudi Arabian Military Assistance. The US representative fully supported the "desire of the Kuwaiti Government and the Kuwaiti people to remain fully independent and fully free." The US considered that the UK and Saudi Arabia "have acted appropriately and that these actions will tend to ensure the preservation of peace in the area." Noting that the US had been informed by Iraq that it did not intend to resort to force in Kuwait, he said he hoped the Ruler of Kuwait "may soon receive assurances to the same effect from the Government of Iraq." (S/PV 960, July 7)

Meeting Inconclusive. Summing up, the President of the Council, Dr Leopoldo Benites (Ecuador), expressed "deep concern" that no resolution had been adopted while a "tense situation that might endanger international peace and security prevailed." He said that the SC would remain "vigilant" and that it would be reconvened if it became necessary. (S/PV 960, July 7)

UAR Comment: Understanding of Qassim, Criticism of Kuwait. Commenting on the SC debate, The Egyptian Gazette wrote that Kuwait's insistence on international safeguards for her independence and on Qassim's renunciation of his claim as conditions for her asking the British to withdraw had led to a stalemate. Qassim could "scarcely drop all his claims before the question has even come to the point of either private or public Arab discussion" and "even if his position at the head of the Baghdad government was more secure than it is, it would be political suicide." Qassim could not "negotiate under duress, which is what the presence of British troops in Kuwait amounts to." The paper added that the Iraqi government had declared its policy "sufficiently firmly" by "any standards" to allow for the withdrawal of the British forces and the "opening of discussions among the Arab countries themselves." (Eg. Gaz., July 9)

Western Comment. The New York Times said that the UAR had avoided in the SC "an espousal of either side's position" (NYT, July 6). The paper wrote later that USSR support for the UAR resolution was contrary to reports of "a cooling in relations between Moscow and Cairo." The paper believed that the USSR had meant to submit an amendment to the British proposal, but had later decided to back the UAR draft instead (NYT, July 8). The Times wrote that British initiative in presenting a resolution "had the effect of forestalling a possible motion by Russia" seeking to condemn the UK for her intervention" (Times, July 7). The Economist wrote that the USSR, which had earlier been non-committal on the Kuwait dispute, had, after the British military intervention, swung decisively to the Iraqi side by refusing to allow "the Kuwait area" to present its case to the SC. (Economist, July 8)

Commenting on the USSR attitude, Qassim said on July 14 that Iraq regarded the Soviet Union as her friend and was proud of this friendship. (R. Baghdad, July 14 [17])

INTER-ARAB MOVES

(July 1-11)

League Secretary-General's Efforts to Solve Dispute Fail. While the Security Council was debating the Kuwait question, the SG of the Arab League, Abd al-Khaliq Hassūnah, was conducting talks in Baghdad, Kuwait and Ta'if. On July 1 he arrived in Baghdad, where he had talks with Qassim and Foreign Minister Jawād. (Iraq Times, July 4, 5)

Hassūnah failed to bring about a change in the Iraqi attitude; he was reportedly told that Iraq would withdraw from the League if Kuwait's membership was approved. (Times, July 4)

On July 4 Hassūnah went on to Kuwait, where he held talks with the Ruler. The next day he visited Saudi Arabia and conferred with the King, who reaffirmed his support for Kuwait's independence and her admission to the League. (R. Kuwait, July 5 [7]; Bilad, July 5, 6)

On his return to Cairo on July 6, Hassūnah said he would continue his talks with representatives in Cairo of other Arab countries. (MENA, July 6 [8])

called an extraordinary meeting at ambassadorial level for July 4 in Cairo to discuss Kuwait's admission. On July 2 and 3, the acting SG, Isma'il ad-Dardiri, continued his efforts to reach an understanding between the delegations before the meeting.

Meanwhile Hassūnah (who returned to Cairo only on July 6) urged the postponement of the meeting until the completion of his talks. (Hayat, Eg. Gaz., July 4)

On July 4 the League Council met, all member-states being represented, under the chairmanship of the Moroccan delegate, Abd al-Khaliq Torrès.

As reported, heated discussions revealed the following situation: Iraq threatened to resign from the League if Kuwait was admitted. (This was denied, however, by Baghdad Radio.) Saudi Arabia threatened to resign if Kuwait's request was rejected. Morocco, Lebanon, Tunisia and Sudan undertook to straighten out the differences and bring about a postponement of the decision until Hassūnah's return. This was agreed in spite of Saudi Arabian objections, and it was decided to hold a further meeting on July 12. (R. Baghdad, July 4-1MB, July 5; Eg. Gaz., Hayat, July 5)

The Iraqi delegate was reported to have said that Iraq's opposition would prevent Kuwait's admission, as according to the League Charter, new members had to be accepted unanimously. (Hayat, July 5)

Attempts at Mediation. [The first Arab country where mediation was contemplated was Lebanon (see above).]

It was reported that Lebanon was responsible for Iraq's willingness to hold talks with the Arab League SG. On July 3 Slim said that Lebanon's efforts had been rewarded, as the Iraqi government had announced that it would not resort to force. (Hayat, July 2, 4)

It was reported that Hajj Amin al-Husseini [the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem], who visited Iraq during the first week of July, delivered a message from King Saud to Qassim proposing a meeting. (Hayat, July 4; Mid. Mir., July 8; ANA, July 9 [11])

On July 11 informed circles in Tunisia stated that Tunisia would send a delegation, headed by her Foreign Minister, to Iraq and Kuwait to mediate. The next day, however, it was reported that Tunisia had informed Iraq that the departure of the delegation had been postponed in view of the Bizerta crisis. (Hayat, July 12; MENA, July 12 [14])

Kuwait Demands Renunciation of Iraqi Claim and Guarantees for Her Independence. On July 6 the Kuwaiti government expressed satisfaction at the Iraqi undertakings not to resort to force, but demanded that the statements be followed by "practical steps" and that Qassim "must announce clearly through his delegates to the UN and the Arab League that he had abandoned his ambitions and his claim to annex Kuwait."

The Kuwaiti statement also said that, while submitting her case to the Security Council and the Arab League, Kuwait welcomed "any peaceful measures that may restore conditions to normal and unite the ranks and opinions of the Arabs." This could be achieved through effective international guarantees for the protection of Kuwaiti security. The Kuwaiti government and people "wanted nothing more than the withdrawal of foreign troops from their territory following the removal of this cloud." (R. Kuwait, July 6 [8])

This statement was broadcast on Kuwait Radio for three days running, with supporting comment justifying the Ruler's request for British aid. (BBCM, July 8, 10)

UAR Attacks Shaykhs of Kuwait. On July 5 the Egyptian Al-Akhbar attacked the "Kuwaiti Shaykhs," declaring that they had asked for British assistance solely in order to protect their position and wealth. The paper differentiated between the Kuwaiti government, which had acted from "ignorance, disorientation and pride," and the Kuwaiti people, who, the paper claimed, had "strong emotional ties" with the UAR and trust for the "Arab national leader" (Abdel Nasser). (Akhbar, July 5)

Rumours of Contemplated Federation of Kuwait, Iraq, Jordan and Saudi Arabia Denied. On July 7-8 Cairo sources quoted what they said were Reuters' reports that Kuwait was considering the possibility of union with Saudi Arabia (R. Cairo, July 7, 8-IMB, July 9, 10). The rumours were not officially denied by the Kuwaiti government. (Falastin, July 8)

On July 11 The Egyptian Gazette featured an AP report that Jordan contemplated a plan to settle the Kuwait issue, based on a federation of Jordan, Iraq, Kuwait and possibly Saudi Arabia, in which the participants would retain complete internal sovereignty. This plan would leave Kuwait with authority over its internal affairs, satisfy Qasim's claim, and enable Jordan to dispense with foreign aid (Eg. Gaz., July 11). This rumour was denied by the Jordanian PM, Bahjat al-Talhuni. (R. Amman, July 11 [13])

Kuwait Indicates Willingness to Share Oil Revenues with Arab States. On July 10 a Kuwaiti government mission, headed by the Minister of Finance and Oil Affairs, Shaykh Jabir Ahmad al-Sabāh, went to Cairo and other Arab capitals to explain Kuwait's position and secure support. The mission indicated Kuwait's willingness to share her oil income in return for such support. (BBC in Arabic, July 9-IMB, July 10; R. Cairo, July 10 [12])

[A first step to enable Arab countries to benefit from her oil income was taken by the Kuwaiti government in 1960. In July 1960 Kuwait lent Jordan £1 million (MER 1960, p. 405). She also agreed to subscribe £E5 million towards the establishment of an Arab Development Fund.]

The New York Times commented that this diplomatic campaign was likely "to spread Kuwait's wealth more evenly throughout the ME" and that Arab countries, especially the UAR, would press Kuwait to inject oil royalties into development projects. (NYT, July 10)

On July 3 Gaitskill had suggested in the House of Commons that the UK propose to the Arab countries the creation of a fund to which oil-producing countries would contribute for ME development. He warned against the dangers involved in "the great disparity of wealth" between ME countries, and said that the Ruler of Kuwait had indicated his willingness to subscribe to such a fund. (Hansard C Vol. 643 Col. 1007-8, July 3)

The Economist also pointed out that the Persian Gulf Shaykhdoms and Kuwait should realize that if there was to be peace in their part of the world they should cooperate in distributing their wealth to combat ME poverty, and that this should be the UK's aim too. (Economist, July 8)

The Kuwaiti delegation arrived in Cairo on July 11 and was received by Abdel Nasser (Eg. Gaz., July 12). The New York Times wrote that Western experts warned that a "subtle game of blackmail" was being played against Kuwait, and that the Ruler might be given to understand "that the price of Cairo's political-protection is the redirection of Kuwait's oil revenues from London to investments in the Arab world." Lebanese observers thought the delegation would meet with difficulties in Cairo for "committing the unpardonable sin in Arab politics" of welcoming British intervention. (NYT, July 11)

From Cairo the delegation proceeded to Sudan, Libya, Jordan and Lebanon. Shaykh Jabir made it clear that Kuwait was willing to use part of her oil revenues to finance development projects in these countries (Mid. East, July 29). The mission returned to Kuwait on July 26 (R. Kuwait, July 26 [28]). (See also farther below, on the question of Kuwaiti financial assistance to the Arab countries after the arrival of the Arab force in Kuwait.)

Attempts to Postpone League Council Meeting Fail. When the date for the scheduled League Council meeting (July 12) approached, Iraq and Jordan asked for its postponement.

The Iraqi delegate, Abd al-Hussein al-Qutaybi, said that Iraq felt that Arab countries should turn their attention from "family quarrels" to warding off dangers from outside, such as the buildup of British forces, the Israeli rockets, and the French attitude in Algeria (Iraq Times, July 10). The Jordanian delegation applied for a postponement for consultation with their government. (Hayat, July 11)

Saudi Arabia, the UAR, Yemen, Morocco, Tunisia, Libya and Sudan opposed any postponement.

Saudi Arabia insisted on the discussion of Kuwait's admission without delay; in its opinion this subject should not be mixed up with the question of the dispute between Kuwait and Iraq. (MENA, July 11 [14]; Hayat, July 12)

The UAR attitude, however, was that the question of Kuwait's admission should be coupled with the immediate withdrawal of British forces. Earlier Al-Ahram had severely criticized the Arab League, saying that it had proved "absolutely incapable of dealing with the Kuwait crisis in a manner fully compatible with the dictates of Arab interests" (Ahram, July 6). The Egyptian Gazette wrote that the presence of British forces would affect the League's discussions, because Kuwait would be tempted to speak from a position of strength and Iraq would not be as amenable to mediation as she might otherwise have been. (Eg. Gaz., July 11)

The Iraqi delegate said that Lebanon and Yemen supported his demand to postpone the meeting, but it was disclosed that Lebanon had decided against postponement (Hayat, July 12), as did the Yemeni delegate after his talks with Hassūnah (Eg. Gaz., July 10). Al-Haydi reported that a compromise was reached between the two viewpoints by deciding to hold the meeting as scheduled, but to postpone the decision on Kuwait's admission to another session. (Hayat, July 11)

On July 11 MENA reported from Arab League sources that a four-point agenda would be discussed at the meeting: consolidation of Kuwait's independence; the immediate withdrawal of British forces from Kuwait; admission of Kuwait to the Arab League; and adequate Arab guarantees against any threat to Kuwait. It was reported that these points would be dealt with as an indivisible unit. (Eg. Gaz., July 12)

ARAB LEAGUE COUNCIL MEETING OF JULY 12

The Arab League Council met on July 12 and 13 at ambassadorial level, under the chairmanship of Abd al-Khalīq Torrès of Morocco. All member-states were represented.

Kuwait Proposes Arab Force. Kuwait submitted a memorandum proposing two alternative conditions for the withdrawal of British forces: (a) That Qasim should renounce, both in the League and in the UN, any intention of annexing Kuwait, or (b) that an Arab force be created to replace British troops in protecting Kuwait's independence. (Hayat, Eg. Gaz., July 13)

It was reported that the proposal for an Arab force had been brought up by the Kuwaiti delegation in a meeting with President Abdel Nasser the day before. (Times, July 12; BBCM, July 13)

Arab Force Suggested in British Press. Earlier, the establishment of an Arab force in Kuwait had been suggested in the British press. The Guardian commented on July 3 that the British forces, having successfully deterred Qasim from the physical annexation of Kuwait, should be withdrawn as soon as possible. The paper suggested that its place might be taken by Arab forces, though few Arab rulers were disinterested. The Ruler, The Guardian said, already had Saudi Arabian troops on his territory and he should feel safer if a variety of Arab governments, with inevitably conflicting interests, sent forces to join them. (Guardian, July 3)

UAR for Arab Force Without Her Participation; Iraq Against. The UAR representative at the League Council declared that, though the UAR welcomed Kuwait's position, the first alternative depended on the wishes of Qasim alone. Therefore it declared its "complete and sincere readiness and full agreement" to send Arab forces to Kuwait. He added that, in view of "unusual Israeli movements" near the Syrian border, "some Arab countries which are bordering Israel might prefer to leave their troops where they are..." The other Arab states may undertake to form the force, with the sincere cooperation of the UAR. (R. Cairo, July 12 [14]; Eg. Gaz., July 13)

Al-Hayât reported that in the morning the UAR had indicated her willingness to participate in the force, and had changed her attitude in the course of the day, because friction had suddenly arisen between the UAR and the Saudi Arabian and Kuwaiti delegations.

The Iraqi delegate reportedly declared that if an Arab force were landed in Kuwait, Iraq would resign from the League and regard any country participating as committing a hostile act against her, to which she would react accordingly. When discussions on the force continued, the Iraqi representative left the conference hall. (Hayat, July 13, 14)

Lebanon's position was that the Arab force should be discussed by a meeting on at least Foreign Ministers' level. (MENA, July 13 [15])

At a later meeting the UAR representative said that it would be suicidal for the League to evade the Kuwait problem. To end its meeting without a decision would be equivalent to a decision to keep the British troops in Kuwait. There was a sharp exchange between the UAR and Iraqi representatives, the former accusing Iraq of not cooperating with the League in getting the British forces out of Kuwait. (For sources see below.)

Moroccan Proposal. At this point the Moroccan delegation presented a resolution, calling on Kuwait to ask the British to withdraw and on Iraq to renounce any intention of annexing Kuwait by force. Arab states would undertake to admit Kuwait to League membership, to help her to gain admission to the UN, to give effective assistance for her protection in accordance with the Kuwaiti memorandum, and to support any wish by Kuwait for unity or federation with other Arab countries in accordance with the League Charter. A Tunisian amendment called for a week's postponement to enable delegates to consult their governments. (R. Cairo, July 13 [15]; Hayat, July 14, 15)

Council Adjourned in Spite of Saudi and UAR Opposition. The Saudi Arabian delegate objected to a postponement. At this point the Iraqi representative proposed, on instructions received from his government, that the discussion be indefinitely postponed. The UAR and Saudi Arabia vigorously objected, other members also expressing dissatisfaction. The proposal was not put to the vote in view of the Moroccan-Tunisian proposal already before the Council. (MENA, July 13 [15]; Eg. Gaz., July 14)

The Tunisian proposal was then passed, Morocco, Jordan, Tunisia, Sudan, Libya, Lebanon and Iraq voting in favour, while the UAR and Saudi Arabia voted against; Yemen abstained (Ahram, July 14). The UAR representative explained later that the UAR objected to postponement because it would prolong the stay of British troops on Arab soil.

The meeting was adjourned until July 20. (R. Cairo, July 13 [15]; Eg. Mail, July 15)

Summary of League Members' Positions. During the interval between the League sessions of July 13 and 20, the position of the members was believed to be as follows:

Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Libya and Yemen insisted on Kuwait's admission, disregarding the Iraqi reaction.

Iraq reportedly threatened to resign from the League if Kuwait was admitted and to regard the dispatch of Arab forces as an act of aggression against her. (On July 19, however, Qasim said Iraq had no such intentions—see below.)

Kuwait insisted on Qasim's renunciation of his claim over her territory and stipulated, as a condition, the withdrawal of British troops, their replacement by effective Arab forces, capable of facing Iraqi threats.

The UAR was ready to support Kuwait's admission, but insisted that she should guarantee in advance that the British forces would be withdrawn. At first the UAR declined to send forces to Kuwait. It was reported that Saudi Arabia pressed her to send at least a token force, and later she agreed to participate on two conditions: that her troops comprise the majority of the Arab force and that they should not be engaged in combat roles.

Lebanon, Jordan, Tunisia and Sudan were ready to support Kuwait's admission provided unanimous agreement could be reached, including Iraq's consent. Al-Hayât thought that this attitude was merely a pretext and that their major consideration was to avoid antagonizing Iraq. (Hayat, July 14, 15, 16, 18)

Meanwhile, contacts between heads of delegations continued. It was reported that proposals to ask for UN troops were rejected. Arab League sources revealed that efforts were being made to make the meeting of July 20 a decisive one as further delay would give the impression that the League was incapable of solving Arab problems. (Eg. Gaz., July 18, 19)

Qasim Calls on British to Withdraw and Renews Claim to Kuwait. On July 14, the anniversary of the Iraqi revolution, Qasim demanded that the UK quit Kuwait and called on the Arab countries to close their ranks against imperialism. He declared that Iraq had no dispute with Kuwait, but with the British, who "intended to create a permanent base on Arab soil in order to strike against us." He again gave a detailed account of Iraq's historical claims to "Kuwait district" and declared that Iraq would not "budge an inch as far as her rights were concerned." (R. Baghdad, July 15 [17]; Iraq Times, July 18)

On July 18 Qasim declared that, besides wishing to exploit Kuwaiti oil, the UK was afraid that her economy would collapse were Kuwait to withdraw her extensive funds from British banks. Qasim demanded the abrogation of the British-Kuwaiti agreement of June 19 and "the return of Kuwait to the motherland." (Iraq Times, July 19)

Qasim ordered his Minister of Industry to work out industrial programmes for the "Kuwait district" (Iraq Times, July 19) and the Iraqi military governor, Maj.-Gen. Ahmad Salih al-Abdi, instructed the Basra authorities to stop all legal proceedings against Kuwaitis who had violated passport and residence regulations. Thus, they would, in effect, enjoy the same rights and privileges as Iraqis. (Times, July 8)

Qasim Attacks Arab States, League and Arab Forces for Kuwait. Speaking to Lebanese journalists on July 19, Qasim attacked the attitude of the Arab states on the Kuwait issue. Saudi Arabia, he said, had seized a large part of Kuwait under the Uqair Treaty of 1922 (see Background, above), and was afraid of losing this area were Kuwait to be returned to Iraq.

The Arab League, he said, "served the interests of the imperialists," and should "either render free and true service or abandon its work." Nevertheless, he said, Iraq did not intend to withdraw from the League; on the contrary, he aimed to strengthen and reform it. Commenting on the proposed Arab force, Qasim said that disgrace would befall forces that defended imperialist interests. Some Arab states, he said, were exploiting the crisis for their own advantage, hoping to profit from loans or grants [from Kuwait]. He said that he had been offered "by some one" ID 40 million a year in exchange for renouncing his claim to Kuwait, but, he declared, "We do not sell our homeland."

Qasim praised Lebanon's attitude and paid tribute to her cooperation with Iraq. (R. Baghdad, July 19 [21]; Hayat, Iraq Times, July 20)

Qasim Attacked by Kuwait and UAR. An official Kuwaiti statement denied that Kuwait had made the 40 million dinars' offer (R. Kuwait, July 20 [22]). Kuwait Radio broadcast attacks on Qasim, accusing him of abnormality and excessive personal ambition and advising him to "annex Palestine" instead of displaying "bravado" against Kuwait. (R. Kuwait, July 19 [21])

Preparing Legal Grounds for Kuwait's Admission. On July 18 it was disclosed that a legal memorandum had been drawn up at Arab League headquarters declaring that membership of the League was the right of every Arab state following the declaration of its independence; the Arab League was not empowered to discuss this membership and its only duty was to welcome a new member. The memorandum noted that this view had been adopted by Iraq herself during discussions on the League Charter. (MENA, July 18 [20])

On the other hand, Iraq maintained that Kuwait's admission would violate the Charter, which, she claimed, had been unanimously interpreted as precluding the admission of new states otherwise than by unanimous vote. (Mustaqbal, July 19)

ARAB LEAGUE COUNCIL MEETING OF JULY 20

Kuwait Admitted. Kuwait was admitted to League membership by a majority vote at the Council's meeting in Cairo on July 20. The Iraqi delegate protested against the proposal and left before the voting. In his absence the vote was considered to be unanimous. (Arab Obs., July 23)

The Council adopted a Saudi Arabian draft amending the Moroccan resolution of July 13 (see above p 132 a). It read:

"The Arab League Council has examined the application of the Kuwaiti government for joining the Arab League and approved the following:

- "1. (a) The Kuwaiti government undertakes to ask for the withdrawal of the British forces from her territory as soon as possible.
- "(b) The Iraqi government pledges not to use force in annexing Kuwait to Iraq.
- "(c) Every desire expressed by Kuwait for unity or federation with Arab League member states in accordance with the League Charter should be supported.
- "2. (a) Kuwait should be welcomed as member of the Arab League.
- "(b) Kuwait should be supported in its application for UN membership.
- "3. (a) The Arab countries undertake to render practical assistance for the safeguarding of the independence of Kuwait at her request. The Council entrusts the SG of the Arab League to take the necessary measures for the carrying out of this decision immediately." (Eg. Gaz., Hayat, July 21)

Iraq Proposes Annulment of June 19 Agreement and Withdraws From Session. In the discussion Iraq expressed reservations as to points 1(b) and (c). During the discussion on point 2(a), the Iraqi delegation withdrew. (Arab Obs., July 23)

Earlier the Iraqi delegation submitted a draft resolution calling upon Arab countries to take "joint action for the annulment of the agreement of June 19 between the UK and Kuwait and the withdrawal of British forces from Kuwait." It also called for the postponement of the discussion on Kuwait's membership until the Sept session, provided that by then the British forces had been evacuated (Eg. Gaz., July 21; R. Baghdad, July 23 [25]). The Iraqi proposal was not put to the vote as the Iraqi delegation had withdrawn. After the voting on the Saudi Arabian proposal, the Kuwaiti delegate, Abd al-Aziz Hussein, was invited to take his place in the Council chamber. (Eg. Gaz., July 21)

Iraq announced that she would boycott all League meetings in which Kuwait was represented. (Zaman, July 20, 21)

Hassūnah to Start Contacts for Formation of Arab Force. Following the session, SG Hassūnah announced that he would begin to make contacts immediately with a view to the formation of an Arab force to replace British troops in Kuwait. (Eg. Gaz., Hayat, July 21)

Al Hayat wrote that, although the decision adopted did not specifically mention the despatch of an Arab force, it was "clearly understood" that the member states had intended it [in para 3a]. (Hayat, July 22)

Iraq Protests, Demands Hassūnah's Replacement. The Iraqi delegate issued a statement in Cairo denouncing the League's decision, which, he said, showed disrespect for the League's Charter. He also referred to "bribes which the shaykhdoms are offering." An Iraqi Foreign Ministry spokesman said the government of Iraq regarded the resolution as "null and void." (Iraq Times, July 23; Mid. Mir., July 29)

It was only on Aug 10, however, that Iraq formally reacted against the League's decision. In a Foreign Office memorandum sent to members of the League, Iraq demanded that the resolution be revoked, that member-states should attempt to have the June 19 agreement abrogated, and that the post of League SG be entrusted to someone "solicitous for Arab interests."

The memorandum stated that under the prevailing circumstances it would be difficult for Iraq to fulfil her obligations to the League. Iraq regarded the decision calling on Arab states to render practical assistance to preserve Kuwait's independence, which was "later interpreted by the Secretariat-General as the despatch of Arab troops to Kuwait," as "a clear violation of the Arab League's Charter and its principles." Kuwait's admission to the League constituted a grave violation of the Charter, which specified the admission of sovereign states only, whereas Kuwait, "being a part of Iraq, was neither a state nor an independent entity."

The decision, it was stated, was also invalid on the grounds that it was taken against Iraq's opposition, in violation of the Charter provision that no decision would be forced upon a state. The "strange enthusiasm" shown by the SG in persuading members to accept this decision was "unsuitable to his role and attitude of neutrality." (R. Baghdad, Aug 13 [15]; Iraq Times, Aug 14)

Earlier, an Iraqi paper [for the first time] voiced criticism of the government's attitude, saying that "we no longer want to bear vague promises of our rights in Kuwait," and that the Iraqi people were entitled to know what was the government's exact policy. (Thawrah, Aug 1)

THE ARAB FORCE IN KUWAIT

(July-Dec)

[Discussions on the establishment of an Arab force to safeguard Kuwait's independence started immediately after the League Council meeting of July 20. However, though it was clear that the British force would not be withdrawn unless the task of safeguarding Kuwait's independence was taken over by the Arab countries, the first Arab contingent arrived in Kuwait only seven weeks later, on Sept 10.]

Changing Attitudes. The Arab League Secretariat sent urgent letters to member-states asking them to specify the size of the forces they were ready to send, the duration of their stay and the expenses involved. (R. Beirut, July 23-IMB, July 24)

Earlier, Hussein, the Kuwaiti delegate, disclosed that Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Morocco were willing to send forces, while other countries, including the UAR, would participate by sending equipment and other assistance. (MENA, July 22 [25])

However, a few days later he said that all Arab countries except Tunisia (because of the situation in Bizerta) would send troops and that the force would be merely symbolic. (R. Kuwait, July 30 [Aug 1])

[In the end, however, contingents came from the UAR, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Tunisia.]

Proposal for "Symbolic Force" Rejected by the UK.

It was reported that the Ruler of Kuwait had indicated that 250 or 500 Arab troops would be sufficient to replace the British. This was interpreted as meaning that in case a crisis developed the British could again be recalled, while the principle of a joint Arab effort for the preservation of Kuwait's independence would be also observed. (Hayat, July 26)

The Times wrote that the theory of a symbolic Arab force "had grown from the notion that General Qassim has become more amenable" (Times, July 24). The Economist wrote that the question was whether a political or a military deterrent was needed. The UK was disinclined to withdraw her troops if no more than a token substitute was found. Some 2,500 British troops still remained in Kuwait [partial withdrawal had started on July 19], and the British government was hoping for a substitute Arab force of around brigade strength. The paper added that negotiation about where the soldiers should come from, who should command them, and how they should be paid, were "still very much in the air." (Economist, July 29)

League Military Delegation and SG Go to Kuwait. A League military delegation left for Kuwait at the Ruler's request on Aug 6. It was headed by the chairman of the League's Permanent Military Committee, Gen. Ahmad Halim al-Imam [of the UAR], and included the Deputy SG, Nawfal. The delegation paid a short visit to Saudi Arabia, where it reportedly asked the King to increase the strength of his force in Kuwait. In Kuwait it conferred with the Ruler and senior officers, and inspected positions on the Iraqi-Kuwaiti border. (R. Cairo, Aug 1, R. Mecca, Aug 6, R. Kuwait, Aug 7, 8, 9, R. Beirut, Aug 8 [3, 9, 10]; Eg. Gaz., Aug 7; Hayat, Aug 8)

Gen. Imam said that the size of the Arab force was not yet decided, but it would be strong enough to repel any attack. It would be so composed that the forces of any one country would not by far exceed those of any other (Hayat, Aug 9). SG Hammūnah joined the delegation in Kuwait on Aug 12, and it returned to Cairo on Aug 13. (R. Kuwait, Aug 12, 13, MENA, Aug 13 [15])

Kuwait Signs Arab Collective Security Pact and Agreement on Arab Force. On Aug 12 Hammūnah and the Ruler signed an agreement on the Arab force. The Ruler also signed the Arab Collective Security Pact [adhered to by seven states: Jordan, Saudi Arabia, UAR, Lebanon, Yemen, Morocco and Iraq]. (Hayat, Aug 13, 15; Mid. Mir., Aug 19)

On Aug 15 the League Council held a short meeting in which it approved the agreement with the Ruler and heard the SG's report on the establishment of the Arab force. (Eg. Gaz., Aug 16)

The agreement was reported to include the following points: soldiers of the Arab force were to enjoy diplomatic immunity, like League officials. Their command was to be directly connected by radio link to League headquarters as well as to the participating member-states. The soldiers were to respect Kuwaiti laws and refrain from interference in political matters. They would not be subject to Kuwaiti courts but to the codes of their own countries. (Mid. Mir., Aug 19)

Nawfal, the League Deputy SG, said that part of the expenses would be covered by the Arab League and part by Kuwait. (BBC in Arabic, Aug 26-IMB, Aug 27)

League Military Delegation Goes to Other Arab Countries. On Aug 17 the military delegation that had previously visited Kuwait and Saudi Arabia left Cairo for

Morocco, Tunisia, Libya, Sudan, Lebanon, Jordan and Yemen. (R. Amman, Aug 18-IMB, Aug 20; Hayat, Aug 18)

The Economist wrote that the delegation's mission had not been easy, as the only precedent for a united Arab force was "the unhappy one" of the Arab army that lost the Palestine war, and this time the Arabs were asked to face the possibility of clashing with other Arabs. The fact that the mission had succeeded to some extent was due to Arab "self-respect and an enlightened view of self-interest." (Economist, Sept 16)

On Aug 29 the delegation completed its mission, after signing agreements with Tunisia, Sudan, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the UAR on participation in the Arab force. (R. Cairo, Aug 28, 29-IMB, Aug 29, 30)

Jordan: To Check and Balance UAR Forces. The announcement that a Jordanian force was ready to move came on Sept 6 (R. Amman, Sept 6 [8]). It consisted of an infantry battalion with supporting units, having an estimated strength of 920 officers and men (ANA, Sept 15 [16]). Before leaving for Kuwait on Sept 13, the force was addressed by King Hussein, who said that it was important that Jordan should not be an exception to the united Arab front. (Hayat, Sept 14)

Al-Hayat commented that Jordan, which considered herself a friend of both sides, had preferred not to take part, but she decided that her troops would serve as a balancing factor and check attempts by any side to gain predominance in the force. (Hayat, Sept 12)

At a later date, on Oct 20, PM Talhuni was reported to have told an Iraqi paper that Jordan had sent troops because she feared that "Abdel Nasser's soldiers might dominate Iraq." (Mid. Mir., Oct 28)

UAR "to Watch Developments on the Spot and Act as Deterrent." The UAR, [who had all along been reluctant to send troops to Kuwait], contributed administrative and maintenance units. Their strength was reported as 1,000 (R. Beirut, Sept 22 [25]) [but possibly did not exceed 300 or 400].

Al-Hayat commented that the UAR had decided to maintain troops in Kuwait so as to be able to follow developments on the spot and to act as a deterrent against a possible Iraqi move. (Hayat, Sept 12)

Sudan, Pressed by Saudi Arabia, Follows UAR Lead. Sudan was reported to have told Iraq that she had no grudge against her. Al-Hayat wrote that Sudan was subject to pressure from Saudi Arabia, which could not be ignored in view of Sudanese interests in that country, and felt obliged to follow the example of the UAR. She had decided to send troops on condition that they were not to be involved in combat. (Hayat, Sept 12)

On their departure, on Sept 12, they were told by Maj.-Gen. Muhammad Lutfi Uthman, Deputy Chief of Staff, that Sudan must act in conformity with the League decision, but that "Iraq, Kuwait and other Arab nations are all brothers to us." (R. Umdurman, Sept 12 [14]) [The contingent was possibly of company strength.]

Lebanon Follows Policy of Neutrality. Lebanon informed the League that she could not contribute any contingent but was ready to provide medical and engineering facilities. The League was reported to have asked Lebanon to send 100 men. (Hayat, Aug 16; Eg. Cos., Aug 18)

During the talks with the military delegation, President Shehab and PM Sliem reportedly said that Lebanon's interests obliged her not to commit herself, as the issue involved her relations with the UAR, Iraq and Kuwait, which she did not want to affect in any way, but she would consider the matter further. Government circles were hoping that new developments would enable Lebanon to extricate herself from a delicate position. (Hayat, Aug 29)

Tunisia Sends Token of Solidarity. Tunisia decided to send a token force, in keeping with the principle of Arab solidarity, informing Iraq that this did not mean any hostility to her (Hayat, Sept 12). The Tunisian contingent was reported to consist of 100-200 men.

Libya and Morocco, which it was reported, had promised to subscribe a token force (Hayat, Sept 12) did not do so.

Yemen: Complete Refusal. Yemen refused to receive the League's military delegation. The Imam's representative announced in Cairo on Aug 22 that Yemen was "too concerned with British aggression in South Yemen." (Mid. Mir., Aug 26)

Delays in Sending Force. On Sept 5 Nawfal said that final arrangements were not yet completed; the organization and coordination of the troops had proved more difficult than expected. (BBC in Arabic, Sept 5-IMB, Sept 6)

The Economist wrote that the Arab states attached more importance to not fumbling their operation than to making a punctual appearance. Preparations were slow for lack of experience and ready-made machinery. Some governments were reluctant to contribute troops for fear their soldiers might actually clash with the Iraqis, and the UAR, which could send troops immediately, thought that the first contingent should not consist only of her troops, but should symbolize Arab unity from the start. (Economist, Sept 2)

A Saudi Arabian spokesman said on Sept 4 that a contingent of 1,200 soldiers was ready to leave for Kuwait. This announcement was interpreted in Cairo as an attempt to speed up the League's arrangements with other countries. (BBC in Arabic, Sept 5-IMB, Sept 6)

The Command of the Force. On Sept 7 a League spokesman announced the following nominations to the command of the Arab force: Gen. Abdallah Isa of Saudi Arabia, C-in-C; Brig. Khalid as-Sahn of Jordan, Deputy C-in-C, and Col. Kamil ad-Dabbagh of Saudi Arabia, Chief of Staff. These officers had been expected to leave for Kuwait on Sept 9, but had postponed their departure. (Hayat, Sept 7, 8; R. Mecca, ANA, Sept 7 [9])

Earlier it had been reported that a Moroccan would be in command (R. Morocco, Aug 21 [23]), but Morocco did not participate in the force. The appointment of a Saudi Arabian to command the force was in conformity with Nawfal's earlier statement that command would be given to the country that provided the largest number of troops. (Mid. Mir., Sept 2)

The Force's Arrival in Kuwait. On Sept 10 the first contingents arrived in Kuwait; they were Saudi Arabian. General Isa arrived the following day, with his staff and the officers of the Sudanese command (Hayat, Sept 12). The Sudanese contingent left for Kuwait on Sept 12, and the Jordanian battalion, as well as the UAR technicians, on Sept 15 (Mid. Mir., Sept 16). Within the week, the force numbered just over 3,000 men. (Economist, Sept 16)

On Sept 21 the Ruler of Kuwait visited King Saud in Riyadh. They discussed the withdrawal of the British forces and the reinforcement of Arab troops in Kuwait. Earlier it was reported that Kuwait had asked the League to increase the size of the force to 5,000. The League called upon the UAR and Saudi Arabia to send more troops. Saudi Arabia agreed to send 500 armoured reinforcements. The UAR reaction was not known, but the next day it was announced that Sudan and Saudi Arabia would send more soldiers. A Saudi Arabian armoured regiment arrived in Kuwait on Sept 27. (R. Amman, Sept 20-IMB, Sept 21; Mid. Mir., Sept 23, 30)

Withdrawal of British Forces. On Sept 14 the Ruler of Kuwait asked the British government to withdraw its troops from Kuwait. (Eg. Gaz., Hayat, Sept 15)

The British command in Bahrain announced that the withdrawal would start on Sept 19, and would follow stages agreed between the Political Resident and the Ruler. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 14)

British official sources were reported to have said that the delay in withdrawal had been due to the pace of the Arab force's deployment (Hayat, Sept 16). The Arab troops did not take over British positions but chose new ones (MENA, Sept 25 [27]). On Oct 10 it was announced in Kuwait that the last British troops had left. (R. Kuwait, Oct 10 [11])

"Uneasiness During Change-over." On Sept 11 Kuwait Radio stated that Qasim had intended to seize Kuwait before the arrival of the Arab force, but Iraqi soldiers in Basra had refused to obey his orders to move against Kuwait on the night of Sept 7 (R. Kuwait, Sept 11 [13]). The Iraqi embassy in London described these reports as "complete and utter nonsense" (Mid. Mir., Sept 16). On the other hand, Baghdad Radio reported a mutiny among Saudi Arabian soldiers who allegedly refused to protect "imperialist interests." This was denied by Mecca. (R. Mecca, Sept 11, R. Baghdad, Sept 12 [14])

The Economist wrote that these "absurd" rumours were symptomatic of uneasiness during the change-over between the British and the Arabs. (Economist, Sept 16)

Kuwait To "Pay" for Arab Support By Investment in Arab Countries. ANA reported from Kuwait that after the League forces had settled down in Kuwait, "attention was focused" on the possibility of using Kuwait's wealth to help Arab countries. A five-man Kuwaiti economic delegation representing the Finance and Economy Department and the Chamber of Commerce left on Sept 27 on a fact-finding tour of Arab countries. The delegation first visited Jordan. (On the same issue see also above, p 131.)

On Sept 14 following the dispatch of Jordanian troops to Kuwait, Jordanian newspapers had called upon Kuwait to invest her money in Arab countries. Ad-Difa' said that the fulfilment of the promises made by Jordan and other Arab countries should encourage Kuwait to carry out her commitments. Al-Jihad expressed the hope that Jordan would get the lion's share of the Kuwaiti capital to be invested in Arab countries.

The head of the Kuwaiti delegation, Ahmad Umar Asim, said that its purpose was to make preliminary studies of Arab projects to which Kuwait would subscribe funds. After Jordan, the delegation was to visit the UAR, Sudan, Libya, Tunisia, Morocco and Lebanon. (Jihad, Difa', Sept 14; Mid. Mir., Sept 16, 30)

After the conclusion of the delegation's talks in the UAR, a joint communiqué issued on Oct 5 said that it had expressed Kuwait's desire to promote economic relations with the UAR by investing her capital in economic development projects and fostering trade between the two countries. (MEA, Feb 1962)

In Dec it was reported that Kuwait had decided to establish a fund, provisionally of 5-10 per cent of the state budget, for low interest loans to Arab governments carrying out development projects. (MENA, Dec 19 [21])

Iraqi spokesmen, including Qasim, referred to the whole issue as Kuwaiti "bribes" and an exploitation of the situation by the Arab countries for their selfish financial interests. (See, e.g., Qasim's speech - Iraq Times, July 20 and the statement by Iraq's delegate to Arab League - Iraq Times, July 23.)

Egyptian Troops Recalled After Break-up of UAR: Abdel Nasser: Anti-UAR Intrigues. On Oct 12 [following the break-up of the UAR], Al-Ahram reported that the UAR [Egypt] had asked the League's permission to recall her troops from Kuwait. (Ahram, Oct 12)

On Oct 18 Abdel Nasser explained this step in a letter to the Ruler of Kuwait. He said that he had received information to the effect that an attempt would be made to harm the relations between Kuwait and the UAR, and that an attempt was to be made to accuse UAR soldiers of interference in Kuwait's domestic affairs and conspiring against her. While Abdel Nasser was confident of the good intentions of the Ruler and the Kuwaiti people, he said that he did not trust the "imperialists and their stooges," who wanted to isolate the UAR from the other Arab countries as they had attempted to do in 1957. Abdel Nasser assured the Ruler of "the paramount importance" the UAR attached to the independence of Kuwait and her desire to safeguard it. (R. Cairo, Oct 18 [20]; Eg. Gaz., Oct 19)

The Ruler wrote asking Abdel Nasser to reconsider his decision. (Mid. Mir., Oct 28)

Inter-Arab Friction in Force Reported. On Oct 17 Al-Hayat quoted a report in the Syrian An-Nasr that Egypt's decision was a result of friction between Egyptian and Syrian soldiers in the UAR forces, which developed into dissension between the Egyptian officers and the Arab High Command in Kuwait. The Egyptian officers were alleged to have been intimidating Syrian soldiers who refused to declare their allegiance to the UAR. Saudi Arabian and Jordanian officers in the joint command intervened to stop the Egyptian pressure. A Jordanian officer was reported to have declared that the Syrian soldiers were free to form a separate unit or join any other unit of the Arab force. The Ruler of Kuwait was reported to have intervened personally, declaring that no political activity would be tolerated in the Arab force. (ANA, Oct 16 [18]; Hayat, Oct 17)

On Oct 17 a spokesman of the Jordanian command in Kuwait denied rumours of discord in the Arab force. (BBCM, Oct 19)

Amman Radio accused Abdel Nasser of seeking to stir up the Iraqi-Kuwaiti crisis again and exploit the situation to further his own ambitions in the region. It said that he had taken the decision to withdraw his troops without referring to the Arab League or the states participating in the Arab force. (R. Amman, Oct 12 [14])

In Oct Syrian military sources reported the recall of Syrian troops from Kuwait (Hayat, Oct 20). They were replaced by a new contingent of Jordanian troops. (Hayat, Dec 12)

KUWAITI MEMBERSHIP OF UN VETOED

(Nov 30)

Application Sponsored by UAR and Backed by UK. On Nov 30 the Security Council met to consider Kuwait's application for UN membership, which was sent to the SG on June 30 by Kuwait and was sponsored by the UAR (S/4852, S/5001). The UAR representative submitted a draft resolution calling on the Council to recommend to the General Assembly the admission of Kuwait (S/5006). He said that Kuwait was a peace-loving state, which fulfilled the requirements for UN membership. British troops had been withdrawn from Kuwait, and Kuwait now enjoyed complete independence and sovereignty and was recognized by 62 states. The UK representative backed the draft resolution.

Iraq Opposes and USSR Vetoes Application. The Iraqi delegate urged the Council to reject the resolution on the grounds that Kuwait was not a state "in the internationally accepted sense" and possessed "none of the prerequisites of statehood."

All members of the Council voted for the acceptance of Kuwait, with the exception of the Soviet Union, which cast its veto against it.

The USSR representative, Valerian Zorin, proposed that the acceptance of Kuwait be postponed, as "formal withdrawal of British troops from Kuwait, under the circumstances of such withdrawal, does not in any way mean that Kuwait can be regarded as a genuinely independent state." He claimed that the exchange of notes between the UK and Kuwait made Kuwait "play the role of a pawn, a jumping-off stage for possible further aggression." Zorin pointed out that oil was involved in the Kuwait question and that "the actions of the UK government in regard to Kuwait cannot, under these circumstances, be regarded otherwise than as manoeuvres designed to cover up the fact that Kuwait continues to remain a British colony and to help the UK to retain in Kuwait a military base in the Near and ME." Zorin also argued that by admitting Kuwait, the Council would be "prejudging the subject of this controversy between Arab states." (S/PV 984, Nov 30)

Iraq Praises USSR, Attacks Arab States for "Support of Imperialist Oil Interests." FM Hāshim Jawād of Iraq said that the Soviet Union had once again proved that "it is the only big state which uses it [the veto power] in accordance with clear objective principles which aim at strengthening the principles of the UN Charter for the sake of establishing peace and justice in the world and combating imperialism in a clear, logical way." The Soviet veto, he said, was "a triumph for right and justice in international relations and a blow for the British imperialists." The Soviet Union was "the friend of the weak, which proved in a practical way that it is a sincere friend of Iraq." He declared that it was "really shameful that certain Arab states should support the British imperialists and help them to protect their oil interests and to keep the Arab people in the Gulf and South of the peninsula in an underdeveloped state under a foreign yoke." The Kuwaiti problem had "unmasked many rulers and exposed the true facts about them." (R. Baghdad, Dec 1, 4; Bilad, Dec 2)

Jawād's praises of the USSR were echoed in many articles in the Iraqi press, which also attacked the UAR for its attitude. (Thaurah, Dec 1; Akhbar, Dec 2)

No Cairo Comment On Soviet Stand. Before the Council meeting, Cairo sources doubted whether the Soviet Union would risk offending the Arab states by casting a veto against Kuwait's admission (Eg. Gaz., Nov 27). [There was no official UAR comment on the Russian veto.] No editorial comment appeared on this topic in major Cairo papers. (Ahram, Gummuriyah, Dec 1-7; Akhbar al-Yawm, Dec 2, 9; Raz al-Yusuf, Dec 4, 11)

More Russian Support for Iraq and Syria Against Abdel Nasser Expected in West. The New York Times wrote after the voting that some observers, including Arab sources, expressed the view that the Soviet move "presaged increased future support for the leaders of Iraq and Syria in their regional rivalries with Abdel Nasser." Western observers saw the Russian move as designed to keep up political pressure in the ME, weaken British interests in the Persian Gulf, and keep the Kuwaiti issue open for future bargaining purposes. Whatever the Soviet strategy considerations, they thought the outcome was damaging to the prestige of President Abdel Nasser, who had sponsored Kuwait's application. (NYT, Dec 1)

Further Kuwaiti Efforts. At the close of the year Kuwait was still attempting to acquire UN membership. Shaykh Sabāh as-Sālim as-Sabāh, the Kuwaiti FM, said on Dec 21 in Cairo that Kuwait was in constant touch with the UAR over her application, and that she would go on contacting other states in this connection and try to persuade the USSR to change her attitude. (MENA, Dec 21 [23])

RENEWED TENSION

(December)

Qassim Warns of War in the ME. On Dec 3 Qassim warned the UK to relinquish Kuwait, "or else we shall kindle a ferocious war in the ME area and force it to abandon this place." Qassim was speaking at a "Safety Day" celebration, the anniversary of his escape from an assassination attempt in 1959.

Qassim declared that the "stolen province of Kuwait" would unflinchingly be restored to Iraq; the UK had been warned, he said, and she "would be responsible for the consequences." He called on the Arab troops in Kuwait to withdraw. "These traitors, calling themselves Arab forces, do nothing more than serve the imperialists, but they will be thrown out too," he declared.

Commenting on foreign broadcasts "meant to inflame hostility between Iraq and the UAR," Qassim said that what had happened between Egypt and Syria was their own concern, and that "no imperialist could estrange us from the Syrians, or the Egyptians, who are our brothers." (R. Baghdad, Dec 3 [5]; Iraq Times, Dec 5)

In another "Safety Day" speech, delivered at a party at the Ministry of Defence (held by the Second Battalion, 19th Brigade) Qassim said that now that imperialism had been destroyed in Iraq, it must be attacked in all parts of the Arab peninsula. "The army will shortly be on its way to liberate these parts," he said; "equipment, forces and arms have been prepared for the purpose" and "military ships are from time to time carrying arms and equipment for the defeat of imperialism." (R. Baghdad, Dec 3 [5])

A similar warning was issued by Qassim on Dec 17, when he told units of the Fifth Division, referring to Kuwait, that Iraq would continue to use peaceful means, but in the end "no way would be effective with the treacherous and the oppressors, except a means which will force defeat on them." (R. Baghdad, Dec 17 [19])

[The Iraqi press and broadcasts gave pride of place to these themes throughout Dec.]

Kuwait's Protest to Security Council. Following Qassim's "Safety Day" speeches, Kuwait cable the Security Council drawing its attention to the "recurrent statements and speeches made lately" by the Iraqi PM threatening to annex Kuwait by force, and to "provocative broadcasts and commentaries daily disseminated over Baghdad Radio proclaiming Iraq's inflexibility in continuing to claim the annexation of Kuwait." The cable said that these actions were incompatible with the repeated assurances of the Iraqi delegate to the Council that Iraq would not use force to further her claim to Kuwait. Kuwait asked the chairman to circulate this cable among Council members and "to take into consideration the danger that may beset world peace in this area." (R. Kuwait, Dec 4 [6])

Lesson of Goa Expounded by Iraq. The seizure of Goa by India (Dec 18-19) was frequently referred to in Iraqi official utterances and press commentaries. On Dec 20 Qassim said that imperialism in the "usurped district of Kuwait" would be defeated "just as they [the Indians] did in Goa." (Iraq Times, Dec 22; see also Thaurah, Dec 28, 27)

Anti-Kuwait Measures. On Dec 19 it was reported that the Iraqi authorities had seized ten Kuwaiti vessels in the port of Basra and that the accounts of Kuwaiti citizens had been frozen in Iraqi banks (MENA, Dec 19, R. Kuwait, Dec 20 [22]). The Kuwaiti FM said in Cairo that Kuwait had no intention to raise the subject of "Iraqi provocations" at the UN. (Arab Obs., Dec 25)

Iraqi Warning Against Establishing Diplomatic Relations with Kuwait. On Dec 26 the Iraqi FM, Hashim Jawad, declared that several states with whom Iraq had diplomatic relations were contemplating the exchange of diplomatic representatives with "the so-called state of Kuwait," and that Iraq regarded any such step as "an unfriendly act and violation of Iraq rights." Iraq would have to "reconsider its attitude with regard to the diplomatic relations with countries establishing such relations with Kuwait." (R. Baghdad, Dec 26-IMB, Dec 27-BBCM, Dec 28)

By the end of the year, Kuwait had diplomatic representatives in the UK, the US, Iran, the UAR, Saudi Arabia and Jordan. (ME, Europa, 1962)

The Kuwaiti Ambassador in Egypt commented the next day that if Iraq meant what she said she would have to break off relations with 65 countries who had recognized Kuwait. (BBC in Arabic, Dec 27-IMB, Dec 28)

Kuwait Radio reported on Dec 27 that India had officially expressed a desire to establish diplomatic relations with Kuwait. (R. Kuwait, Dec 27 [29])

Small-Scale British Military Precautions. [Though PM Qassim's belligerent warnings started on Dec 3, some very limited British military precautions were reported only at the end of the month. The withdrawal of the British troops from Kuwait had been completed on Oct 10.]

A Ministry of Defence statement of Dec 26 said, "During the past 24 hours our forecast that the Christmas period might be used to increase tension has been partially confirmed as far as the Middle East is concerned."

"Although operations are not thought to be imminent, certain small-scale precautionary measures have again had to be taken..."

The Times commented that although ministry officials declined to explain the reference to the ME, "a possible explanation might be found in the similarity between the position of Kuwait in relation to Iraq and Goa in relation to India." (Times, Dec 27)

On Dec 27 200 officers and men of the Army and Air Force left the UK for the ME. The carrier Centurion also left for the ME, accompanied by two frigates and a landing craft. A Ministry of Defence spokesman said that no further action was being taken at the moment, as enough had been done to raise the level of the preparedness of the ME Command to meet any emergency.

The Times commented that, apparently, renewed Iraqi troop movements had again induced Kuwait to ask for British aid, as it was unlikely that the "Arab force on the spot could or would offer more than token resistance."

It was reported, however, that no diplomatic action had been taken by the British government in Baghdad or Kuwait and there had been no request for assistance from Kuwait. (Times, Dec 28)

Iraq and Kuwait Protest to the Security Council. On Dec 28, Iraq sent a protest to the Security Council against "the British demonstration of force and acts of provocation which have created a state of high tension, endangering peace and security in the region and threatening the freedom and security of Iraq," and the "hostile propaganda campaign directed against Iraq." Iraq did not, however, ask for the convocation of the Council. (Times, Dec 29; Monde, Dec 30)

On Dec 29 Kuwait sent a message asking the Council to "take such measures as would restore the peace and the feeling of security in the area." In view of continued Iraqi threats, pressure, and the concentration of military forces, it had become necessary to make "a strong protest"; the note said Kuwait had no alternative but to take "every possible precautionary measure." The question of British aid was not mentioned. (NYT, Dec 30)

Kuwait Disclaims Responsibility for British Steps; League Warning. Shaykh Sabah Salim as-Sabah, the Kuwaiti FM, declared that Kuwait relied on the Arab League and had not asked the UK for help (MENA, Dec 29 [Jan 1, 1962]). (A similar statement had been made earlier, on Dec 28, by the Kuwaiti Ambassador in Cairo.)

Nawfal, the Deputy SG of the League, said that the defence of the Arab area from the Gulf to the Ocean was an Arab responsibility and that the UK had no territories to defend in the ME. (MENA, Dec 28 [30])

Nawfal had informed the FM, it was reported, that if British troops re-entered Kuwait the Arab force would be ordered to leave; under no circumstances could the League force cooperate with British soldiers. (Heyat, Dec 30; R. Beirut, Dec 30-IMB, Dec 31)

UAR (Egypt) Believes British Offensive Directed Against Herself. On Dec 27 Cairo Radio charged the UK with moving forces into the ME in order to exploit "the new secessionist mutiny directed against the UAR" [the secession of Syria]. The commentary did not mention King Hussein's visit to London and Ben-Gurion's sudden stop in Tehran (see pp 362 b, 328 b). (R. Cairo, Dec 27 [29])

On Dec 28 MENA claimed that the UK was using Kuwait as a pretext in her general "plot" in the ME area. Her aims were to bolster reactionary regimes in the ME, unite them under British protection, and use pressure against states adhering to "social justice" by isolating them and threatening them with military force. (MENA, Dec 28 [30]; see also Akhbar, Dec 28)

Al-Gumhuriyah wrote: "Many signs point to the fact that imperialism is preparing for a new round against the Arab peoples." (Gumhuriyah, Dec 28)

UAR-Iraqi Common Anti-British Interests Seen. On Dec 29 a MENA despatch said: "The present British military movements aim at paving the way for a coup d'état in Iraq to get rid of Qasim and relieve the danger of oil nationalization as well as the annexation of Kuwait." This was described as a "conspiracy" against liberation movements in the ME, later to be directed against the UAR as well. (Eg. Mail, Dec 30)

Al-Hayat wrote that in spite of the rivalry between Qasim and Abdel Nasser, their policies in the Persian Gulf seemed to coincide. While Qasim was running a political campaign in the eastern Gulf, Abdel Nasser had launched a new policy in the west of the area by revising his relations with Saudi Arabia and breaking up the union with Yemen (Dec 26) (see pp 154-5). The relations of both with the UK had thus deteriorated, and Al-Hayat thought that renewed British troop concentrations could be interpreted in this light. (Hayat, Dec 30)

UAR Attitude Criticized. The pro-Hashimite Ar-Ruwad (Lebanon) criticized the UAR for militarily abandoning Kuwait by withdrawing its forces (see above). The paper doubted whether any other Arab country would have guaranteed to defend Kuwait if Iraq had really attacked. (ANA, Dec 28 [30])

The Times wrote that the withdrawal of UAR troops might encourage Qasim to abandon his restraint. The worsening of relations between Abdel Nasser and Kuwait's main protectors, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, was also mentioned. (Times, Dec 28)

British Press Divided. The British press was divided over the justification for the military precautions. The Daily Telegraph thought the UK could not afford prolonged meditation on whether Qasim intended to attack, especially in view of India's example in Goa and FM Jawad's warnings (Daily Telegraph, Dec 28). The Sunday Times also thought that the Iraqis must have been up to something. (Sunday Times, Dec 31)

The Economist, however, claimed that "the whole baffling affair was generally interpreted as a defensive move taken because somebody somewhere suspected General Qasim of immediate aggressive designs on Kuwait." The paper said that the evidence seemed "circumstantial if not far-fetched." (Economist, Dec 30)

The Observer thought that Iraq's threat to Kuwait was only one of the reasons for the military precautions; these were also intended to guard against the possibility of trouble on the Yemen-Aden border and in the Gulf protectorates. The paper concluded that the UK once again regarded her interests in the ME as more important than anywhere else and wished to protect her commercial and oil interests in the area. (Observer, Dec 31)

RELATIONS BETWEEN KUWAIT AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES—CURRENT AFFAIRS

The Kuwait Crisis. [In her dispute with Iraq, which claimed sovereignty over the newly-independent state, Kuwait enjoyed the support of the other Arab countries and especially the UAR and Saudi Arabia. In July she was admitted to the Arab League. In Sept an Arab force took over from the British army the guarding of Kuwait's independence. Kuwait was expected, and made arrangements, to repay the Arab countries by using part of her oil wealth to extend financial aid to them. (For details see: The Kuwait Crisis.)]

Jordan. In July a Kuwaiti delegation came to Jordan to select teachers and judges for work in Kuwait. (Akhbar Sa'ah, July 26)

In Jordan the hope was expressed that that country would get the lion's share of Kuwait's projected financial assistance to the Arab countries. During Sept 27-30, a Kuwaiti economic delegation, on a fact-finding tour of the Arab countries, discussed in Jordan the question of Kuwaiti participation in Jordanian development projects: the second stage of the Eastern Ghor Canal, construction of a potato plant and the establishment of an institution to provide agricultural loans. These, as well as tourist industry projects, would cost about JD 25 million which Jordan sought to obtain from Kuwait as a grant or loan on easy terms. (Manar, Sept 30, Oct 1, 10, 12; ANA, Sept 30 [W Oct 5])

In Nov Lt-Gen. Habis al-Majali, the Jordanian Chief of Staff, visited Kuwait to inspect the Jordanian contingent there. The Ruler of Kuwait gave a luncheon in his honour. (Jihad, Nov 13; Falastin, Nov 14)

In Nov it was reported that Jordan would coalesce

Kuwaiti officers to attend Jordanian military courses. (ANA, Nov 21 [W 30])

Lebanon. It was reported in Feb that there were 37,000 Lebanese working in Kuwait, most of them technicians. (Hayat, Feb 25)

In March it was reported that Kuwait had granted Beirut municipality a £5 million loan to be repaid in ten years beginning 1964, at 4% interest. (EFSPA No. 39, March; IFNS, March 17)

At the end of Sept Al-Hayat reported that the two countries had decided to establish diplomatic relations between them; and also gave the names of the ambassadors-designate. [However, by the end of the year, diplomatic representation had not yet been established.] On Dec 30, the Iraqi Ambassador in Beirut issued a warning that Iraq would not hesitate to break off diplomatic relations with any country establishing such relations with Kuwait. (Hayat, Sept 28, Dec 31)

In Sept it was reported that Kuwait had asked Lebanon to send her experts to assist in organizing its Foreign Ministry. (Jihad, Jaridoh, Sept 27)

At the end of Oct, a Kuwaiti economic delegation, touring the Arab countries (see p 136), arrived in Beirut (Hayat, Oct 26). They discussed the possibilities of economic cooperation between the two countries, and the investment of Kuwaiti capital in Lebanese development projects. (Hayat, Oct 26-29)

Saudi Arabia. On April 1 King Saud, accompanied by a 56-man entourage, arrived in Kuwait on a seven-day official visit. A joint communiqué stated that King Saud had had friendly talks with the Ruler of Kuwait on strengthening relations in all fields between the two countries. It praised King Saud's efforts on behalf of the Arab nation and the advancement of his people's living standards (Hayat, April 8). It was remarked that rumors that King Saud had sought a loan from the Ruler could be discounted. It was thought that the question of the oil-rich Neutral Zone was inconclusively discussed; each country was supposed to be responsible for half of the Zone but the halves had not been separated or demarcated. (Times, May 18)

In Aug it was reported that Kuwait had appointed its ambassador to Saudi Arabia. (MENA, Aug 16 [18])

UAR. In 1960 the UAR, in its negotiations with Britain over the re-establishment of diplomatic relations, asked permission for the opening of UAR consulates in British territories and protected areas, including Kuwait (MER 1960, p 535). A Kuwaiti announcement of Jan 25 to the effect that any negotiation to establish consular relations should be conducted with the Kuwaiti government, which was responsible for Kuwait's foreign relations, was understood to refer to this development (Hayat, Jan 27). In May the UAR Deputy Foreign Minister said that Britain had refused the UAR permission to open the consulate because of its oil interests. A British source said that an agreement in principle by the Ruler for the opening of the consulate had already been transmitted to Cairo. (Times, May 19)

On Feb 25 President Abdel Nasser congratulated the Ruler of Kuwait on the occasion of the anniversary of his accession. (Eng. Gaz., Feb 26)

There were repeated reports that the UAR was to open a tourist office in Kuwait. (Eng. Gaz., Feb 26; Ahram, Aug 26)

A number of UAR (Egyptian) experts went to Kuwait to work in administrative and other fields. In Sept two officials went to Kuwait to help in the organization of the Foreign Ministry (MENA, Sept 23 [26]). In Dec Gen. Abd al-Fattah al-Bandari, former Director-General of the Egyptian Ministry of the Interior, was appointed by the Kuwait government as an adviser on general security and police affairs. The UAR also agreed to send 12 prosecutors to Kuwait for one year and three surgeons for two years' service. (Ahram, Dec 12; Akhbar Sa'ah, Dec 13)

The UAR appointed its first ambassador to Kuwait in Oct and Kuwait its ambassador to the UAR in Nov. (Ahram, Oct 27; Akhbar, Nov 13)

On Dec 28, FM Shaykh Sabah as-Salim as-Sabah arrived in Cairo on his way from Libya and was received by President Abdel Nasser. (MENA, Dec 28 [30]; Ahram, Dec 30)

Persian Gulf Principalities

Abu Dhabi. In Oct Shaykh Shakhbüt Ibn Sultan, Ruler of Abu Dhabi, arrived in Kuwait for a three-day visit. (R. Kuwait, Oct 7 [10])

Bahrain. The Ruler visited Bahrain in Nov. (R. Kuwait, Nov 4 [7])

Dubai. The Shaykh of Dubai, Rashid Ibn Sa'id al-Maktum, arrived in Kuwait on Nov 5 on a three-day visit to the Ruler. (R. Kuwait, Nov 5, 8 [7, 9])

Qatar. The Ruler of Qatar visited Kuwait in May and conducted talks with the Ruler to strengthen the ties of friendship between the two countries. (Akhbar, Egypt, May 21)

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UAR AND JORDAN

SYNOPSIS

January witnessed the continuation of propaganda warfare between the UAR and Jordan as well as of Syrian charges of a Jordanian-organized terror campaign in Syria (see MER 1960, p 148). At the beginning of February, however, in the wake of the Baghdad conference, King Hussein called off his propaganda campaign and met with an immediate though partial response from the UAR. Syrian charges of Jordanian-organized sabotage, and even of an attempt to assassinate President Abdel Nasser, continued until the middle of March, and were denied by Amman.

At the same time, Hussein made a new departure by addressing a message to Abdel Nasser on February 23, calling for Arab solidarity on the basis of equality between the Arab states and non-interference in each other's affairs. A reply by Abdel Nasser dated March 13, in the main a detailed statement of policy, was followed by another letter from Hussein, on the same pattern, dated April 2. After prompting by Jordan, a second message by Abdel Nasser, dated May 7, concluded the correspondence. While couched in friendly terms, the correspondence revealed anew the basic differences in aims and policies: the "cooperative socialist democratic society," a comprehensive Arab union, and anti-imperialism as the main plank in UAR foreign policy; a non-socialist development policy, Arab solidarity instead of union, and anti-Communism as the main plank in Jordan's foreign policy. Hussein presented himself in his letter as an Arab leader equal to Abdel Nasser in stature and status.

Hussein's initiative was thought to have been prompted mainly by the wish to strengthen his position internally, and at the same time to break down his relative isolation in the Arab world. The correspondence opened a period of uneasy truce. While setting out their differences, the two leaders had for the time being agreed to disagree, but a meeting between them, proposed by Hussein, did not materialize and diplomatic relations remained at the level of chargé d'affaires. In the Kuwait crisis, however, between June and September, Jordan and the UAR found themselves on the same side of the fence in supporting Kuwait's independence against Qasim's claims.

The truce was broken by Hussein on the secession of Syria from the UAR. Jordan was the first state to recognize independent Syria on September 29, the day after the coup. King Hussein was the only Arab leader who almost immediately extolled the coup d'état as a "blessed upsurge" while vilifying Abdel Nasser (though without mentioning his name). Hussein said that this policy was not fortuitous and that his confidence in himself was growing.

Cairo retaliated by severing its relations with Jordan (as well as with Turkey, which had also recognized Syria on September 29). Abdel Nasser said that he had been deceived by Hussein and promised that this would not happen again.

The propaganda warfare was resumed. Cairo charged

Hussein with complicity in the Syrian revolt, said that he had been plotting while professing friendship, and called on the people to kill the King and his associates. Jordanian propaganda challenged the UAR's socialist policy, and Hussein described Abdel Nasser as a "tyrant who drank from the blood of the people."

Towards the end of December, Hussein ordered the cessation of propaganda warfare by Amman radio. Cairo rejected this gesture, having meanwhile launched its policy of "battling imperialism in the palaces of reaction."

TENSION CONTINUES, ABATES

(January-March)

Propaganda Warfare Continues. During Jan the intensive propaganda campaign between the UAR and Jordan continued unabated, the themes remaining in general the same as in 1960 (MER 1960, pp 149-50). Jordanian broadcasts concentrated especially on Abdel Nasser's "neglect" of the Palestine question and his alleged dissipation of Arab energies through involvement in international conflicts. They also warned the peoples of Africa to beware of Abdel Nasser's acts of "treason, subversion and exploitation." The Cairo—Saut al Arab and Damascus radio stations, on the other hand, continued with special programmes vilifying King Hussein. (BBCM, IMB, Jan)

On Jan 2 a "mammoth" rally organized by the Palestinian National Union took place in Damascus in protest against the execution in Amman, on Dec 31, 1960, of four persons found guilty of participation in the assassination of the late Jordanian Premier al-Majali (Ayyam, Jan 3). Damascus Radio charged that the execution of those "honest, innocent and good-natured" persons was an attempt to divert Jordanian attention from King Hussein's own crimes." (R. Damascus, Jan 3 [5])

Propaganda Warfare Abates. [The propaganda warfare began to abate somewhat at the end of Jan, especially that conducted by the Cairo radio stations. The major change, however, came only at the end of the Baghdad conference of Arab foreign ministers (Jan 30-Feb 4).]

On Feb 5 the Jordanian cabinet announced that King Hussein, in response to desires expressed at the Baghdad conference and prompted by his wish to clear the Arab atmosphere, had ordered the Jordanian radio and press "to refrain from answering attacks and diatribes" launched by certain Arab countries. (R. Amman, Feb 5 [7])

On Feb 6 Damascus Radio and Cairo Radio stopped their special programmes on Jordan but the Cairo Voice of the Arabs continued to attack Hussein in its general programme. (R. Cairo, R. Damascus, Feb 6-14 in BBCM, IMB, Feb 7-16)

Jordanian papers welcomed the lessening of tension in UAR-Jordan relations (Palastin, Feb 8; Manar, Feb 8, 14; Difa, Feb 7, 10). A Damascus daily commented that Arab solidarity could not be achieved by stopping radio campaigns. (Nasr, Feb 7)

While touring Syria in Feb, President Abdel Nasser in his many speeches refrained from attacking Arab rulers. This was highly praised by Amman papers which [for the first time for many months] commented favourably on the UAR and its president. (Manar, Feb 22; Difa, Feb 23)

Jordan Charged With Subversive Activities in Syria. [See also the charges made against Jordan at the end of 1960 (MER 1960, p 154); the charges of Jordanian involvement in the NSP coup in Lebanon (p 388) as well as the charges of subversion levelled against King Hussein by Cairo after the break-up of the UAR (below).]

On the night of Jan 13-14 two time-bombs exploded in Damascus and another in Hama, in cars which had recently crossed the frontier from Lebanon, causing injuries and damage. An official Syrian source said the bombs had been placed by "hirelings of the Jordanian embassy in Beirut." (Hayat, Jan 15; R. Damascus, Jan 17-IMB, Jan 18)

On Jan 14 the Lebanese Premier Sa'ib Slim declared that all possible steps were being taken, in cooperation with the Syrian authorities, to trace the perpetrators (Hayat, Jan 15). Two days later Beirut radio reported that eight Jordanians had been arrested in connection with the explosions and that seven Jordanians had been deported. A later Beirut report said twenty people had been detained for questioning. (R. Beirut, Jan 17-19-IMB, Jan 18-20)

It was reported that Lebanon would set up border patrols to prevent the infiltration of possibly dangerous elements and to avoid any recurrence of the Damascus explosions. (Jaridah, Jan 20)

Amman radio on Jan 19 denied any Jordanian involvement and claimed that the Syrian authorities intended to poison relations between Jordan and Lebanon. (IMB, Jan 20)

On Jan 23 an official Syrian statement said that the day before a Jordanian had been killed by a UAR patrol which was engaged in a skirmish by Jordanian infiltrators on Syrian territory (R. Damascus, Jan 23 [25]). Jordan officially denied this report (Manar, Jan 25). A Cairo publication alleged that the infiltrator was a graduate of a Jordanian sabotage training centre, specially organized for operations against the Syrian Region. (Arab Observer, Jan 29)

In a press conference in Damascus on Feb 22, two Syrians stated that they had been sent by the Jordanian authorities to place time-bombs in Damascus during the UAR anniversary celebrations in order "to create confusion," but after crossing into Syria they had immediately reported to the authorities. One of them said that three years previously he had gone to Amman where he was offered a job by the "Political Section" [of military intelligence of the Jordanian army]. He said he had learned of plots hatched by Sharif Nāsir Ibn Jamil [the King's uncle], Brigadier Khālid al-Yāwir, head of the Political Section, Syrian refugees including Salāh ash-Shishakli and Hishām al-Barāzi, and George Abd al-Masih and Fādl al-Kunji of the Nationalist Social Party (the Syrian Nationalist Party or PPS). Together with the British military attaché, they wished to instigate a revolt in Syria with the aim of breaking up the UAR. A group of Syrian exiles was formed, but as most of the funds provided for them were seized by Shishakli, the group broke up. The bearer of the tale himself was put in charge of a section entrusted with assassinating official personalities in Syria and had received his instructions for the bomb-throwing in Syria from the Political Section and the explosives— from Barāzi. (Ayyam, Feb 23; Mid. Mir., Feb 25)

[It may be noted that the day after this press conference Hussein handed the UAR chargé d'affaires in Amman his letter to Abdel Nasser, calling for Arab solidarity.]

From Feb 22-26, UAR broadcasts mentioned this allegation on a few occasions [but without the voluminous comment and the sharp personal attacks usual in the propaganda broadcasts]. (See BBCM, IMB, Feb 22-27)

On Feb 25 an official Jordanian spokesman denied that the Jordanian government had any connection with the two men. He added that his government strongly "denounced acts of sabotage and believed that the two men were working for certain quarters which sought to disturb relations among the Arab countries." (Hayat, Feb 26; Mid. Mir., March 4)

The very same evening, Syria made a new charge in an official statement, which said that two Jordanian infiltrators had exploded three mines under a railway track eleven km inside Syrian territory, causing damage. The tracks of the infiltrators had led into Jordan. (Ayyam, Feb 26)

On March 2 a Cairo paper claimed that a plot had been "engineered in cooperation with the Jordanian authorities" for a tribesman to plant explosives near the state guest house in Damascus [where President Abdel Nasser was staying]. (Eg. Gaz., March 2)

On March 12 an official statement charged two Bedouin from the Arab ash-Shar'ah with an attempt to assassinate Abdel Nasser. They confessed to having been instructed by a Jordanian officer to hurl bombs at the President during his visit to Suweida. [No such visit took place.] (Ayyam, March 12; Mid. Mir., March 18)

Amman denied any connection with the alleged plots and declared that after the Baghdad conference Jordan had done its utmost to help clear the Arab atmosphere. (R. Amman, March 12-IMB, March 13; Difa, March 183; Mid. Mir., March 18)

THE HUSSEIN-ABDEL NASSER CORRESPONDENCE

(February-May)

Hussein's Initiative; Atmosphere of Rapprochement; The Correspondence. Between the end of Feb and the beginning of May, King Hussein and President Abdel Nasser exchanged four letters. King Hussein took the initiative in a message, dated Feb 23, calling for Arab solidarity. He handed it to the UAR chargé d'affaires in Amman, Zuhayr ad-Dalati, who at Hussein's request went immediately to Damascus to deliver it to Abdel Nasser who had just started on a tour of Syria. Before writing the letter, the King told his Cabinet of his intention; the Cabinet gave its warm approval.

During the following days Amman Radio began to stress the need for Arab solidarity and praised King Hussein for striving to achieve it. At the same time, rumours began to circulate that the differences between the UAR and Jordan would soon be resolved. Such a prospect was warmly welcomed by the Jordanian press, which said that it had filled the Jordanian people with joy. The atmosphere of a thaw in Jordan was further encouraged by the announcement on March 5 that King Hussein had ordered the return to the UAR of a Mig fighterplane, held in Jordan since Sept 1960 (MFR 1960, p 153). On March 6 a Jordanian paper published news of the letter. The next day, Damascus confirmed it and said Abdel Nasser would reply after his return to Cairo. On March 8 Jordanian papers published a picture of Abdel Nasser, in addition to that of King Hussein, for the first time for many months. [The UAR mass media, however, paid no further attention to the matter, and up to the middle of March Jordan was officially and repeatedly accused of subversive activities in Syria, see above.] (Jihad, March 6, 8; Difa, Menar, Falastin, March 8; Mid. Mir., March 11; R. Amman, Feb 25-March 30-IMB, Feb 26-March 31)

The President's reply—in the main a detailed statement of policy—was, as published in Al-Ahrām, dated Damascus, March 13. [Abdel Nasser, however, had already returned to Cairo on March 9.] It was delivered to Hussein by Dalati, in the presence of PM Talhūni, on March 23.

It was reported that after reading the reply, Hussein telephoned Dalati a message for the President, saying that he was very happy with it. The Jordanian Cabinet considered the President's message. (Difa, March 24; Jihad, March 25, 26; Ahrām, March 31)

The first official statement on the messages came from PM Talhūni on March 25; he described Abdel Nasser's reply as "completely satisfactory" and said the letters paved the way to unity. (Mid. Mir., April 1)

The two letters were first made public in full by Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrām, on March 31, for, he wrote, they could prove "a turning point in Arab history" (Ahrām, March 31). The Jordanian PM remarked at a press conference that it made no difference who published this correspondence first. (Jihad, April 1) [There was no report as to whether publication had been agreed upon.]

In response to Abdel Nasser's message, Hussein in turn set out his attitudes and policies in a letter dated April 2. He also proposed a meeting with the President. The latter delayed his reply for one month; in his letter, dated May 7, he explained that he had considered the correspondence closed but had been informed that the King was awaiting a reply and agreed that a meeting was desirable. The text of these two messages was first made public by Jordan on May 10. (R. Amman, May 10 [12])

King Hussein's First Letter: King Hussein opened his letter by saying that his writing was inspired by the month of Ramadan, the time of the revelation of the holy Qur'an, which had led the Arab nation and humanity from darkness to light. He aimed only at "satisfying God and our conscience and at making the utmost efforts for a better future for our valiant Arab nation."

Hussein wrote that he felt that Abdel Nasser would realize the causes which had prompted him to write, and continued: "God knows that we... are still able to meet good with good, as we are able to deter an evil... God has endowed us... with courage to defend right and our nation..."

Hussein then emphasized his "belief that the Arab people and nation never were and never will be... the property of Hussein Ibn Talāl and Gamāl Abdel Nasser"; both were only servants of the nation and history would pass judgement on their deeds. Hussein continued that the responsibility for any division in the ranks of the nation would be borne by the person who created it.

Hussein went on to point out the dangers to which division exposed the Arab nation, and the blessings which unity of purpose would bring, and deplored the fact that "differences among a few people of our one nation should appear as if they were deep-rooted." He expressed his belief that the supreme interests, the national, religious, historical and geographical ties, and the common aims of "the various parts of our homeland" must grow stronger than the causes of differences. The simplest principle for cooperation was equality of rights and obligations and non-interference in each other's affairs.

He therefore extended to Abdel Nasser, as "an Arab in a responsible position," a "call for fraternization, harmony and solidarity" in the hope that this call would mark the beginning of an era of constructive cooperation for the sake of "our nation and nationalism" ("ummatuna wa-quwamiyatuna"). (Ahrām, March 31; R. Cairo, March 31 [April 5])

Abdel Nasser's Reply: President Abdel Nasser opened his letter (which was more than twice as long as Hussein's letter) by expressing his "happy surprise" at King Hussein's message. In reply to Hussein's "noble effort," he wished now to give a true picture of his opinion; to "open my heart to you" not as President to King but as an Arab citizen and soldier.

Abdel Nasser then made two preliminary remarks: (1) the disputes between the Arab states were by no means superficial but reflected contemporary Arab reality. (2) Arab solidarity was essential but it must not be a solidarity of appearance only nor should it hinder the Arab resurgence and restrict the "movement of the Arab vanguard."

Abdel Nasser then proceeded to "cast a glance at the past," not, he said, in order to fetter the Arab future to it, but "for the sake of frankness." He made two points:

(1) Regarding Hussein, he recalled his expulsion of "the pillar of British imperialism in the Jordanian army" [a reference to the expulsion of Gen. Glubb on March 1, 1956]. Those were the days when Abdel Nasser tried to be a brother to Hussein and helped to try and promote "the legend of a young and heroic king" in order that he should become a lofty example of struggle for the nation, and certainly not in order to destroy it later on. Abdel Nasser said that he did not want to go any further except to point out that after the 1956 aggression upon Egypt, certain quarters sought to isolate Egypt as well as the Arab countries from each other. And though it was Egypt's loss if Jordan drew away from her, Jordan lost more if Egypt drew away from her. In both cases the Arab cause was weakened.

(2) On Arab solidarity, Abdel Nasser stated that the UAR had done its utmost to support the "independence of every Arab country." In support of this statement, Abdel Nasser spoke first of the "Palestine problem," the "foremost Arab problem," saying that it had determined many UAR political attitudes. The UAR opposed the Baghdad pact as it was aimed at diverting Arab efforts away from their main problem. The Palestine problem was "one of the reasons" for breaking the [Western] arms monopoly. "Certain Arab brethren" said the arms acquired were Communist arms; in fact, "the arms in our hands are Arab arms." The Palestine problem was also one of the reasons for the triple aggression which the Egyptian people repelled. The power of the UAR army had now reached a stage which would "satisfy the hopes of every Arab."

Abdel Nasser went on to recount in detail the support extended by the UAR to most of the Arab countries from Morocco and Algeria to Iraq and Oman.

Mentioning Iraq, Abdel Nasser said that although he realized the nature of the family ties which disturbed Hussein on this topic, "I am confident that with your intelligence and wisdom you are capable of separating personal sentiments from the inevitability of history"; this became clear when Hussein restored relations with Baghdad.

In concluding the theme of Arab solidarity, Abdel Nasser wrote that "in view of our people's material and moral possibilities, fate has made our people the vanguard and the base of the Arab struggle," a base not for domination but for service.

The President then proceeded to set out the UAR's attitudes to current affairs:

(1) Imperialism was an evil and an affliction; to surrender to it meant destruction and to bargain with it destroyed the people's strength.

(2) In international relations, the UAR believed in positive neutrality as the way to a peace based on justice; it also believed that the Afro-Asian group had a great part to play in building a bridge between the two world blocks, and that the UAR bore "special responsibilities" toward the liberation movements, especially in Africa.

(3) Israel was an evil which "should be uprooted." This required a "comprehensive sovereign Arab force" (qawwat arabiyyah shāmilah) for the Arabs were confronting not only Israel but also considerable imperialist forces.

(4) Regarding the "internal front," Abdel Nasser outlined the cooperative socialist and democratic society which the UAR was endeavouring to establish.

(5) Arab nationalism, the UAR believed, led to "comprehensive Arab unity" (or "union"—wahdah arabiyyah shāmilah); it was not the constitutional form of this unity but the will of the Arab people which most concerned the UAR. At the same time, a united and developed Arab nation was necessary to "face Israel successfully."

Abdel Nasser concluded his letter by assuring Hussein that the UAR did not mean to impose this policy on other Arab states. "I realize that every Arab state is more capable than others of facing its own special considerations and that it has more right than others to have the final word." He wished to leave to Hussein the final decision as to the points on which they might agree and expressed the hope that disagreements between them could be faced "in a spirit of fraternal forgiveness and deep understanding of each other's motives." He assured Hussein that he truly desired to cooperate with every Arab state and remarked that he had no dreams of personal glory: "My nation has been more generous to me in its feelings than I could ever have expected." He signed the letter "your sincere brother." (Ahram, March 31; R. Cairo, March 31 [April 5])

King Hussein's Second Message. [King Hussein's reply to the UAR President, dated April 2, closely followed the pattern of Abdel Nasser's letter in setting out the King's opinions. In fact, Hussein often employed phrases used by Abdel Nasser or paraphrased his expressions, in his point-by-point reply to the President's arguments.]

Constantly addressing Abdel Nasser as "brother," Hussein first expressed his "joy and hope" at the President's "sincere response" to his approach. He then affirmed that "our Arab nation is one nation." [Turning Abdel Nasser's introductory remark around, he then said that he was "unfolding [his] heart's feelings" to him not only as an Arab citizen and soldier "but also as a man of authority who has been honoured by God's will and the confidence of his people and his nation (sha'bihi wummatihi) to shoulder responsibility..."]

[Echoing Abdel Nasser's two preliminary remarks], Hussein then made the following points: (1) The inter-Arab disputes may indeed not be superficial; they could be the outcome of "paradoxes in contemporary Arab reality," but if all agreed that opinions might differ, then understanding could be reached through a calm exchange of ideas in mutual respect. (2) Arab solidarity was vital and the wish to achieve it had prompted Hussein's initiative. He repeated [the President's statements] that this solidarity should not restrict the "potentialities of the Arab emergence." Mutual criticism was welcome, provided that the method employed was "contact among the Arabs responsible" (ma'ufin—i.e. the men in power).

[Again repeating expressions employed by Abdel Nasser], Hussein said that in clarifying his attitudes he left "the final opinion" to the President and would now proceed to "cast a quick glance at the past."

Regarding Abdel Nasser, Hussein said that ever since his first meeting with him [in Cairo, in Feb 1955], he had had nothing but love for and confidence in him. During the triple aggression he ("we") rushed to his side and that of his people. Nor was he untrue later to the "legend of the heroic people and the heroic Arab." But, Hussein continued, "days fell on us with unexpected vigour and cruelty" and "we defended ourselves after exhausting our patience." He would say no more than this but reaffirmed his feelings towards "his brother in Arabism." He agreed with the President that the estrangement of the Arabs caused them great injury.

Regarding the Arab cause, Hussein wrote, "we have always considered every Arab question as our own." As regards the "Palestine question," his attitude was "an extension of our grandfather's stand against injustice and tyranny" and he desired that "justice may be fully restored to its owners." To face Zionism, there was need for "comprehensive Arab coordination in the political, military and other fields." Hussein recalled that at the meetings of Arab heads of states [King Hussein, King Saud, President Abdel Nasser and PM Asali of Syria in Jan 1957; the first three and President Qawatly of Syria in Feb 1957 in Cairo] "one of our brothers" had "maintained that time alone would solve the Palestine problem"; he, Hussein, however had said then and still maintained that time must be exploited for the mobilization and coordination of forces. Hussein also opposed the idea of leaving the task to the Palestinians alone; it was because of this that he advocated the unity of both banks of the Kingdom. The King then spoke of Jordanian support for other Arab causes, mentioning Algeria, and of the "need for strengthening our Arab League" [the League had not been mentioned by Abdel Nasser].

Referring to the President's remarks on the King's relations with Iraq "with which you dealt with your well-known subtlety" (labāqah—this word conveys also an impression of cleverness, slyness), Hussein said that he "looked upon the matter only as a servant of my nation"; at no time had he considered family ties when considering the nation's supreme interests. "A page was turned, and history may judge for or against it"; his brothers in Iraq could now rely on his support just as all his Arab brothers.

Regarding his position on international relations, Hussein said that it was based on Arab interests, UN principles and the right of peoples to dignity and freedom, mutual respect between states, and cooperation in the cause of peace. He was the enemy of imperialism. He accepted with thanks all unconditional military or economic assistance as it helped to strengthen the Arabs; this course was agreed upon "at our last meeting in Cairo" [Feb 1957]. Hussein took exception to [Abdel Nasser's] statement that there were two camps competing for the domination of the world. The "Communist threat," "red imperialism," was the more dangerous, especially to the nationalist movements. Therefore "we here make no peace with Communism... and try to differentiate between real... imperialist danger... and propaganda..."

Hussein then went on to set out Jordan's internal policies: freedom of the individual, national unity, a society providing the opportunities of "exploitation of all resources by all [of the people]" on the basis of justice, the building of an effective "machinery" [administration] which would not be dependent on any particular men, the spreading of education and health facilities, the strengthening of the armed forces, development as "the continuing existence of the homeland depends on its attaining self-sufficiency."

Hussein renewed his appeal to face differences in a spirit of brotherly understanding and forgiveness, and said: "Neither shall I derogate from your rights in this world nor shall you impose yourself on me in any form whatever. Both of us will reap the fruit of our own work and meet the will of God and His judgement."

Hussein said that he was "fully prepared" to meet Abdel Nasser.

Referring to Abdel Nasser's concluding statement about his indifference to personal glory and the feeling shown to him by "our nation," Hussein wrote "I too face life with the same outlook." (R. Amman, May 10 [12]; Jihad, May 11)

Abdel Nasser's Reply. Abdel Nasser's reply, dated May 7, was comparatively short. He wrote that the delay in his reply was due to his belief that with the detailed exchange of views "the circle was completed"; he also feared lest the exchange of messages might seem like "a competition in views and attitudes..." However, it had been conveyed to him that Hussein was expecting an urgent reply. As both had explained their views, he would only add some notes:

(1) He believed in the right of every Arab country to a policy suited to its own circumstances.

(2) Due to their "difference in capacity" (tāqah) as well as differences in stages of development, the policies of all the Arab governments could not be alike. This did not prevent Arab solidarity nor did it "prevent all their peoples from aiming at comprehensive Arab unity."

(3) Abdel Nasser was not passive towards "all that Your Majesty said you were doing for the good of your great people." In fact, the UAR had "unlimited appreciation of these brave people who proved their ability and firmness in the struggle for Arab aspirations and... deserve to enjoy the fruits of this struggle..."

Expressing his hope that Hussein would achieve his aspirations, the President wrote that the true way for the Arabs to face their problems and dangers was to develop their potential strength; this strength, in turn, lay in the "full freedom of the Arab land and the Arab owner of this land."

In conclusion, Abdel Nasser welcomed the King's "wish to meet me"; he believed that such a meeting would serve the nation. (R. Amman, May 10 [12]; Jihad, May 11)

Jubilation in Jordan, Pro-Nasser Sentiments. In Jordan the exchange of letters was received with great enthusiasm.

Amman Radio praised King Hussein for his efforts to achieve Arab unity [and rarely mentioned the name of Abdel Nasser]. (R. Amman, April 1-8-BBCM, IMB, April 2-10)

On April 1 thousands of people, especially students in Amman, Nablus, Jenin and other towns joined in spontaneous demonstrations hailing the rapprochement. The demonstrators carried pictures of Hussein and Abdel Nasser and shouted "Long live Nasser," "Long live Hussein."

A foreign observer wrote that "security officers were astonished to see pictures of Abdel Nasser—long illegal—appear in every shop window in Jerusalem. In fact the movement gathered such momentum that the authorities took fright." The crowds had begun to shout the names of the "free officers" who had plotted against the King.

King Hussein in an official statement thanked the Jordanian people for their loyalty and called on them to stop demonstrations and to express their feelings in constructive work for the country. (Difa, Jihad, Manar, Hayat, April 2; NYT, April 4; Financial Times, April 25)

The Cairo Al-Ahram quoted a Reuter dispatch to the effect that the demonstrations resembled those at the time of the dismissal of Gen. Glubb in 1956. (Ahram, April 2)

Comment on Hussein's Motives, Dangers To Throne Seen. [Foreign comment pointed to motives which possibly prompted Hussein's initiative as well as to dangers to his regime thought to be inherent in the rapprochement.]

The Economist, in a note on Jordan entitled "Trial Run with the UAR," said that Jordan was seeking friendship with the UAR on grounds of internal security. Whilst guarding its frontier with Israel, it could not indefinitely maintain the security forces to treat pro-Nasserism as a sin. Having failed to get Western backing for the immense irrigation schemes for refugee resettlement, King Hussein had to give the refugees the hope of a solution in a larger setting than Jordan.

As to the prospects of rapprochement, The Economist said that in King Hussein's 1955-6 alignment with Cairo, the final sacrifice demanded was his throne, if not his life. But those were the days when "revolutionary Nasserism was a volcanic eruption in Egypt, spilling over the borders, regardless." Now Nasserism was "more controlled and experienced, and with energies dispersed across the whole face of Africa, its impact on Arab neighbours need not necessarily be so harsh."

The paper also thought that Abdel Nasser's letter showed that the President was "veering away from a purely revolutionary process as a means of achieving Arab union." (Economist, April 15)

The Times editorially welcomed the signs of rapprochement "on the one condition that [King Hussein] can carry the country with him." Seeing the reconciliation against the background of a general suppression of inter-Arab differences, following the Baghdad conference, and alarm at Israel's apparently growing military strength, the paper said that "on the other hand, many Jordanians are suspicious of a policy of rapprochement and King Hussein may run into difficulties." (Times, March 27)

The ME correspondent of The Financial Times asked for the reasons behind the King's initiative at a time when his regime seemed relatively stable and in view of the danger that he might lose the support of the Bedouin who had helped him to survive. He dismissed the explanation that US pressure had been brought to bear on him, with a view to making possible a reduction of the size of Jordan's American-financed armed forces. The most probable explanation was Hussein's desire to end his isolation in the Arab World; King Saud was no longer supporting him and PM Qassim was too deeply involved in his own affairs. "If King Hussein can slowly and unobtrusively broaden the basis of his rule by restoring moderate Arab nationalists to positions in the army and government he has probably found the best way of ensuring his own survival." (Financial Times, April 25)

Israeli papers [concerned with the security implications to Israel of any possible change in the Jordanian regime] commented that Abdel Nasser had agreed to cooperation only if Hussein would accept Cairo's ideological directives. If Hussein's intention was to obtain from Abdel Nasser a certificate of national rectitude—the price could be his throne. (Jer. Post, April 2; Ha'aretz, Haboker, April 3)

To this Cairo Radio, in Hebrew, replied that Israeli and imperialist concern for the fate of the "Arab throne" or of any Arab personality, could only harm the position of that personality. The throne was threatened by the Jordanian people so long as Jordan's official policy did not follow Arab nationalism, but now the throne could best be protected by the Jordanian people itself, which had shown its joy at the rapprochement. (R. Cairo, April 4 [6])

UAR: "A New Ray of Hope." Mideast Mirror remarked that in contrast to the "enormous prominence" given in the Jordanian press to PM Talhuni's announcement on the correspondence (March 25), the Egyptian press did not comment and barely reported on it [up to March 30]. (Mideast Mirror, April 1)

On March 31, however, Hassanein Haykal, in his article introducing the text of the letters, praised King Hussein's initiative and said that it deserved the support of the Arab peoples, as did the President's reply. This development could prove a turning point in Arab history, and was a new ray of hope in the Arab situation. (Ahram, March 31). Another Cairo paper described the rapprochement as "a turn for the better after an extended period of unnecessary bitterness." (Eg. Gaz., April 3)

March-September: Uneasy Truce. [The Hussein-Abdel Nasser correspondence was not followed by a real rapprochement. The proposed meeting between the two leaders did not materialize. Diplomatic relations remained at the level of chargé d'affaires. The divergent policies on international affairs, made clear in the correspondence, found a new factual expression in Jordan's non-participation in the Belgrade neutralist conference of which Abdel Nasser was a sponsor (see p. 60 a). On the other hand, the propaganda warfare had ceased, and, between June and Sept., Jordan and the UAR found themselves on the same side of the fence in supporting Kuwait's independence against Iraqi claims.]

THE BREAK-UP OF THE UAR AND AFTER

(September-December)

Jordan First to Recognize Syria, Hussein Attacks Abdel Nasser. Amman Radio was the only Arab station to repeat the insurgents' communiqués on the day of the Syrian revolt (Sept 28). In the evening the Jordanian forces were alerted. The alert was called off by the King on Oct 2; PM Talhuni stated that this was a "natural" sequel to the "decisive victory" of the Arab revolution in Syria. (BBCM, Sept 29, 30; Manar, Sept 29; R. Amman, Oct 2-IMB, Oct 2)

Jordan was the first country to recognize independent Syria. The announcement came on the morning of Sept 29, the morning of the rising, less than four hours after the Syrian revolutionary command announced that Ma'mun al-Kuzbari had been charged with the formation of a cabinet, and ten minutes after the latter announced its formation. [Turkey accorded recognition the same day. Other Arab countries did so only from Oct 9, after Abdel Nasser had stated that he would not impose a diplomatic blockade upon Syria or oppose her admission to the Arab League.]

After a cabinet meeting in the morning, at which the King gave orders for the recognition of Syria, PM Talhuni sent a cable conveying the recognition to the "Revolutionary Command" and another to PM Kuzbari. He expressed "Jordan's pride" at the "blessed revolution" and said Jordan and her King were "happy" that Syria had again become "a song of true Arab glory and pride, and a springboard of true Arab nationalism."

Later in the day, Amman Radio reported that the King had appeared at the radio station in person and given instructions that it place itself "at the service of the cause of freedom and right, which valiant Syria was living through..."

Soon afterwards, Amman Radio made a direct attack on Abdel Nasser with a sarcastic review of a speech he had made earlier in the day. (R. Amman, Sept 29 [Sept 30, Oct 2])

In a speech broadcast on Oct 1, King Hussein extolled "the blessed upsurge" in Syria as "an expression of freedom," "a march towards unity," "a bridge towards a better life," and said that "our support for the Arab glory whose sons rose in valiant Syria, is boundless..." Hussein denounced the "one among the Arabs" who had drugged the people and abused them, and distorted their aspirations. He did not mention Abdel Nasser by name. He said the recognition of Syria was not merely a formal act; "our national actions are not governed by motives that change according to circumstances and time." (R. Amman, Oct 1 [3]; Jihad, Oct 2)

Cairo Severs Relations With Amman. Cairo retaliated first by denouncing the "feudalist government of Hussein," the "pupil of imperialism," whose speedy recognition of "the secessionists" was without precedent, except for President Truman's recognition of Israel (in May 1948). (BBCM, Oct 3)

On Oct 1 President Abdel Nasser issued a decree severing diplomatic relations with Jordan and Turkey "because of their hostile attitude to the UAR and Arab nationalism" (R. Cairo, Oct 1 [3]). This step was brought to the attention of all Arab countries by the League Secretariat, upon UAR request. (MENA, Oct 3 [5])

Amman Radio (Oct 2) reacted by saying that Jordan had broken off "nationalist (qawmiyah) relations" with Abdel Nasser long ago and proclaimed battle; she would continue the battle against everything Abdel Nasser stood for. (BBCM, Oct 4)

The UAR Embassy staff left Jordan on Oct 7; the Jordanians left Cairo two days later. (Palastin, Oct 8-10)

Saudi Arabia agreed to protect Jordanian interests in the UAR; the latter's interests in Jordan were to be protected by Morocco. (Mid. Mir., Oct 21)

Air services were suspended, but were resumed on Oct 8, at UAR request, according to a Jordanian source. (ANA, Oct 8 [10])

Abdel Nasser: "I was Deceived by Hussein." In his speech of Oct 2, President Abdel Nasser said he admitted that he had been deceived by King Hussein's message of Feb. Now he knew that this had been only a stratagem while all the time Hussein had intended "to swoop down on our republic and our nationalism" and to deliver them into the hands of imperialism. Abdel Nasser said he was sorry to have believed in the repentance of Hussein but "every believer was deceived. The Companions of the Prophet... were also deceived." But victory has always been with the believers who were able to benefit from experience. "And the believer will not be bitten from the same hole (den) twice." (Ahram, Oct 3; BBCM, Oct 4)

Renewed Propaganda Warfare. [With Jordan's recognition of Syria and its accompanying attack on Abdel Nasser, the Jordanian-UAR propaganda warfare which had been stopped in Feb, was resumed with a vengeance and continued unabated to the end of the year. Following are some instances of the campaign.]

Jordanian Propaganda; Hussein: "Confidence in Myself Growing." On Oct 4 Amman Radio introduced a programme "The Voice of Damascus from Amman," consisting of recordings of material, originally broadcast by Damascus Radio, which included also attacks on President Abdel Nasser. (BBCM, Oct 6)

Later, and until the last week of Dec, special programmes were directed at the UAR, e.g.: "To the brothers in the Southern Region," "We, Abdel Nasser and Falastin," "Lo, Gaza, the Hashimite," (?) "An Egyptian Speaks." (IMH, Dec 31)

On Oct 15 King Hussein in a broadcast to the people attacked "certain persons," evildoers and criminals (as in his speech of Oct 1, without mentioning names; a tactic new for Hussein, but consistently employed by Gen. Qassim). He said that these persons thought that the Arab nation had become "a group of slaves or a flock of sheep" but they had been taught a lesson and the nation was ready to teach them more lessons. "My confidence in myself and in you is growing," Hussein said. (R. Amman, Oct 15 [17]; Jihad, Oct 16)

Amman Radio repeatedly asserted, on the basis of newspaper reports, that Abdel Nasser's regime in Egypt was on the brink of downfall; the people and the army might rise any minute. (See e.g.: R. Amman, Oct 23, 25 [25, 27].)

[In obvious reference to Abdel Nasser's "anti-capitalist" measures following his programmatic speech of Oct 16], Amman accused him of turning one class against the other and arming the peasants and the factory workers (R. Amman, Oct 25 [27]). [Many broadcasts dealt with this topic.]

In a speech on Dec 15 Hussein attacked Abdel Nasser, again without mentioning his name, as a "tyrant oppressor" whose lust for power was boundless; "he drank freely from the blood of the people but his thirst was not quenched. He bit and ate the flesh of his people but was not satisfied." But the people were capable of destroying the evil, and as true vigilance spread among them "the sun of right will shine on every Arab horizon." (R. Amman, Dec 15 [17]; Jihad, Dec 16)

Cairo Charges Hussein With Complicity in Syrian Revolt; Calls for His Assassination. Some days after the Syrian revolt, Cairo began to charge Hussein with complicity in it. (See e.g. Voice of the Arabs, Oct 4 [6]; Mustafa Amin in Musawwar, Oct 10)

Abdel Nasser himself claimed (during the Preparatory Committee debates) that Hussein had plotted with Ma'mun al-Kuzbari (Syria's first Premier after the revolt). (Ahram, Nov 30)

Detailed charges were made by Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram. He alleged that already at the beginning of the year Hussein had informed King Saud that he had decided to act in Syria; he received a sum of money from the latter and was in contact with [Lt.-Col.] Haydar al-Kuzbari [one of the officers who led the coup] whom Haykal described as the chief plotter. The latter planned a coup for Aug, at a time when Abdel Nasser was scheduled to be in Syria and he informed Hussein accordingly. "The child ruling in Amman" flew immediately to Riyadh (on this visit, see also p 158 a), where he succeeded in enlisting Saud's financial support. The plot was called off as Abdel Nasser changed his schedule (Ahram, Dec 1, see also pp 614 b, ff). [Haykal did not allege that Hussein had played any direct part in or had any advance knowledge of the Sept coup.]

King Hussein in a speech broadcast in Dec said he had been falsely accused of having "participated in what has happened." (R. Amman Dec 15 [17])

On Oct 31 a station calling itself "The Voice of the Arab Nation" [apparently belonging to Egypt], was monitored for the first time. The station addressed itself to Arabs everywhere with the declared objectives of "rallying the Arab ranks and combating imperialism and its agents." The broadcasts were chiefly dedicated to denouncing Kings Hussein and Saud. (BBCM, Nov 2-4; see also ANA, Oct 30 [W, Nov 2])

In a talk on the newly-elected Jordanian Chamber of Deputies, the above-mentioned station, speaking of the King, the Deputies and Hasan al-Katib, Minister of the Interior, called on the people to "revolt and kill the criminals, squash them with your boots." (BBCM, Nov 3)

Ahmad Sa'id repeatedly predicted for Hussein an early and violent end. When, in Dec, Hussein went to England (for a medical checkup and rest—Mid. Mir., Dec 23), Sa'id said the people were indeed preparing a rest for him and "you will not escape it." (See e.g. V of A, Nov 7 [9]; Dec 9-10 [12].)

UAR stations addressed themselves often to the "Palestinians" in Jordan, urging them to destroy their rulers, "the traitors." "The Voice of the Arab Nation" called on them to destroy the Eastern Ghor (irrigation and land reclamation) project. (See e.g. IMB, Nov 16-18; BBCM, Nov 17-19, 22.)

When Hussein went to England in Dec (see above), Cairo charged that he was hatching new plots against the Arabs with his "imperialist masters" and that he had presented a plan to them for preventing the spreading of UAR socialism to other Arab countries. (See e.g. V of A, Dec 17 [19]; Akhbar, Dec 20.)

in a reference to the New Year, ordered Amman Radio to cease replying "to any attacks by others," broadcast or written (R. Amman, Dec 24 [28]). Thereafter the station discontinued its direct attacks on Abdel Nasser as well as the special programmes directed to the UAR and the Gaza strip. Indirect criticism, however, continued. (IMH, Dec 31)

Hussein's gesture was rejected by the UAR. Ahmad Sa'id, of the Voice of the Arabs, said it was Jordan which had renewed the campaign against Cairo after King Hussein had "begged for truce" in his letters to Abdel Nasser. The UAR was not so stupid as to believe that Hussein was himself the author of this "New Year forgiveness." Perhaps, he suggested, it was Macmillan, "when you were at his feet receiving details of the new plot" or "your wife, Toni, the British queen..." (V of A, Dec 28 [30])

A Foreign Comment. The Economist remarked that King Hussein's "bitter tirade" against Abdel Nasser had been met by a "lack of emotion" in the Arab world, a symptom of Abdel Nasser's isolation. The paper added that the King's performance as a challenger to Cairo's social revolution and an advocate of free economy, contributed to the cause of the "counter-revolutionaries" outside Jordan, though few amongst them would see a leader in him. The paper concluded that the current economic prosperity in Jordan achieved "by government participation in companies rather than outright nationalism" was not synonymous with stability and that Jordan could not offer itself as an example of real strength as long as it had to spend most of its foreign aid on its army. (Economist, Dec 30)

THE UAR-IRAQ

Synopsis. The relative détente between the UAR and Iraq which had begun in 1960 continued during the first half of the year, though there were a number of attacks on Qasim in the Cairo press. The basic differences between the two countries came again into the open at the League Economic Council in June, when the UAR presented a plan for Arab economic union and Iraq a plan for cooperation only. In the Kuwait crisis, the UAR supported Kuwait's independence against the Iraqi claim to sovereignty over it. The strong UAR criticism of PM Qasim's policy, however, was often overshadowed by violent denunciation of the British intervention. On the break-up of the UAR, Qasim showed support for the independence of Syria and soon the two countries established friendly relations. Relations with Cairo continued as before. At the end of December, Qasim was denounced by Cairo as rendering service to imperialism and for trying to draw Syria into a union with Iraq.

Détente Continues; The Baghdad Conference. At the beginning of the year before the Arab League conference at Baghdad (Jan 30-Feb 4) and during the following weeks, the détente between the UAR and Iraq

During Jan several nationalist papers urged Gen. Qasim to take active steps to "close the ranks" and "strengthen relations with the UAR." (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 3, 24; Ahali, Jan 4, 15; Bayan, Jan 10, 12)

As of Jan 21, the Egyptian papers Al-Akhabir, Akhbar Sifah and Al-Musawwar were permitted to be imported and freely sold in Iraq. (Zamon, Falastin, Jan 24; Akhbar, Cairo, Jan 31)

On the eve of the Baghdad conference, Gen. Qasim denied in a press interview the existence of a dispute between Iraq and the UAR and said that relations were "taking their proper course towards cooperation and understanding." (Joridiah, Feb 1)

On Jan 30 thousands of Iraqi nationalists gave a tumultuous welcome to Dr. Mahmud Fawzi, the UAR FM, on his arrival in Baghdad to attend the League conference (Zamon, Jan 31). The demonstrators shouted: "Abdel Nasser! Abdel Nasser! Arab Unity! Arab Unity!" and their banners proclaimed: "The Iraqi people sides with the UAR"; "Long live Arab Unity"; "We welcome the delegation of Abdel Nasser" and "We will wipe out imperialism" (Eg. Gaz., Jan 31; Mid. Mir., Feb 4). A Cairo source remarked that Iraq gave no publicity to this public outburst. (Akhbar, Feb 10)

Dr. Fawzi was received by Gen. Qasim for a two-hour talk on Feb 4. Dr. Fawzi told the press that the discussions had been "friendly and constructive"; his visit had cleared the atmosphere between the two countries." (Zamon, Feb 5)

(On the Baghdad conference, see pp 103 ff. The conference did not alter the basic differences between the UAR on the one hand and the other Arab countries, including Iraq, on the other. Iraq acted at the conference as a mediator between the UAR and Tunisia.)

On Feb 7 it was announced that Iraq had released 4,000 Syrian gas cylinders, held by the Iraqi authorities since 1959. (Mid. Mir., Feb 11)

Renewed Cairo Attacks on Qassim. In March and April, especially following the "taxi drivers' riots" in Baghdad (see p 264 b), the Cairo radio and press expressed their disapproval of the Qassim regime. (IMH, May 7)

One writer said that the attitude of the Iraqi leaders towards Arab nationalism had not changed; their real goal was to keep the Iraqi people quiet. They were endeavouring to convince the people of an Iraqi-UAR rapprochement while continuing with their policy of opposing Arab nationalism. The writer concluded: "We know quite well the attitude of each leader in our region as well as his true political inclinations." (Mamduh Rida in Ras al-Yusuf, March 13)

Another paper said that revolution was the need of the hour in Iraq (Akhbar, March 30) and still another that Iraq had a do-nothing regime; it had neither maintained stability nor introduced reforms. It was a gain for imperialism that the Iraqi people should have to expend their energy in trying to correct distortions instead of working for progress. (Akhbar al-Yaum, April 1). A Lebanese (pro-UAR) daily predicted a month later that the end of Qassim "was near at hand." (Ha-wadith, May 5)

[There was no Iraqi reply to these attacks and there were additional Iraqi steps to improve relations.]

Re-opening of Road Between Iraq and Syria; Iraq Lifts Trade Restrictions. On April 13 Gen. Qassim declared that he had ordered the reopening of the Iraqi-UAR frontier (Zaman, April 14). Two days later Baghdad said that it was lifting restrictions on trade between the two countries and issuing export-import licences from and to both regions of the UAR in accordance with the trade agreement of Nov 1958 (R. Baghdad, April 15 [18]). The following day it was reported that travellers on the Baghdad-Damascus road were excused from changing vehicles at the border. (ANA, April 16 [W, 20])

Iraqi papers expressed the hope that these "brotherly measures" would find a positive response in the UAR, and especially that diplomatic relations would be fully restored. (Bayan, Thaurah, April 16)

[The 1958 trade agreement had never been implemented because of the deterioration of political relations between the two countries.] Following Qassim's announcement, implementation of the agreement was discussed at a meeting in Baghdad between a UAR delegation attending the Arab Economic Council and Iraqi representatives. It was agreed that further contacts should be made through the foreign ministers (Bilad, April 18). Dr Fakhir al-Kayali, UAR Minister of Justice and head of the UAR delegation, declared that relations between Baghdad and Cairo had returned to normal. (Zaman, April 19)

Iraq Asks for UAR Teachers. In May it was reported that contacts were in progress between Iraq and the UAR to provide Iraq with teachers, including a number of professors for the Basra medical college. (Gumhuriyah, May 27; MENA, May 28 [W, June 1])

Jawid Meets Abdel Nasser. On June 13 Dr. Hâshim Jawid, attending the Arab League Defence Council in Cairo, was received by President Abdel Nasser. Jawid told INA that he was highly satisfied with the meeting (Zaman, June 14). Cairo Radio said that Jawid had discussed the possibility of raising the level of diplomatic representation between the two countries. (R. Cairo, June 16-IMB, June 18). [In March 1959 diplomatic representation had been lowered to the level of chargé d'affaires.]

Dispute Over Arab Economic Unity Scheme. [At the Arab League Economic Council meeting (June 7-14), the UAR and Iraq were in dispute over their respective plans for Arab economic cooperation. While the UAR advocated an economic union, Iraq presented a scheme for cooperation only. (See: The Economic Council, above.)

The Kuwait Crisis. [In the Kuwait crisis, starting at the end of June, the UAR supported Kuwait's independence against the Iraqi claim to sovereignty over it. The UAR strongly criticized FM Qassim's policy; however this criticism was often overshadowed by violent denunciation of British intervention. In Oct after the break-up of the UAR, President Abdel Nasser withdrew the Egyptian contingent from the Arab force which had been stationed in Kuwait. (See: The Kuwait crisis, above.)

UAR Criticizes Qassim on Kurdish Rising. In Sept, when the Kurdish revolt in Iraq assumed large-scale proportions, UAR papers gave it extensive coverage. (Akhbar, Sept 3, 10, 18, 20; Gumhuriyah, Sept 15-19; Ahram, Sept 3, 10, 14, 16, 19, 24)

Al-Ahram said the UAR was studying the situation in Iraq with concern and that the following was self-evident: the UAR opposed every separatist movement; it believed Gen. Qassim was personally fomenting separatist strife in order to strengthen his rule by balancing opposing forces; even so, the UAR would support all sincere efforts to protect national unity in Iraq; the disturbances bore the mark of Communist participation, "the same elements which cooperated with Qassim in the policy of isolating Iraq from the rest of the Arab nation." (Ahram, Sept 18)

Iraqi Political Exiles in Cairo. On Sept 20, the "Free Men of Iraq" (ahdr al-iraq) held a ceremony in Cairo to commemorate the second anniversary of the execution of the "Iraqi victims" in Baghdad [following the Mosul Revolt of March 1959]. The ceremony was attended by a large number of "Arab dignitaries and representatives of popular organizations" [no names mentioned]. (Gumhuriyah, Sept 21)

Iraq and the Break-up of the UAR; Cautious Support for Syrian Independence. On Sept 28 Baghdad Radio referred to the revolt in Damascus, which had broken out in the morning, in its evening news bulletin only. [It gave much greater prominence to the communiqués of the insurgents than to Abdel Nasser's speeches.] (R. Baghdad, Sept 28 [30]; IMB, Sept 29)

On the morning of the coup, Gen. Qassim referred to it as "the serious events in the country of our brothers, the noble and courageous Syrians." In his speech (on the anniversary of the agrarian reform law), Qassim said he had ordered the army "to oppose the foreigner if he tried to interfere in the country of our brothers." He appealed to "our brothers in Syria and our brothers in Egypt to extend their hands to each other to realize amity" as the imperialists were lying in wait for them. [Qassim made no reference to a possible preservation of the union.] (R. Baghdad, Sept 29 (Oct 2))

Iraqi press opinion was divided. The [Communist] Sa'at al-Ahrar (Sept 30, Oct 1) and [Muhammad Hadid's] Al-Bayān (Sept 29) blamed Abdel Nasser for the break-up of the union. "Nationalist" [i.e. pan-Arab-inclined] papers on the other hand, expressed dismay at the success of the revolt and accused imperialism of plotting against the Arabs. (Fajr al-Jadid, Thawrah, Sept 29)

On Oct 2 Qassim declared in a press interview that Iraq was considering Syria's request for recognition and added that "our attitude as I stated it in Jan 1960 [support for an independent Syrian republic—see MER 1960, p 145] is unchanged" (Nahar, Beirut, Oct 3; Iraq Times, Oct 6). The 1960 statements concerned were republished in Baghdad papers on Oct 4. (INA, Zaman, Iraq Times, Akhbar, Bilad, Oct 4)

Support for President Abdel Nasser and denunciation of "the imperialist and reactionary rebellion" continued to find expression in the [nationalist] press (Fajr al-Jadid, Oct 5). Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 5, in which he declared that he would not impose a diplomatic blockade, was generally praised [except by the Communists]. (Zaman, Thawrah, Oct 6; Bayan, Oct 8)

On Oct 9 [following Abdel Nasser's speech] Iraq recognized the Syrian Arab Republic [as did also other Arab countries]. The Cabinet statement reiterated Iraq's belief in Arab and Muslim "fraternal bonds" as well as in "national unity" (wahdah wataniyah—meaning unity inside the separate Arab countries). (Bilad, Oct 10) [Relations with the UAR (Egypt) continued as before.]

Cairo Attack on Qassim. In Dec, Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, Al-Ahram's editor, attacked the regime of Gen. Qassim. [Since the break-up of the UAR, Cairo had concentrated its propaganda warfare against "the seats of reaction in Amman, Damascus and Riyadh," while relations with Iraq had continued as before.]

Haykal expressed the fear that the "forces of darkness," which had temporarily engulfed Damascus, might seek out Baghdad as their next target. For Baghdad had a "strange regime," "neither imperialist, nor reactionary, nor progressive," a vacuum exposed to dangers. Qassim was "rendering, consciously or unconsciously, service to imperialism" by "securing imperialism's interests in Iraq's oil"; "imposing an unparalleled reign of terror on Iraq"; "submerging the people in baths of blood"; "preoccupying the entire Arab nation with his unjustified desire to annex Kuwait, at a time when he is unable to annex even Iraq." "At the advice of FM Hashim Jawad," Qassim was thinking of drawing up a constitution in order to exercise more influence on Syria and draw her into unity with Iraq, but what Qassim really wanted was to be the de Gaulle of Iraq "as sole leader with a parliamentary facade and extraordinary powers." (Ahram, Dec 8)

A Baghdad paper, in reply, spoke of the "obsession of Haykal, the sick man." (Ahd al-Jadid, Dec 11, 12)

THE UAR-LEBANON

Synopsis. As in previous years, but even more so because of the break-up of the Egyptian-Syrian union, relations between Lebanon and the UAR were determined to a considerable extent by two factors.

(1) Seen from Lebanon, relations with the UAR were very much an extension of internal politics, namely the conflict between the Muslim, pan-Arab, pro-UAR section of the population and their opponents, the Christian, Western-oriented proponents of an individual Lebanese identity. The more extreme amongst the latter, the Phalanges and the NSP, made quite clear their distaste for what the UAR stood for, and were in turn sharply attacked by Abdel Nasser who accused them of trying to disrupt the UAR. At the same time he gave repeated public assurances of the UAR's concern for Lebanon's independence and internal tranquillity. The Lebanese government, while endeavouring to pursue a neutral course and to avoid giving offence to either the UAR or to her opponents, was perhaps slightly more wary in regard to the UAR.

(2) Lebanon's internal structure and liberal regime made her an easy base for subversive activities against neighbouring Syria. At the beginning of the year, there were Syrian charges that Lebanon served as a base for Jordanian-organized terror in Syria with the aim of undermining the UAR; after the break-up of the UAR, the new Syrian regime alleged that Egypt was conducting a subversive campaign from Lebanon to sow dissension in the republic.

Reports on Terrorist Activities in Syria Organized by Jordanian Agents From Lebanese Territory—Jan-March: See: Relations Between the UAR and Jordan.

Abdel Nasser Attacks Lebanese Parties, Phalanges and NSP in Damascus in Feb; Lebanese PM's statement on relations with UAR. (See pp 387 b-389 a.)

Lebanese Delegations Call on Abdel Nasser. In Feb and the beginning of March, while President Abdel Nasser stayed in the Syrian R, a number of official and private Lebanese delegations went to Damascus to congratulate the President on the anniversary of the establishment of the UAR. There were delegations from the armed forces, the Chamber of Deputies, a delegation headed by former PM Rashid Karāmi, the Junbalāt faction of the Druze community and Kamāl Junbalāt the Minister of Education himself, journalists, students and other private persons (Hayat, Feb 21-28, March 1). [These visits, taking place at the time Abdel Nasser was attacking the Lebanese parties, had political repercussions and even led to violence inside Lebanon when anti-UAR sections of the public demonstrated their feelings.] (See p 389 a.)

On March 4 PM Sā'ib Slām himself met with Abdel Nasser in Damascus "to clear up difficulties." On his return, he said the President had convinced him of his friendliness towards Lebanon and that there was no danger of UAR intervention in Lebanese internal affairs. (Hayat, Jaridah, March 5, 6)

Abdel Nasser Declares UAR Supports Lebanon's Independence. In his three addresses to the delegations (Feb 26, 28, March 5) Abdel Nasser assured them of the UAR's support for Lebanon's independence and her concern for Lebanon's internal unity and tranquillity. Any unification of Arab countries, he said, must have the unanimous approval of the countries concerned. In reference to his speeches against the Phalanges, the NSP and certain newspapers, he said that this was in defence of national unity inside the UAR which they had attacked; up to now, he said, "in spite of all this abuse and treachery, we have been very patient." The independence of the different Arab countries did not prevent them from uniting against their enemies and there remained the fact that "we are one people, one nation, one indivisible brotherhood." (Nasser's Speeches, pp 59-64, 72-3, 96-8)

Various Contacts, Visits. In March Muhammad Safi ad-Din, the Lebanese Minister of Agriculture, who came to Cairo to inaugurate the Lebanese exhibit at the Cairo International Agriculture Fair, was received by President Abdel Nasser. (Hayat, March 25; Ahram, April 7)

On April 12 the UAR oil workers cabled to IPC workers in Lebanon, denouncing the company's attempts to discharge them and declaring their full solidarity with them. (MENA, April 12 [14])

In April a UAR First [Syrian] Army sports group visited Lebanon for various matches with Lebanese army teams. (ANA, April 27 [W, May 4])

On June 15 Abdallah al-Mashnūq, Lebanese Minister of the Interior, arrived in Cairo, where he was received by President Abdel Nasser. He later praised the President's "leadership of the Arab renaissance." (Hayat, June 16, 19; MENA, June 18 [20])

A Lebanese military mission attended the ninth anniversary of the Egyptian revolution in Cairo in July. (R. Cairo, July 20 [22]; Hayat, July 21)

Reported Murder in Damascus of Lebanese Communist Leader, Farajallah al-Hilu, and political repercussions during May-June, see pp 391-392.

Arrest of Lebanese Police Officer in Damascus on Charges of Espionage. On July 18 a number of deputies in the Lebanese Chamber raised the case of Emile Khayrallah, a Lebanese officer who had been arrested in Syria. The Premier announced that, while on leave, Khayrallah had crossed into Syria and was arrested there. The Syrian authorities had promised to hand him over to Lebanon at the end of the interrogation. On July 19 strikes were declared in Bhamdun and the neighbouring village of Kahale in protest against Khayrallah's arrest. (Hayat, Jaridah, July 19-21; ANA, July 18, 19 [20, 21])

On July 30 Khayrallah was handed over to Lebanon following talks the day before between the Lebanese Minister of the Interior and Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj in Damascus (Hayat, Aug 1). On Aug 2 it was officially revealed in Beirut that Khayrallah had been charged with espionage and that the Lebanese authorities had detained all the accused persons named in the Syrian investigations. (Jaridah, Hayat, Aug 3)

On Sept 9 a Lebanese in Syria was sentenced to life imprisonment on a charge of spying for Israel. (Hayat, Sept 10; ANA Sept 9 [12])

Attitude to the Break-up of the UAR. [The break-up of the UAR occasioned internal tension in Lebanon, and there were widespread demonstrations in support of the UAR and Abdel Nasser. The anti-UAR factions, on the other hand, showed moderation. The country quieted down after Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 5, in which he recognized the break-up of the UAR as a fait accompli for the time being, and abandoned the political boycott of Syria. The Sīām government, however, continued to withhold recognition from Syria even after other Arab governments had granted it; recognition was finally accorded on Nov 8 by the Karāmi government. (See p 393 a and Relations Between Syria and Lebanon.)]

The repatriation of Egyptians, civilians and military, from Syria and Syrians from Egypt was effected through Lebanon. (See: Relations between Syria and the UAR.) President Abdel Nasser sent a message to President Shehab, thanking him for the courtesy extended by Lebanon to the Egyptian citizens in transit. (Eg. Gaz., Oct 25)

Sequestration of Lebanese Property in the UAR. The nationalization measures in the UAR (Egypt) in Oct reportedly affected property owned by Lebanese and Egyptians of Lebanese origin to the value of £E100m. On Nov 5 the Lebanese Ambassador to the UAR was recalled to Beirut for consultation on this issue.

An official statement issued the following day in Beirut expressed the government's concern and added that it would deal with this question in the hope of reaching a solution which would protect the legitimate interests of the Lebanese within the framework of the friendly relations between the two countries. (Hayat, Nov 1, 7)

The Lebanese Ambassador was given the following directions: (1) Egyptians of previous Lebanese nationality were to be permitted to reacquire it; (2) the repatriation of Lebanese residents in Egypt was to be facilitated; (3) negotiations were to be conducted with the UAR to secure compensation for the property of all Lebanese nationals affected; as well as for (4) new economic and financial agreements to increase trade (Hayat, Nov 11). It was later reported that the UAR had agreed in principle that original Lebanese capital investments, estimated at about £L40m.-£L50m., might be repatriated following the conclusion of an agreement, while holdings which had accrued from local profits should not be dealt with until they could be properly assessed (Hayat, Nov 23). [By the end of the year, there was no report of any compensations having been paid.]

Abdel Nasser Again Attacks Lebanese Papers. In a speech on Dec 18, President Abdel Nasser said certain Lebanese papers expressed the views of the British Embassy, the US Embassy or King Hussein (Ahram, Dec 19). Ahmad Sa'id, the "Voice of the Arabs" commentator, said that ten out of the thirty daily papers in Lebanon had either been established or bought by imperialists, agents and royal palaces; he cited Al-Jaridah, Al-Hayat, As-Zaman, An-Nahar, Al-Amal, Ash-Shams and An-Nida'. (V of A, Dec 21 [23])

THE UAR-LIBYA

Various Ties and Contacts, UAR Aid. On Dec 22, 1960 Libya and the UAR concluded a trade and payments agreement, providing for the establishment of special centres to market their respective products (Akhbar, Dec 21, 1960; Ayyam, Syria, Dec 26, 1960). A year later, in Dec 1961, an Egyptian marketing centre started to operate in Benghazi. (Ahram, Dec 2)

On Jan 1 it was announced that Libyan workers in Egypt were exempted from the obligation to acquire special work licences. (Ahram, Jan 2)

On Jan 3 telex and telephone services were inaugurated between Cairo and Benghazi. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 4)

The UAR labour code was reportedly to be introduced in Libya, with minor alterations. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Jan 9)

A branch of the Egyptian Islamic Supreme Council was to open in Benghazi. (Hayat, Jan 14)

The UAR approved the engagement at the Libyan University of four Egyptian professors. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 12)

On Feb 1 an air service connecting Cairo with Benghazi and Tripoli was to be inaugurated by the Libyan National Airline Co. (Akhbar, Jan 20)

On June 21 the United Arab Airlines was to introduce a weekly air service between Damascus and Tripoli. (R. Damascus, June 17 [W 22])

In Oct a Libyan mission arrived in Cairo to study the operation of the Egyptian Institute of Desert Agriculture. (Ahram, Oct 19)

Political Relations. On Feb 8 a special envoy arrived in Tripoli carrying a personal message from President Abdel Nasser to King Idris as-Sanūsī. (Hayat, Feb 12)

The "Voice of the Free" [a clandestine, anti-UAR station broadcasting in Arabic] alleged that acting on a Russian request President Abdel Nasser was exerting pressure on the Libyan authorities for the abrogation of the agreement between Libya and the USA and the liquidation of the Wheelus base. President Abdel Nasser had raised this question with the Libyan FM at the Casablanca meeting and since then his agents had been trying to arouse Libyan public opinion against the maintenance of this US base, through incessant propaganda, the distribution of secret leaflets and meetings at the Egyptian cultural clubs in Tripoli and elsewhere in Libya. The station advised President Abdel Nasser to demand instead the withdrawal of UNEF from Egypt's eastern borders "and the raising of our flag over these occupied areas." (V of the Free, March 8 [10])

In March President Abdel Nasser officially invited King Idris to visit the UAR. The invitation was accepted but no date was fixed. (Ahram, March 10)

On June 2 the Libyan PM, Muhammad Uthmān as-Sa'id, declared in an interview with a Cairo paper that his country's policy was national and Arab, aiming at strengthening inter-Arab and especially Libyan-UAR relations, and fighting Zionism. He expressed his satisfaction at the activities of the various Egyptian educational missions in Libya. To express its appreciation, Libya had postponed its demand for the repayment of ££3m. frozen in Egypt. (Musawwar, June 2)

Egyptians Involved in Plot Against Libyan Government. According to Libyan press reports, as quoted by Israel Radio, a number of Egyptian citizens were among the 300 persons arrested during Aug by Libyan authorities, following the discovery of a plot against the regime. (R. Israel in Arabic, Aug 24 [26])

At the end of Aug it was reported in Cairo that Libya had decided to transfer from Cairo all its diplomatic staff, except the ambassador. No reasons or comments were given. (Gumhuriyah, Aug 29; Hayat, Aug 30)

Attitude on Break-up of UAR. [No Libyan reports were available on Libya's official attitude.] Cairo reported on support for the UAR (e.g. R. Cairo, Oct 3, 4 [5, 6]). Libya recognized the new regime in Syria [only] on Oct 19 [after five of the ten Arab countries concerned had accepted recognition]. (Jaridah, Oct 20; R. Amman, Oct 21-IMB, Oct 22)

THE UAR-SAUDI ARABIA

Economic and Financial Agreements. Following the visit to Riyadh of a Syrian economic delegation in Jan, the 1955 trade agreement between the two countries was renewed and became effective on April 16. (Hayat, Feb 3, 5; ANA, April 16 [W 20])

In Feb Ahmad Shata, Saudi Arabian Minister of Trade, held further trade talks in Cairo. (R. Cairo, Feb 27 [W March 9])

Following the visit of an Egyptian financial mission to Saudi Arabia in Feb (Ahram, Feb 26, 28) and talks conducted by Amir Talāl, Saudi Arabian Minister of Finance, in Cairo in March, the two countries reached an economic and financial agreement. The agreement regulated trade and financial relations, the exchange of technical information and pilgrimage dues. An agreement regulating monetary relations was also reached between the Central Bank of the UAR and the Saudi Arabian Government. (Ahram, March 28-31; R. Cairo, March 30 [W, April 6]; see also R. Mecca, April 13 [15].)

Saudi Arabian Professions of Friendship, Denial of Tension. On Jan 21 Ahmad as-Shukairy, Saudi Arabian Minister of State for UN Affairs, stated in Cairo that he had handed President Abdel Nasser a message from King Saud congratulating him on his achievements at the Casablanca conference. Shukairy stressed that the King's foreign policy was based on positive neutrality and on maximum cooperation with Abdel Nasser (R. Cairo, Jan 22 [24]). Shukairy carried back to Riyadh a message from Abdel Nasser. (Hayat, Jan 29)

In Jan, on the eve of the Baghdad conference of the Arab foreign ministers, Ibrahim al-Suwayl, Saudi Arabian FM, visited Cairo where he discussed with Dr. Fawzi, UAR FM, various Arab issues, including the Buraimi question. He was received by President Abdel Nasser. (Ahram, Jan 24, 27; Eg. Gaz., Jan 26)

On March 30 Amir Talāl, who concluded the economic and financial agreement in Cairo (see above), declared at a press conference that the object of his visit had been to silence imperialist rumours of tension between the UAR and Saudi Arabia. He added that Abdel Nasser had agreed to visit Saudi Arabia, and that the date of the visit had been fixed. (Ahram, March 31)

On May 20 King Saud received the UAR pilgrimage delegation led by Hasan Abbās Zaki, Minister of Economy. (R. Mecca, May 20 [23])

The Kuwait Crisis (June) [The Saudi Arabian and UAR stands on the crisis coincided in the main, in opposition to the Iraqi claim to Kuwait; see pp 117-8.]

Saudi Arabia Silent on Syrian Revolt. Mecca Radio's only comment on the day of the revolt came at noon [when it seemed for a moment that the break-up might be avoided]. It thanked God that, according to reports received, the break-up had been averted. (R. Mecca, Sept 28 [30])

[The Saudi Arabian press and radio remained non-committal until after the UAR attacks on King Saud at the end of Oct, for which see below.]

Saudi Arabian recognition of Syria came on Oct 10, together with recognition by other Arab countries. (Hayat, Oct 11)

UAR Charges King Saud Sponsored Syrian Revolt. On Oct 27 Muhammad Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, charged that "King Saud's funds were the power behind the coup [in Syria] that toppled the union... three and a half years after his earlier attempt against it." The reference to the earlier attempt concerned the allegation that in 1958 the King had endeavoured to bribe the Syrian leaders Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj and Shukri al-Quwatly to stage a coup to prevent the union (Ahram, Oct 28). This article was repeatedly broadcast by Cairo Radio and by the Voice of the Arabs (see IMB, BBCM, Oct 29-31; for another attack on King Saud, see Gumhuriyah, Oct 30.)

Haykal's article was one of a series on the Egyptian-

Syrian union. In a previous article a week earlier, Haykal had already recounted the charge of the 1958 attempt (Ahram, Oct 20). [However, no other charges against King Saud were made by UAR sources before Oct 27.]

UAR Socialism Background of Attack. [The background to Haykal's charges and the attacks which followed might be seen in Abdel Nasser's resolve—made public in his speech of Oct 16—to make a clean break with "reaction" and to concentrate on revolutionary socialism. Though Abdel Nasser in this speech did not speak explicitly of other Arab countries, subsequent events and statements made it clear that this doctrine was to apply also to them.] Al-Hayāt's "Arab Elder Statesman" (siyāsī arabī qadīm), writing on UAR socialism as the background to the attack, said that there were ££300m. of Saudi Arabian capital in Egypt which were now liable to be nationalized and he thought that the conflict between the two countries would become even sharper. (Hayat, Nov 5)

Saudi Arabian Professions of Friendship. On Oct 28 Mecca Radio broadcast a statement by the Saudi Arabian government denying the Cairo charges. It gave the text of a verbal message conveyed to the UAR Ambassador in Riyadh on Oct 26 which completely denied the charges and declared that the campaign against Saudi Arabia was harming the Arabs' cause at a time when they were most in need of unity. This message had, however, proved of no avail. Cairo radio and press attacks were continuing. The statement challenged anyone to produce documents supporting these lies. The government would rest content with this clarification and had no intention to enter into an altercation. (R. Mecca, Oct 28 [3])

On Oct 30 Mecca Radio broadcast a programme presented "for the sake of Islam in Egypt, for the sake of Arabism in Egypt, for the sake of brotherhood and neighbourliness" and for the sake of age-long friendship, which recalled in detail how from the very first days of the Suez attack King Saud had supported Abdel Nasser (R. Mecca, Oct 30 [Nov 1]; Bilad, Oct 31). There was very little comment on the UAR attacks in the Saudi Arabian press (for a survey of which see Hayat, Nov 9).

UAR Attacks Continue, Ambassadors Recalled. A station calling itself "The Voice of the Arab Nation" (Sawt al-ummah al-arabiyyah), monitored for the first time on Oct 31, launched severe personal attacks on King Saud (as well as on King Hussein). It repeated the charges made by Haykal and alleged extravagance and other conduct offending Wahhabī principles in King Saud's private life. (Voice of the Arab Nation, Nov 1 [3])

In Nov it was reported that an extensive espionage network, directed by an Egyptian employed in the Saudi Arabian Premier's Office, had been recently uncovered. (Hayat, Nov 14)

On Nov 20 the UAR Ambassador to Saudi Arabia was recalled to Cairo for consultations. (R. Cairo, Nov 20 [22])

On Nov 23 Saudi Arabia recalled its Ambassador from Cairo in protest against the propaganda campaign directed against it. (Jaridah, Nov 24)

Haykal Details Charges Against King Saud. On Dec 1, Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, continuing in Al-Ahrām his series "What Happened in Syria," detailed his charges against King Saud. He wrote that though he had no documentary proof, such as convicted King Saud of an attempt to bribe Sarraj in 1958, when he made his payment in cheques, there existed circumstantial evidence that Saud had helped to finance an attempted coup in Aug last. Already at the beginning of 1961 Saud had given King Hussein, who approached him in this matter, a sum of money for action in Syria on condition that he did not become directly involved. When in July it became known that Abdel Nasser was to visit Syria in mid-August, the Syrian plotters contacted Hussein with the aim of organizing a coup on this occasion. Hussein in turn flew to Riyadh (on Aug 1, see p 158 a) to enlist Saud's help. The revolutionary laws of July in the UAR had aroused King Saud's special concern. His logic in this matter was that "if he did not hasten to lunch on socialism, then socialism would dine on His Majesty." King Saud paid—but this time not in cheques. When Abdel Nasser's schedule was changed, Saud feared that the conspiracy might have been unmasked, and to cover himself he sent an "astonishing" message to Abdel Nasser reporting what he claimed to have discussed with Hussein. When Saud heard of the coup of Sept 28, he danced with joy, and when he was informed of its success he "entered his harem, full of the scent of incense, perfume and poison." [Haykal did not allege that Saud had played any direct part in, or had any advance knowledge of, the Sept coup.] (Ahram, Dec 1)

On Dec 23 President Abdel Nasser in a public speech strongly attacked King Saud as a "reactionary" and described social conditions in Saudi Arabia as contrary to "the law of justice and the law of God." (Ahram, Dec 24)

THE UAR-SUDAN

Synopsis. Relations between the UAR and Sudan remained cordial without Sudan following the UAR in its involvements in Arab and world politics. Cooperation continued in technical affairs arising out of the building of the Aswan High Dam and there were growing economic ties and some UAR technical assistance.

Reports available on alleged UAR arms transfers to the Gizenga forces in Stanleyville via Sudan did not provide a clear picture. There was an unofficial UAR complaint of Sudanese obstructionism. Both the UAR and Sudan denied, however, that the UAR was exerting pressure on Sudan to allow such transit.

Sudan was the only Arab state, besides the UAR itself, which did not accord recognition to the Syrian Republic after the break-up of the UAR.

Alleged UAR Pressure on Sudan to Allow Transit of Arms to Congo. In Jan 1961 The New York Times reported alleged pressure on Sudan by the UAR and the Soviet Union to permit the passage of supply planes carrying arms supplies to the Gizenga forces in Stanleyville. (See MER 1960, p 32; see also this volume, pp 635 ff, on the Congo Crisis.)

In Feb Hassanein Haykal wrote that the UN force in the Congo was doing the work of imperialism; Sudan and Ethiopia, by participating in the force, were in fact serving imperialism. He also complained that Sudan had held up for 15 days a permit to overfly Sudanese territory for a UAR aircraft carrying spare parts for another UAR aircraft in the Congo. (Ahram, Feb 17)

A week later, Ahmad Sa'īd, the Voice of the Arabs commentator, alleged that the US had offered Sudan helicopters with American crews, for the detection of the convoys of cargo aircraft which tried to "smuggle" military aid from the UAR over Sudan to the Gizenga government. Sudan had naturally rejected the offer, although the US insisted that the recent Security Council resolution made it incumbent on Sudan to prevent the UAR from using Khartoum airport for the refuelling of its aircraft. (V of A, Feb 24 [27])

In March a report, attributed to the Associated Press and widely quoted in the UAR and other Arab countries, said that Maj-Gen. Hasan Bashir Nasr, Sudanese Minister of State and Deputy C-in-C of the Armed Forces, had told Lord Home, the British Foreign Secretary, during his present visit to Britain, that Sudan was under continuous UAR pressure to allow the passage of military supplies to the Stanleyville regime in the Congo (R. Damascus, March 21-IMB, March 22). MENA commented that Nasr could not have said such a thing and that the UAR would never exert pressure in any case. (Ahram, March 22)

An official Sudanese statement of March 25 denied British press reports to this effect (R. Umdurman, March 25 [27]). On March 27 Nasr told the press at Cairo airport, on his way from London to Sudan, that Sudan was not encountering any such UAR pressure. (R. Cairo, March 27 [29])

Al-Akhbar accused the British government of seeking to drive a wedge between Sudan and the UAR in order to "secure a free hand in Sudan." (Akhbar, March 23)

Various Contacts, Cooperation, Technical Assistance. In Jan officers of the UAR Police College visited Sudan; they were received by the Sudanese Minister of the Interior. (R. Umdurman, Jan 26 [W, Feb 2])

In Feb Santino Deng Teng, the Sudanese Minister for Animal Resources [and the only minister from Southern Sudan], paid a 15-day visit to Egypt. As a result of the visit it was decided to send UAR agricultural experts to Sudan. (Ahram, Feb 16; Eg. Gaz., Feb 17, 20; Rus al-Yuruf, Feb 27)

The Egyptian Health Ministry agreed to loan 36 doctors to Sudan; they were to leave in April. (Akhbar, March 17)

A number of Sudanese airmen were to be sent to Cairo to train as pilots for the Mig jet aircraft given by President Abdel Nasser to Sudan as a present during his visit in 1960. (MER 1960, pp 135-6) (R. Coiro, April 1 [W 6])

In May members of the Sudanese police completed three months' training in Egypt. (MENA, May 22 [W 25])

On July 26 the UAR and Sudan were to sign an agreement for mutual tax exemption for aviation establishments in the two countries. (Akhbar, July 26)

A UAR delegation visited Sudan in Aug to discuss telephone and telecommunication relations between the two countries. (R. Umdurman, Aug 7 [9])

The UAR offered Sudan twenty scholarships for studies at Al-Azhar. (Masa, Aug 23)

In Oct Sudan decided to abolish entry charges between the UAR and Sudan, with a view to promoting friendship. (R. Umdurman, Oct 10 [12])

Joint Technical Commission on Nile Waters. The Commission, established under the Nile waters agreement of 1959, met periodically as scheduled. (R. Cairo, Jan 17 [W 21]; Masa, July 30; Hayot, Dec 5)

The Commission also held informal talks with representatives of Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika on demands made by these countries for a share in the Nile waters. (Ahram, Oct 31)

Sudan Supports Cairo on Break-up of UAR. On Sept 28 the Sudanese government announced that it was following with great concern "the deplorable events in the Syrian region of the UAR" and that President Abdud "has been in constant contact with the UAR authorities to ascertain the true facts of the situation." (R. Umdurman, Sept 28 [30])

On Sept 30 Abdud cabled Abdel Nasser that he was disturbed and hurt by the "regrettable events in the UAR." He praised Abdel Nasser's "wise decisions" which had prevented bloodshed. (R. Cairo, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

Cairo reported cables of support to Abdel Nasser from Sudanese leaders and organizations, including Ali al-Mirghani, leader of the Khatmiyah sect. (R. Cairo, Oct 4 [6])

An official Sudanese statement following Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 5, in which he called off the diplomatic boycott of Syria, said that Abdel Nasser's decision had strengthened "the unity of the Arabs," adding that the Sudanese government viewed the "calamity" as an internal UAR matter. (R. Umdurman, Oct 6 [7])

[By the end of the year, Sudan had not recognized the Syrian Republic.]

Economic Relations, Trade. On Feb 3 the Sudanese Minister of Trade and Industry laid the foundation stone of the Khartoum branch of the Miar Bank. (MENA, Feb 4 [W 9])

On May 10 talks opened in Cairo to amend the trade and payments agreements between Egypt and Sudan so as to cover also the UAR Northern R. The Sudanese delegation was led by Brig. Irwath, Minister of Commerce and Industry. The original agreement had provided for £E5m. volume of trade each way. Egyptian exports had fallen from £E9.4m. in 1956 to £E4.8m. in 1960 while Sudanese exports had fallen from £E4.7m. to £E2.5m.

A joint communiqué on May 15 said that the meeting was pervaded by a spirit of cooperation and that the parties "had agreed to hold another meeting in the first week of Nov in Khartoum." (Ahram, May 11, 18)

During Aug a UAR trade mission, led by the chairman of Miar Co., toured Sudan and sold Egyptian goods to the value of £E1.5m. A Sudanese source said that the delegation had offered prices below those prevailing on the world market. (MENA, Aug 19 [W 24]; Ahram, Aug 22)

Al-Ahram reported that Sudan had suggested the renewal of talks on an Egyptian proposal for joint international marketing of cotton and had recommended that Sudanese manufacturers and businessmen should be invited to visit industrial projects in the UAR.

The delegation had also concluded an initial agreement with a Sudanese businessman for the establishment of a Sudanese-UAR oil company to distribute oil products in Sudan and to prospect there for oil. The company would have a capital of £E1m., 51% Sudanese-owned. (Ahram, Aug 22; see also Nav 4)

In Nov the UAR Economic Organization concluded two agreements with Sudanese enterprises. An agreement of Nov 3 provided for the export of UAR cotton textiles and other commodities to Sudan to the value of £E1m. (R. Cairo, Nov 3 [W 9]). On Nov 10, an agreement with a Sudanese company provided that the latter would act as agent for the Organization in regard to exports to and purchases from Central African countries on a 2%-5% commission basis. (R. Cairo, Nov 10 [W 16]; Ahram, Nov 11)

In Dec it was reported that Sudan had agreed to the opening of UAR Economic Organization offices in Khartoum to promote the marketing of Egyptian products. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Dec 1)

On Dec 15 a mission of the Economic Organization went to Sudan "to participate" in the formation of the UAR-Sudanese oil and mining company and the establishment of a tourist hotel in Khartoum. The UAR Minister of Economy, Qaysuni, was to go to Sudan at the head of an economic delegation in the near future. (Ahram, Dec 16)

THE UAR-YEMEN

(The United Arab States)

(ittihād ad-duwal al-arabiyyah)

(NOTE: The exact translation of the name of the federation is The Union of Arab States.)

Synopsis. Until December relations continued as previously, with the UAR-Yemeni federation existing on the formal level only. After the break-up of the UAR, the Imam published a poem in mid-Dec denouncing inter-Arab propaganda warfare and the policy of nationalization. Ten days later Abdel Nasser attacked the Imam in a public speech, and on Dec 26 the UAR dissolved the federation, as a consequence, it was explained, of her new policy of combating "imperialism in the palaces of reaction." The Cairo group of "Free Yemenis," headed by Muhammad az-Zubayri, became active in the propaganda warfare against the Imam.

Political Relations; The United Arab States (UAS). In Feb Imam Ahmad ordered the celebration in Yemen of the national holidays of the UAR. (Musawwar, Feb 10)

President Abdel Nasser congratulated the Imam on his escape from the attempt on his life in March. (Ahram, April 1)

It was reported that Egyptian journalists who wished to interview the Imam after the attempt on his life were refused entry into Yemen. (Ayyam, Aden, April 13)

The Inter-Arab Relations Committee of the UAR National Assembly rejected a draft resolution to accord diplomatic immunity to the office of the Yemeni representative to the UAS Federal Council in Cairo, on the ground that such immunity was against the spirit of the Union. (Ahram, April 30)

On Aug 12, Amir al-Hasan Ibn Sayf al-Islam Ali, the new "Special Representative" of the Imam to the Federal Council and to Cairo, arrived in Cairo to take up his posts. He carried a message from the Imam to President Abdel Nasser. (Ahram, Aug 13)

On Sept 21, the Imam issued a decree renewing for three years the term of the executive council of the United Arab States—as provided by the Union charter. (Ahram, Sept 23)

Following the break-up of the UAR, it was reported that the Imam had cabled Abdel Nasser praising his statesmanship in handling the crisis and condemning the separatist movement in Syria (BBC in Arabic, Oct 8-10, Oct 9). In Yemen there were reportedly public demonstrations condemning the dissolution. (Fat. Jaz., Oct 5)

In Nov the Yemeni Crown Prince Sayf al-Islam al-Badr on his way home from Europe came to Cairo for a three-day private visit (Ahram, Nov 15); he lunched with President Abdel Nasser. (R. Cairo, Nov 15 [17])

The Imam's Poem, Attack on Nationalization. On Dec 13, the Aden weekly Al-Qalam al-Adani published a 64-line poem by Imam Ahmad in which he deplored Arab dissensions, denounced nationalization policies and called for Arab unity based on the teachings of Islam. Following is a précis of the poem:

We advise all Arabs capable of heroic deeds and worthy of the glory of their heroic ancestors to remember the precepts of the Qur'an which calls upon the Arabs to preserve their unity. But I see you filling the air with hate and envy-charged speeches, hear you howling into the microphones and fouling the language. You smear the noble ones of Arabia, insult each other and snare each other. You are not worthy of your ancestors! You have forgotten our enemy who has realized his hopes. Let us form a unity based on true Arab principles, on the Shari'ah. We must rid ourselves of harmful innovations, which allow what Islam had forbidden us. We need unity which is not based on ideologies which allow men to be robbed of their honestly-gained property, a robbery called nationalization, which pretends to attain equality between rich and poor. Neither religion nor logic allows anything not mentioned in the precepts of Islam. Robbing a man of his property by force is a sin in the eyes of Islam. The needy shall be given from the zakāt and what remains in the hands of the one who has given the zakāt is his by right. The situation can still be corrected, the people can still return to their beloved tranquillity—then there will be security in a fruitful land. (Text in Hayat, Dec 29; Mid. Mir., Dec 16)

ANA, reporting the summary of the poem, described it as "an indirect challenge to the Cairo Ulema who assert that nationalization is a fundamental Islamic principle." (ANA, Dec 14 [16])

Abdel Nasser Attacks Imam. On Dec 23 President Abdel Nasser, speaking at a rally in Port Said in commemoration of "Victory Day," ridiculed the Imam and described social conditions in Yemen and Saudi Arabia as contrary to "the law of justice and the law of God." (Ahram, Dec 24)

UAR Dissolves The Federation. On Dec 26 Dr. Abd al-Qādir Hātīm, UAR Minister of State, announced the dissolution of the United Arab States. The statement explained the motives for this step as follows: (1) because of the difference in their nature, the two governments had been unable to shape this union into an effective political instrument for the promotion of the Arab Cause; (2) the UAR believed in socialism as the correct solution for the Arab situation and that consistency in social theory was vital to the success of Arab unity; (3) the UAR had hoped the Union would serve the just causes of the Yemeni people, but in fact they had not benefited from the experiment.

The UAR wished the Yemeni government to understand the situation which did not affect the possibility of continued peaceful coexistence. The UAR would not hesitate to offer this government any aid, economic, military or political, which might be useful to the brotherly Yemeni people (R. Cairo, Dec 26 [28]; Ahram, Dec 27). [The UAS had been established in March 1958, five weeks after Egypt and Syria formed the UAR.]

The Economist commented that "now, with Syria gone and the Egyptian revolution turned resolutely towards socialism, the connection with Yemen has become a dispensable embarrassment." (Economist, Dec 30)

Haykal: Dissolution Because of UAR Struggle Against Reaction; His Version of Establishment of Union. Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, wrote that the dissolution of the union was a consequence of the UAR's new Arab policy which was based on the realization that the "palaces of reaction are the present battlefield against imperialism and reaction"; it was an error to think that the Imam's poem was the cause.

The union was established at a stage in the Arab struggle when it was, perhaps wrongly, believed necessary to appease reaction in order to promote unity. The actual story of the establishment of the UAS was as follows. In Feb 1958, when Shukri al-Quwatly was in Cairo to sign the charter of the Egyptian-Syrian union, a message from Imam Ahmad was delivered to Abdel Nasser saying: "By God do not adjourn before including us with you." By cable, Abdel Nasser and Quwatly inquired of the Imam what he meant and received the following reply: "I have consulted the stars... it was learned that your star eclipses the others... Therefore I want to join you. The boy (al-walad), Al-Badr, is coming to you to discuss the question..." It was discovered, Haykal went on, that the Imam had actually consulted "the palace's fortune-teller and astrologer."

It was Quwatly who had tipped the balance in favour of the union with Yemen. His reasons were as follows: (1) there should be no hesitation about any step towards union; (2) Yemen might thus be opened to civilization; (3) the pressure on the Yemeni nationalists might be lessened; (4) if the UAR would not accept the Imam it would virtually hand him over as a gift to its enemy, King Saud. It was not Quwatly's fault that his expectations had not materialized, but it had been a mistake to make a truce with reaction, Haykal concluded. (Ahram, Dec 29; R. Cairo, Dec 29 [Jan 2, 1962])

Attacks on the Imam. As of Dec 25, the Cairo radio and press launched a concentrated attack on the Imam's regime, describing it as tyrannical, feudal and terrorist. The Imam had desired the federation only as a means of forestalling a civil uprising and perpetuating his regime. The federation had remained on paper only as the Imam had never intended to implement it.

There were also broadcasts in the name of the Yemeni Union and Muhammad Mahmūd az-Zubayri (on whom, see p 700) who was described as the leader of the "Yemeni Liberation Movement in Cairo"; they called on the Yemeni people to rise against the Imam. (IMB, Dec 25-31; BBCM, Dec 28, 1961-Jan 12, 1962, Cairo Press, Dec 26, 27)

Imam's Reply to UAR Attacks. On Dec 27, San'a broadcast a statement by the Imam regretting that "a sister government" was attacking him in radio broadcasts and the press using as a pretext the advice he had tendered the Arabs in his poem, which had been misconstrued. The radio then broadcast the poem [apparently for the first time] "which does not violate the teachings of Islam or the spirit of the Qur'an." (R. San'a, Dec 27 [29])

The Imam recalled from Cairo the Yemeni representatives on the federal council. (Mid. Mir., Dec 30)

RELATIONS BETWEEN IRAQ AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES

(See also: The UAR-Iraq; Syria-Iraq; The Arab Countries of the ME and the Algerian Question; Morocco and the Arab Countries of the ME; Tunisia and the Arab Countries of the ME; Kuwait and the Arab Countries.)

IRAQ-JORDAN

Synopsis. Relations were friendly throughout the year, and were not noticeably impaired by Jordan's support for the independence of Kuwait against the Iraqi claims.

Development of Friendly Relations. In Jan Mūsā Nāsir, the Jordanian FM, utilized the opportunity of his participation in the Arab foreign ministers' conference in Baghdad to express Jordan's friendliness towards Iraq. On Jan 30 Nāsir and Ambassador Wafā al-Tal were received by Premier Qassim and, it was reported, discussed cooperation between the two countries and the need to strengthen Arab solidarity (Manar, Jan 31). Nāsir stated that the Palestine question had been discussed and added that relations between Iraq and Jordan were now very strong and solid. (Iraq Times, Feb 5)

There was also a report that Iraq would extend financial aid for the upkeep of the Jordanian national guard (Jihad, Feb 6; Hayat, Feb 7) [but nothing came of it].

Appointment of Iraqi Ambassador. The Iraqi Republic's first ambassador to Jordan, Abd al-Karīm Shākir, arrived in Amman on Feb 20 and presented his credentials to King Hussein. (R. Amman, Feb 20, 25-IMB, Feb 21, 26). This was an occasion for both sides to renew their expressions of friendship and determination to make common efforts in the Arab cause. (Iraq Times, Feb 17, 19; Jer. Times, Manar, Feb 21; Mid. Mir., Feb 25)

Development of Diplomatic, Economic and Cultural Relations. From January to April, the development of friendly relations between the two countries was widely reported. There were meetings between the respective premiers, foreign and other ministers with the ambassadors in both Amman and Baghdad, meetings of joint committees, the opening of an Iraqi Chambers of Commerce office in Amman (Jan 12), the provision of transit facilities to Iraq through Aqaba port, trade reports from both Amman and Baghdad of Jordanian purchases of livestock and dates and Iraqi purchases of fruit and vegetables, embassy statements in Amman and Baghdad on the issue of visas. All this was accompanied by repeated assurances by both sides of good will and friendship, and that there were no problems outstanding between the two countries. (Falastin, Jan 20; Jer. Times, Feb 20; Difa', Feb 23; Jihad, Feb 23; R. Amman, Feb 19 [W 23]; R. Amman, March 9-IMB, March 10; R. London, March 31-IMB, March 31; Manar, Jan 12, 14, 23, March 3, April 4; Mid. Mir., Feb 18, April 1; Iraq Times, March 9, 13, April 13; Hayat, March 20, 31 April 11, 12)

In March Jordan appointed a cultural attaché in her embassy in Baghdad to look after the affairs of Jordanian students in Iraq and to secure Iraqi teachers for Jordan (Iraq Times, March 3). An exchange of teachers was discussed between the Jordanian Education Minister and the Iraqi Ambassador, who had two further meetings on cultural relations during April (Difa', March 3, April 19, 26). A Jordanian delegation of teachers and students visited Iraq in March; they were welcomed by the Minister of Education who later received a letter from Premier Talhūnī thanking him for the friendly reception of the delegation. (R. Baghdad, March 15, 16-IMB, March 16, 17; R. Baghdad, March 16 [18]; Iraq Times, Difa', March 17; Manar, March 28)

In July it was reported that a hundred Jordanian students had been admitted to Iraqi universities; sixty of them were granted Iraqi scholarships. (Difa, July 2, Aug 14; Iraq Times, Aug 13)

King Hussein's Wedding. [There were apparently no Iraqi press or radio comments on Hussein's engagement to Miss Toni Gardiner.] Lt-Gen. Muhammad Najib al-Rubay'i cabled his congratulations; King Hussein cabled his reply. (Iraq Times, May 8)

The Kuwait Crisis and Continued Good Relations. [Throughout the Kuwait crisis, which broke out in June, Jordan endeavoured to avoid giving offence to either Kuwait or Iraq. Reports said King Hussein made it clear to Iraq that she could expect no Jordanian support for her claim to Kuwait but at the same time Jordan strove to maintain friendly relations with Iraq. Jordanian participation in the Arab force in Kuwait was reportedly intended to check attempts by any side, and especially the UAR, to dominate the force. See: The Kuwait Crisis.]

A Jordanian military delegation participated in the third anniversary celebration of the Iraqi revolution in July. (Jihad, July 13)

On July 18 the Jordanian Premier sent cables of congratulations to five Iraqi leaders of the former regime on the occasion of their release from prison. (Jihad, July 20)

In Aug Muhammad Mahmūd as-Sawwāf, leader of the Muslim Brethren in Iraq, visited Jordan and was received by King Hussein. (Manar, Aug 16, 17, 18, 20)

In Aug the Jordanian Ambassador told the Iraq Times that relations between the two countries were now better than ever before. He said that during the past three months, over 5,300 entry visas to Jordan had been issued to Iraqis. (Iraq Times, Aug 13)

An Iraqi press delegation, which arrived in Amman in Aug, was received by King Hussein who emphasized the cordial relations between the two countries. (Mid. Mir., Aug 26; R. Amman, Aug 22, 26 [23, 29]; Jihad, Aug 29)

The "brotherly relations" and "complete understanding" between the two countries were also emphasized by the Iraqi Ambassador who returned to Baghdad on Oct 16 for consultations. (Mid. Mir., Oct 21)

Settlement of "Old Accounts." Financial talks, to settle "old accounts" arising from the former federation between the two countries, started in Baghdad in Oct (Falastin, Oct 24), and were completed in Nov, according to the Jordanian Ambassador, who added that the agreement reached would be implemented after consultations with the authorities in Baghdad and Amman. (Mid. Mir., Oct 21, Nov 4; Iraq Times, Oct 27, Nov 1, 5, 7; Hayat, Nov 8, 12)

IRAQ-LEBANON

Political Relations. In Jan Najib as-Sā'igh, the Iraqi Ambassador in Beirut, told INA that harmony existed between Iraq and Lebanon. He added that there was no newspaper in Lebanon which attacked Iraq... all of them had realized that Iraq's policy was sound especially on Arab solidarity. (Bilad, Iraq Times, Jan 13)

On Jan 31 Philippe Taqla, the Lebanese FM, who was attending the Baghdad conference, was received by Gen. Qasim for a two-hour talk. Taqla told the press that they had discussed economic as well as Arab questions and that relations between Lebanon and Iraq were very cordial. (Hayat, Feb 1)

On March 7 the Lebanese Premier denied press reports that political asylum had been granted to Col. Sālīb Mahdī as-Sannarrā'i, the former Iraqi military attaché in Beirut (and a close associate of Nūrī as-Sā'id, the late Iraqi PM). Sannarrā'i, though living in Beirut, had not applied for asylum. (Anwar, March 8; MENA, March 8 [9])

In March it was reported that Iraq would open an information office in Beirut, headed by a Foreign Ministry official. (Hayat, Jaridah, March 16)

Lebanon Neutral in Kuwait Crisis. [Lebanon's official attitude in the Kuwaiti crisis was determined by the wish to avoid taking sides. The Lebanese press was divided: pro-UAR papers denounced Gen. Qasim; Al-Hayāt was also critical of his move; several other papers supported him. (See pp 124 b, 130 b, 132 b, 135 a.)]

On July 17 Gen. Qasim received a delegation of Lebanese journalists who were attending the anniversary of the Iraqi revolution celebration. He praised Lebanon's cooperation with Iraq and thanked them for their appreciation of Iraqi efforts to exterminate imperialism. In reply the Lebanese journalist In'ām Ra'ad said: "As regards Kuwait, be sure that you have brothers in Lebanon who support you. They regard the question as that of right and there is no solution for it other than the one you have suggested." (R. Baghdad, July 19 [21])

In Nov an Iraqi military delegation attended the Lebanese independence day celebrations. (Zaman, Nov 22)

On Dec 28 the Iraqi Ambassador in Beirut warned that Iraq would break off its diplomatic relations with Lebanon if the latter exchanged diplomatic representation with Kuwait. (Hayat, Dec 30)

Iraq asked for Lebanese teachers to fill 150 vacancies in Iraqi schools. In Dec it was reported that the Lebanese authorities had agreed to send a number of teachers to serve one year in Iraqi secondary schools. (Anwar, March 12; Hayat, Dec 30)

Economic Relations, Air Communications. After much delay (see e.g. Zaman, Jan 29; Hayat, Feb 22) an agreement was reached whereby Iraq would export 3,000 sheep to Lebanon by the end of 1961. Iraq would also extend facilities to construct a refrigerating depot in Baghdad for Lebanese fruit (mainly apples) and vegetables. (ANA, April 14 [W 20]; Hayat, April 15)

From the beginning of the year, contacts were made with a view to concluding an air agreement between the two countries. (Iraq Times, Jan 17; Hayat, April 15; Zaman, May 21)

On July 28 an agreement came into force providing for twelve flights a week between the two countries. The agreement, between Iraqi Airways, Middle East Airlines and Lebanese International Airlines, provided six trips a week for Iraqi Airways, four for MEA and two for LIA. The profits were to be divided equally between Iraqi Airways and the two Lebanese airlines jointly. (R. Baghdad, July 31 [W, Aug 3]; Hayat, Aug 2)

In Sept a Lebanese delegation came to Baghdad to negotiate a civil aviation agreement. The negotiations failed, it was reported, as the Iraqi delegates had insisted on the following conditions: Air Liban to be denied landing rights in Baghdad; Lebanese aircraft not to overfly Iraq on the Kuwaiti route without prior permission; the Beirut-Baghdad flights to be reduced from six weekly to each side to three only. They also refused to discuss other questions relating to fees and taxes. (Amal, Sept 13; Hayat, Sept 21; ANA, Sept 20 [W 26])

Notwithstanding expectation of their imminent resumption (Hayat, Oct 24, Nov 8, Dec 15), the negotiations had not been resumed by the end of the year.

OTHER COUNTRIES

Iraq-Libya. On Jan 31 Gen. Qassim received the Libyan delegation to the Baghdad Conference. (R. Baghdad, Feb 1-IMB, Feb 2)

In Dec an Iraqi delegation, headed by a minister, attended Libya's independence anniversary celebrations. (R. Baghdad, Dec 24 [29])

Iraq-Saudi Arabia. On Jan 9, Mecca Radio broadcast an official statement denying press reports [e.g. Hayat, Jan 7; Manar, Jan 8] about a forthcoming meeting between King Saud and Gen. Qassim. (R. Mecca, Jan 9 [11])

In Nov the Saudi Arabian embassy in Baghdad offered four scholarships to Iraqi students for study at the recently-opened Islamic University in Medina. (Hayat, Nov 18)

Relations between the two countries deteriorated following Saudi Arabia's all-out support of Kuwaiti independence against Iraqi claims to sovereignty over it (see pp 117 ff). Iraqi papers described King Saud as an "imperialist agent," "autocrat," "crazy," "old sick man," etc. (Akhbar, June 27, July 14, Aug 5; Mustaqbal, July 8, 13, 24, Aug 5, 17, 30; Thawrah, July 25, 28, Aug 3, 9, 16)

Iraq-Sudan. On the occasion of Sudan's independence day, Qassim attended a Sudanese Embassy reception and cabled President Abduh his congratulations. Baghdad Radio broadcast a special programme. (R. Baghdad, Jan 1 [3]; Zaman, Jan 1; Iraq Times, Jan 9)

Ten Iraqi teachers were to leave for Sudan in Feb. (R. Baghdad, Jan 24-IMB, Jan 25)

In Feb, on the occasion of the Baghdad conference, Qassim discussed with the Sudanese FM, Ahmad Khayr, the relations between the two countries. (Iraq Times, Feb 2, 3)

On Sudan's attitude to the Kuwait conflict, see: The Kuwait Crisis.

In Oct it was reported that Iraq was studying a Yemeni request to supply her with teachers and agricultural experts. (ANA, Oct 9 [W 12])

In Oct, Gen. Qassim, attending a reception at the Yemeni Legation in Baghdad, stressed Iraq's determination to cooperate with Yemen in every field. (Zaman, Oct 13)

RELATIONS BETWEEN JORDAN AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES

JORDAN-LEBANON

Jordan Accused of Using Lebanon as Base for Sabotage in Syria; Aiding NSP. During the first three months of 1961, Damascus repeatedly accused Jordan of organizing sabotage in Syria, partly by using Lebanon as a base (see: Relations Between UAR and Jordan), as had been the case also during the last quarter of 1960. (MER 1960, p 154)

The indictment, relating to the attempted coup d'état by the Nationalist Social Party in Lebanon on Dec 30, stated that Jordan had provided the NSP with financial aid amounting to JD20,000. [The indictment did not allege direct Jordanian involvement in the coup.] (Hayat, May 10, 1962; see also: Lebanon, The Attempted NSP Coup.)

Other Political Issues. During Sept King Hussein decorated a number of Lebanese personalities for their "service to the Arab cause"; they included Sa'id Farhih, owner of Al-Sayyid, and Riyad Taha, owner of Al-Kifah newspapers. (Manar, Falastin, Sept 1, 20, 28)

Following the break-up of the UAR, Amman Radio attacked two Lebanese Ministers, Abdallah al-Mashnuq and Kamal Junbalat, for their hostile attitude to Syria. It took Mashnuq to task for his "disgraceful record, first as an advocate of foreign oil companies and then of the Baghdad Pact and finally as an agent of Abdel Nasser's embassy in Beirut." (R. Amman, Oct 5-IMB, Oct 6; R. Amman, Oct 6, [9])

It was reported that Lebanon had officially protested against these attacks to the Jordanian Government. This was officially denied by Amman, which added that the Lebanese Government had actually apologized for the attitude of the two ministers towards Jordan and Syria. A "ministerial source" in Beirut however insisted that it was Jordan which had apologized to Lebanon and not vice versa. (Jaridah, Oct 6, 7; R. Amman, ANA, Oct 6 [9])

On Oct 15, it was reported that Ali Abu Nuwar, the former Jordanian Chief of Staff (an opponent of King Hussein, in exile) had been expelled from Lebanon. He had arrived there two months earlier on a private visit. (Al-Yaum, Oct 15)

A Jordanian military delegation attended the Lebanese independence celebrations. (Manar, Nov 22)

Following King Hussein's attack on President Abdel Nasser in a recorded speech on Dec 15, Lebanese [pro-UAR] dailies sharply denounced the King, describing him as a "coward," "imperialist agent," etc. (Siyasah, Dec 17, 22; She'ab, Dec 20; Beirut al Masa', Dec 18, 20; Sawt al-Urubah, Dec 18). The Jordanian ambassador in Beirut reportedly explored the possibilities of suing the papers concerned. (Jaridah, Dec 19)

JORDAN-SAUDI ARABIA

In Jan it was reported that Saudi Arabia had proposed to Jordan the establishment of a joint fishing company in the Gulf of Aqaba. (R. Amman, Jan 29-IMB, Jan 30)

In June it was reported that Jordan had decided to raise her diplomatic representation in Saudi Arabia from chargé d'affaires to minister (Jihad, June 18). [By the end of the year this had not yet been done.]

King Hussein Visits King Saud. On July 29 King Hussein, accompanied by his Premier and several high officials and officers, arrived in Ta'if on a two-day visit to King Saud. (Reports on the forthcoming visit had already appeared during the first half of July, see e.g. Jihad, July 13.) A joint communiqué said that the two kings had discussed Arab issues and were in full accord as regards the needs for more efforts to unite the Arab ranks, to defend Arab rights, to deal with any Arab matters inside the Arab family, and to strengthen relations with the Islamic states and enhance the prestige of Islam. (R. Mecca, Amman, July 31 [Aug 3]; Jihad, Aug 1)

It was reported that King Saud had accepted an invitation to visit Jordan; the date had not been fixed. (Manar, Aug 1)

Al-Hayat reported from "reliable sources" that two issues had been discussed: the Kuwait crisis and the establishment of an Arab union. King Hussein was of the opinion that an Arab union based on full equality among the members should be established first between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, to be joined later by Jordan, Yemen, Iraq and the shaykhdoms. King Saud emphasized his desire to safeguard Kuwait's independence before any new arrangement. (Hayat, Aug 18)

After the break-up of the U.A.R., Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, alleged that King Hussein's object had been to enlist Saud's financial support for a coup in Syria in Aug, when Abdel Nasser was scheduled to be in Syria. The plot was called off by Abdel Nasser changed his schedule. (Ahram, Dec 1)

Miscellaneous. In Sept a Saudi Arabian delegation came to Amman to select 350 teachers for Saudi Arabian schools. (Difa, Sept 6)

LEBANON, LIBYA, SAUDI ARABIA, SUDAN, YEMEN: RELATIONS WITH ARAB COUNTRIES

(For relations of the above-mentioned countries with other Arab countries, see under other Arab countries.)

Lebanon-Libya. On June 12 the first Libyan Ambassador to Lebanon and Jordan arrived in Beirut, his place of residence. (Hayat, June 13)

In Sept talks in Beirut on the organized export of Lebanese fruit to Libya against the import of Libyan sheep reportedly led to an agreement in principle. (Hayat, Sept 15)

In Oct a Libyan delegation arrived in Beirut to discuss the possibility of engaging physicians and civil engineers for work in Libya. The head of the delegation told the press that the Lebanese authorities had undertaken to recruit the required experts. (Hayat, Oct 29)

Lebanon-Sudan. In Jan it was reported that Sudan had reduced customs on Lebanese fruit from 50% to 20%; contacts were being made for the conclusion of a Lebanese-Sudanese trade agreement. (ANA, Jan 16 [W 20])

In Aug Sudan informed Lebanon that it had approved in principle the conclusion of a commercial agreement and a delegation would come to Beirut for this purpose. A Lebanese draft stipulated the import into

In Sept it was reported that Jordan would loan Saudi Arabia some civil engineers. (Jihad, Sept 18)

In Oct King Saud and King Hussein exchanged messages on "Arab affairs." (Manar, Oct 12; R. Amman, Oct 15-16; Oct 16; Jihad, Oct 16)

OTHER COUNTRIES

Jordan-Libya. On Aug 30 the first Libyan Ambassador to Lebanon and Jordan—with residence in Beirut—presented his credentials to King Hussein. (Hayat, Aug 31) [Apparently no Jordanian representation had been established in Libya by the end of the year.]

Jordan-Sudan. On March 23 a Jordanian delegation, touring African countries, arrived in Khartoum on a two-day official visit. They were received by Gen. Abbud. (Hayat, March 24)

Jordan-Yemen. In Jan, on the eve of the Baghdad conference, Hassan Ibn Ibrahim, the Yemeni Foreign Minister, discussed in Amman with PM Talhuni "the forthcoming conference and Arab affairs in general." (Jihad, Jan 22-24)

On April 17, the first Yemeni diplomatic representative to Jordan, with the rank chargé d'affaires, presented his credentials to the Foreign Minister. He was received by King Hussein, to whom he handed a personal message from Imam Ahmad. (Jihad, April 18)

A Jordanian chargé d'affaires was to be appointed in the near future. (Jihad, April 18, 20)

Saudi Arabia-Sudan. At the end of Aug it was reported that full diplomatic relations would shortly be resumed between Saudi Arabia and Sudan. (Mid. Mir., Sept 2), [but by the end of 1961 this had apparently not come about]. (The two countries had withdrawn their ambassadors at the end of 1960; see MER 1960, p 168.)

Sudan agreed that the Arab League Council should meet in March 1962 in Saudi Arabia. (Mid. Mir., Nov 18)

In Dec a Saudi Arabian medical mission went to San'a to help combat a malaria epidemic. (Hayat, Dec 27)

INTER-ARAB RELATIONS FOLLOWING THE DISINTEGRATION OF THE UAR

ARAB REACTIONS TO THE SYRIAN COUP

(September-December)

[The Syrian coup began in the early morning of Sept 28 and, by the night of Sept 28/29, the separation from Egypt was accomplished. Abdel Nasser at first resolved to preserve the union by the employment of Egyptian forces, but on the night of Sept 28 he abandoned the idea of military intervention. On Oct 1 Abdel Nasser instituted a diplomatic blockade of Syria by cutting off relations with Jordan and Turkey which had recognized Syria.]

On the day of the coup, Sept 28, Arab reactions were generally non-committal due partly to uncertainty as to the aims of the leaders of the coup and its outcome. This, however, changed the next day. Jordan was the first to recognize Syria's independence, immediately after the establishment of the government, on the morning of Sept 29. No other Arab country followed suit. The Iraqi government during the following days made clear its sympathies with Syria. All other governments either remained publicly non-committal or expressed sympathy with the UAR. Morocco and Sudan were conspicuous among the latter.

Except for Jordan, already mentioned, the Arab countries granted Syria recognition only after President Abdel Nasser, on Oct 5, called off the diplomatic blockade he had imposed on the new republic.

Recognitions came as follows: Jordan—Sept 29; Iraq and Tunisia—Oct 9; Saudi Arabia—Oct 10; Kuwait—Oct 14; Libya—Oct 19; Yemen—Oct 25; Lebanon—Nov 8; Morocco—Dec 16. Sudan had not yet accorded recognition by the end of the year.]

(For details, see relations of individual Arab countries with the UAR and Syria.)

THE ISSUE AT THE ARAB LEAGUE

(October)

Tunisia Requests League Meeting. On Oct 2 Tunisia requested an immediate meeting of the League Political Committee to "examine the situation resulting from the Northern Region's secession from the UAR, and the formation of an independent Syrian state." (R. Tunis, Oct 2 [4])

In its cable to the League SG, the Tunisian government claimed that the secession was "a serious event which affects all Arab countries." It was a duty of the League "to face such situations and help member states." The Arabs were now facing a "flagrant contention between brothers and a war of words over the radio between Cairo and Damascus which is getting fiercer... and may perhaps extend to other Arab capitals, if the League remains with arms folded..." SG Hassenah should call an urgent meeting "lest this problem become a source of weakness and cause of differences within the Arab entity." (R. Tunis, Oct 5 [6])

UAR Protests "Interference in Internal Affairs." On Oct 4 Hassenah informed Tunisia that the UAR regarded the Tunisian request as an unacceptable interference in its internal affairs. Tunis Radio said this was "a misunderstanding of Tunisia's request... which was not intended to decide the attitude to the substance of the matter." (R. Tunis, Oct 5 [6])

Abdel Nasser Calls off Diplomatic Blockade of Syria;

Demands League Investigation Committee. In his speech of Oct 5, Abdel Nasser called off the diplomatic blockade of Syria, and said he would not oppose her admission to the Arab League. He also said the UAR would ask the Arab League to form an investigation committee immediately to examine Syrian accusations against the UAR government and personnel. (For details see: Relations Between Syria and the UAR). (R. Cairo, Oct 5 [7])

It was later learned that the establishment of such a committee was not a UAR condition for Syria's admittance to the Arab League. (R. Beirut, Oct 9 [11])

Syria's Admission to the League. On Oct 28, at an extraordinary session of the League Council in Cairo, Syria was admitted to the League, and the UAR request to set up an investigation committee to examine Syrian complaints against Egypt was referred to SG Hassenah. [No such committee was established in 1961.]

Syria became the twelfth member of the League. Before the meeting, Cairo Radio in Hebrew asserted the UAR's willingness for Syria's return to the League, explaining that every action by the League was beneficial to Arab solidarity and that therefore all Arab states were welcome in it, "even those under the influence of imperialism." (R. Cairo, Oct 28 [31]; R. Damascus, Oct 29 [31]; Hayat, Oct 29, Nov 1)

SYRIA PROPOSES "UNITED ARAB STATES"

(October)

The Syrian Proposal. On Oct 11 an appeal was published in Damascus by the Supreme Revolutionary Command and the government, addressed to the Syrian people, to Arab governments "seeking strength, dignity, freedom and prosperity for their peoples," and to "every free Arab," "calling upon all Arab governments to convene their parliaments or consultative assemblies to study and approve the following principles and enter into urgent negotiations for their implementation." The principles, fourteen in number, were:

(1) Formation of a "comprehensive voluntary Arab unity" (or union—wahdah arabiyah ta'w'iyah shāmīyah) on the basis of constitutional decentralization, preserving "their local peculiarities and requirements" (mumayyizat wa daruriyat mahalliyah);

(2) Every member country to preserve its own legislature and executive, and to maintain its regional and international sovereignty;

(3-4) The "United Arab States" (ad-dawlat al-arabiyah al-muttahidah) to have a "supreme legislative council" in which the member-states would be represented equally; decisions of the council to be binding on all members if accepted by a two-thirds majority. At first, the council would formulate a unified policy for "economic, military, foreign and cultural affairs," and for other subjects later on;

(5-6) A "higher executive council" to be established, with member-states providing the president in annual rotation; the duties of the council "to be confined to the supervision of the implementation of the resolutions adopted by the higher legislative council";

(7-8) National armies to be retained, but a unified army to be set up under a joint command; the duties of the unified army to be "the protection of the borders of the great Arab homeland, the repulsion of foreign aggression... and the liberation of its usurped... components";

- (9) Member-states not to interfere in each other's internal affairs;
- (10) Safeguards against precipitate withdrawal from the union;
- (11) Foreign policy based on peaceful coexistence, positive neutrality and non-alignment;
- (12) Differences between member states to be settled by a "supreme Arab constitutional court";
- (13) The higher legislative council may amend the constitution;
- (14) "Unified Arab entities" (kiyanat arabiyah muwashshadah) may be set up within the framework of the "comprehensive Arab unity." (R. Damascus, Oct 11 [12]; Nasr, Oct 12)

Cairo Reaction Hostile. Egyptian comments were uniformly hostile: the Syrian proposal was akin to such "unions designed by imperialism" as the Hashimite Union, the Fertile Crescent and the Greater Syria plan; it enjoyed the approval of King Hussein and Israel, it aimed at a "union of words"; it was not worth listening to. (R. Cairo, Oct 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 [13, 14, 16, 17]; Akram, Gumburiyah, Akhbar, Oct 12)

Lebanese Opinions: Plan Prompted By Political Considerations. [Lebanese pro-UAR papers widely quoted by Cairo Radio took the same attitude as Cairo.] As to other Beirut papers:

Al-Jaridah said that a call for any kind of Arab union before the Arab states had won the battle of internal consolidation was unrealistic. It asked if the Syrian plan was not merely a method for launching a counter-offensive against Cairo. In any case it was no more than a bid to reorganize the Arab League. (Jaridah, Oct 12)

Al-Hayaz indicated that political necessities might have induced Syria to submit the plan, yet it considered it "a very special document" since it was the first time that an Arab government presented a well-defined plan that could be taken as a basis for discussion after settling the present dispute. (Hayat, Oct 13)

Jordanian and Iraqi Comments Non-Committal. [In Jordan official comments were friendly, though non-committal.] On Oct 11 PM Talhuni said that the Syrian appeal had had "a good effect" but the reply should come from the parliaments, as specified by the Syrian appeal itself, and this needed time, study and discussion. (R. Amman, Oct 11-12, Oct 12)

King Hussein said the plan merited serious study, since it recognized equality among the Arab states willing to join the union and rejected the idea that unity must be centred on one person. (R. Amman, Oct 14 [17])

Baghdad papers at first published the Syrian proposal without any comment (Zaman, Bayan, Thawrah, Ahali, Fajr al-Jadid, Oct 12-15). Al-Bayan later wrote that an Arab liberated front including Iraq, Syria and Egypt should be established to deal with current Arab questions. (Bayan, Oct 16)

[By mid-Oct the issue had faded out.]

THE UAR'S NEW ARAB POLICY: ELIMINATION OF "REACTION AND IMPERIALIST SUPPORTERS" BEFORE UNION

(October-December)

Abdel Nasser: The Fight Against Imperialism—In the Palaces of Reaction. On Oct 16 President Abdel Nasser, in a programmatic speech following the break-up of the UAR, called for "revolutionary action" to implement the UAR's "revolutionary socialism." The speech was primary directed at the Egyptians but the UAR's relations with the Arab countries were referred to, at least indirectly, in the passages dealing with reaction.

Abdel Nasser described the Syrian coup as a reactionary blow designed to undo the revolutionary social laws introduced two months earlier, in July. Abdel Nasser concluded that it had been a mistake to make peace with reaction on the basis that the reactionaries were at least sons of the same Arab people. Experience had shown that reaction would always ally itself with imperialism to recover its privileges. It had been a mistake [during the last few years] to direct the blows against imperialism at military alliances and bases "where it no longer existed," while imperialism had changed its position and "concealed itself in the palaces and safes of millionaires." "We must fight imperialism in the palaces of reaction. We must fight reaction in the arms of imperialism." No compromise could be reached with reaction on national grounds. [Except for Syria, Abdel Nasser mentioned no names, and the attack on reaction could be interpreted as directed at "internal reaction."] (R. Cairo, Oct 16 [18]; Akram, Oct 17)

From Oct 21 onwards and into Nov, there followed the sequestration in the UAR of the property of over 800 "capitalist reactionaries" and the detention of many of them; the sequestrations also affected the property of many citizens or former citizens of other Arab countries. (See p 626 b.)

Arab Reactions: "Attempt to Save Egyptian Regime."

Commentators in Jordan, Syria and in part of the Lebanese press saw in Abdel Nasser's speech and in the sequestrations defensive measures to save the regime. These comments appeared together with reports of alleged military plotting against the regime, against a general background of instability, popular unrest and stringent security measures. (BBGM, Oct 19, 24; Nasr, Wahdah, Damascus, Oct 18; Sabah, Beirut, Oct 23; Jaridah, Oct 24)

Syrian papers claimed that the sequestration of property in Egypt owned by Syrians who had settled there and established industries before Abdel Nasser was born, was a retaliation for the Syrian revolution. (Nasr, Oct 23; Ayyam, Oct 24)

Although King Saud was described by the UAR as a reactionary and charged with having plotted the destruction of the UAR, Saudi Arabia unsuccessfully endeavoured to maintain friendly relations with the UAR. (See: Relations Between the UAR and Saudi Arabia.)

In Dec Imam Ahmad wrote a poem denouncing the policy of nationalization as a sin in the eyes of Islam. In reply, Abdel Nasser described social conditions in Yemen as "contrary to the law of justice and the law of God." At the end of the month, the UAR announced the dissolution of the Union of Arab States. (For details, see: Relations Between the UAR and Yemen.)

Syria Proclaims Arab Socialism. On Oct 17, the day after Abdel Nasser's speech, the Syrian government proclaimed its social and economic policy in an official statement entitled "The revolution of the new era and Arab socialism." The statement advocated the establishment of a regime in the Arab countries which would combine socialism and democracy. It defined socialism as a means to the attainment of the aims of Arab nationalism: a free Arab society and a great Arab civilization. Arab socialism would free the individual from all forms of enslavement, "whether by existing economic conditions or by tyrannical rule." The statement then outlined detailed policies for Syria. (See also: Syria, Internal Affairs.) (R. Damascus, Oct 17 [19])

[This statement should be seen primarily in the context of internal Syrian politics; it certainly could not have been prepared in its entirety as a reaction to Abdel Nasser's speech the evening before. It is, however, indicative of the fact that "Arab socialism" was at that time the proper attire for any Arab regime which wished to be regarded as progressive.]

The UAR: "Socialism Must Precede Union." In Dec, after the UAR had reopened its offensive against King Saud and his regime (end of Oct) and when the anti-nationalization poem by Imam Ahmad of Yemen was published (Dec 13), Hassanein Haykal wrote that "socialism must precede the union, to prepare for it"; this had been proved in Syria where reaction was able to exploit "local chauvinism" (na'arāt mahalliyah) in order to strike against the union. (Ahram, Dec 15; BBCM, Dec 18)

In a speech at Port Said on Dec 23, devoted mainly to Arab affairs, Abdel Nasser said the UAR was raising the banner of socialism and would expose imperialism and its supporters: King Saud and King Hussein and the reactionaries in Iraq, Lebanon and Syria. If anybody asked him: "Why do you not liberate Palestine?" Abdel Nasser said, his answer was: "I am first waiting to get rid of reactionaries and the fifth column in the Arab countries." (For source, see below.)

Abdel Nasser; Principles, Not Plots, Are Our Weapons. Abdel Nasser strongly denied foreign press allegations that he was resorting to intrigues, although others had been plotting, unsuccessfully, against the UAR. "Had I plotted, I would have finished them all in two months," he said. At the same time, he warned that the day might yet come "when he will be compelled to prove" this. However, plots were useless; principles were the strongest weapons. "The things I am saying are reiterated by every Arab... moaning under the yoke of reaction and imperialism." (R. Cairo, Dec 23 [28])

Arab and Pharaonic Egypt. In an article published on Dec 29 Hassanein Haykal set forth in more detail the tenets of Egypt's post-union Arab policy.

He first made the point that Egypt's Arabism was "eternal." To accept this fact did not entail dissociation from Pharaonic Egypt, "the creator of human civilization"; the first grew out of the latter. Pharaonism was not a charge to be levelled at Egypt but an honour. On the other hand, "angry pride" did not befit the Egyptians even if such a charge was levelled by people who had no history whatever, and who had been apes in the pre-history of man. Nor did it befit Egyptians to compare their powerful progressive state of twenty seven million people with "a collection of tribes" ruled by imperialist agents. The Arabism of Egypt should not be subject to discussion. (For source, see below.)

Twofold Egyptian Policy: "As a State and As a Revolution" With Revolution Having Priority. Haykal explained that during the present socialist phase of the struggle, "we should differentiate between Egypt as a state" dealing with all Arab governments and "Egypt as a revolution" which should deal only with the peoples. Egypt as a revolution should carry its call across the borders and at the same time "initiate its peaceful revolutionary upsurge towards the Arab future. If we really believe in unity... in the existence of one Arab nation, we have no right to separate ourselves from the struggle of other citizens of our nation." Egypt as a revolution "will not be the Cairo government but it will become the progressive party within the framework of the Arab nation. It should extend its hand to all progressive elements of the nation, stand beside them openly, and help and support them." In so far as contradictions arose between Egypt's two roles, preference should be given to the revolutionary role. "We should even be prepared to freeze the effectiveness of the Arab League if it were to be used as a means to paralyze our movement."

After defining imperialism and reaction as the enemy, Haykal wrote: "We must clearly realize that the palaces of reaction" in Amman, Riyadh and elsewhere "are now the battlefield against imperialism and reaction."

The main weapons in this battle, according to Haykal, were "a continuous call against all that we revolt against and for all that we revolt for; clear support for whoever believes in what we believe in and whoever struggles, behind the artificial borders, for freedom, socialism and unity; honest implementation, within the boundaries of our homeland, which is the base, of all the principles we advocate, so that our small homeland may be a living part of our nation's major aspirations." Bribery, plots, bullets and bombs were not weapons to be used in this battle. (Ahram, Dec 29)

RELATIONS BETWEEN SYRIA AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES

SYRIA-THE UAR

NOTE: Relations between the UAR (Egypt) and Syria as independent entities, for the purpose of this survey, are assumed to start on Sept 29 with the establishment of the Syrian government in the morning, and President Abdel Nasser's decision to forgo attempts at restoring the union by force of arms, which he broadcast on the afternoon of Sept 29. (For previous developments, see: The Dissolution of the UAR.)

Abdel Nasser Calls Off Military Operation, Encourages Opposition to Syrian Regime. At 15.20 GMT on Sept 29, Abdel Nasser declared in a broadcast from Cairo that the previous day he had ordered the navy and air force to carry two parachute brigades to Aleppo and Latakia, where "the people were calling for the preservation of... unity." When, however, "the separatists" gained the upper hand in the region, he cancelled these orders, after 120 paratroopers had already landed in Latakia area, "to avoid Arab bloodshed."

[Addressing himself to the Egyptians] Abdel Nasser urged them to overcome their bitterness at the treason committed by a handful of ambitious intriguers in the service of reaction. Arabism needed their devotion more than ever. He felt confident that the people of Syria would succeed in protecting the gains made under the union and that they would "stand against capitalist dictatorship, treachery and rejection of principles." (R. Cairo, Sept 29 [Oct 2])

On Oct 2, in his next public address, Abdel Nasser claimed that the Syrians were struggling to save the union. "The people in Aleppo and the people in Deir ez-Zor are struggling and fighting at this decisive moment to save the UAR... This, brothers, is... the Syrian Arab people. This is the Syrian Arab army. Since Thursday [Sept 28]... they have been fighting in Aleppo... in Damascus, ... in Deir ez-Zor." He promised no direct support. (R. Cairo, Oct 2 [4])

Diplomatic Blockade. On Oct 1 the UAR severed its diplomatic relations with Jordan and Turkey, which had been the first to recognize the Syrian Republic on Sept 29, on the ground that their recognition of the "separatist reactionary movement in the Northern Region" constituted a hostile act and interference in UAR internal affairs. The UAR Foreign Ministry informed all foreign diplomatic representatives in Cairo of this measure, as well as UAR representatives abroad, including those at the UN. (Ahram, Oct 2)

Mutual Propaganda Campaign. From the evening of Sept 28, a sharp propaganda campaign developed between the Cairo and the Syrian press and radio. The Cairo stations broadcast appeals to the people of Syria not to allow a "handful of opportunists and reactionaries" to attack Arab unity and deprive them of the social benefits they had won, and reported news of alleged demonstrations, riots and clashes in Syrian towns and villages. Abdel Nasser's speeches were repeatedly broadcast. There were constant calls to "rise in rebellion." (For the image of the Syrian revolution and its leaders, as presented during these days, see: The Dissolution of the UAR.) (R. Cairo, V of A, Sept 30, Oct 1 [Oct 3], Oct 2, 3 [4], Oct 3, 4 [5], Oct 4 [6])

Spokesmen for the new Syrian regime concentrated in the main on blaming Cairo and Abdel Nasser personally for having made dissolution inevitable as well as final because of their alleged imperialistic corruption, tyranny, and treachery on Sept 28. (For details, see: The Dissolution of the UAR.) A statement by Syrian politicians in support of the dissolution called on the people of Egypt to free themselves from the "dictatorship" which had led to the separation of Syria from Egypt.

At the same time there were repeated expressions of hope that Arahim might bring the two peoples together again. (R. Damascus, Sept 28 [29], 29 [Oct 2], Oct 1 [3], Oct 2 [4])

Syrian Appeal To Abdel Nasser To Cease Propaganda Campaign. In the afternoon of Oct 5, the Syrian Revolutionary Command published an "historic appeal" to Abdel Nasser, terming the events in Syria an "uprising of justice" and calling upon Abdel Nasser, from a position of strength and equality, to cease "the war of radios and abuse," which, it said, was not started by the Syrians, "and we will do likewise." The appeal also assured Abdel Nasser that Syria would never again submit to his rule and requested him to ask himself whether he was not the prime obstacle to Arab unity and ought not to give up leadership and the presidency. If Abdel Nasser chose to ignore the appeal and refused to treat the new regime in Syria as brethren "under a comprehensive Arab unity," the Arab peoples "would act as umpires." (R. Damascus, Oct 5 [7]; Narr, Oct 6)

The broadcast of this appeal was begun at 4 p.m. GMT, simultaneously with Abdel Nasser's broadcast (for which see immediately below).

Abdel Nasser Calls Off Diplomatic Blockade, Advocates Internal Unity But Withholds Recognition. [A new phase started with Abdel Nasser's speech on the evening of Oct 5.] Abdel Nasser said he could not consent to a situation in which "Cairo and Damascus were not comrades in struggle," where the Syrian army might find itself called upon to fight the Syrian people and where the strength of the Syrian people itself might be dissipated. Thus, just as he had previously rejected "military war" as a means of maintaining unity, he now rejected civil war [in Syria] as a substitute for it. Abdel Nasser also did not wish to impose a political blockade on Syria as it was the Syrian people that would suffer from it. National unity inside Syria took priority and should be regarded as a preparation for Arab unity.

Damascus had hitherto been unable to secure international recognition, the President said, whereas "the civilized world has expressed to me... support for the UAR. I regard this as sufficient..." The UAR would not oppose Syria's membership in the UN and in the Arab League.

The UAR, however, would "not recognize any government in Damascus except after a free and popular decision by the Syrians determining their road." Abdel Nasser repudiated the accusations levelled against the UAR from Damascus, concerning its stewardship of the union and in particular asked that a committee be appointed by the Arab League to verify the following points: (1) that the gold reserves and cover for the Syrian currency were intact in the Central Bank, Damascus, as before the union and that the Syrian treasury had benefited from the union in several aspects which he detailed; (2) that no more than 95 persons were under detention [for political reasons] in Syria [at the time of the revolution], despite "many cases of plotting"; (3) that the parachutists dropped over Latakia on Sept 28 had orders not to fire, and did not carry counterfeit Syrian money; (4) the meritorious and unselfish services of Egyptian personnel in Syria under the union. (R. Cairo, Oct 5 [7]; Ahram, Oct 6)

It was later learned from "informed circles" that the request for a committee of investigation was not an Egyptian condition for Syria's admittance into the Arab League. (R. Beirut, Oct 9 [11])

(On further developments regarding the committee, see below: Question of Investigation Committee and Efforts to Settle Outstanding Matters.)

Syrian PM Acknowledged Abdel Nasser's "Retreat." PM Kuzbari's first "snap" reaction to Abdel Nasser's speech [which was widely acclaimed in the Arab countries and abroad for its moderation and as a remarkable feat of statesmanship] was reported as enthusiastic. A Syrian senior official quoted him as saying: "It is everything we could have asked... we will re-establish a new relationship on the basis of fraternity." Overnight, however, a radical change of tone occurred, reportedly under Army pressure. (Daily Telegraph, Daily Herald, Oct 7; Akhbar, Cairo, Oct 8; for more details, see p 496 a.)

On the morning of Oct 6, Damascus Radio broadcast a statement by PM Kuzbari, [consistent in tone with the Revolutionary Command's appeal of the previous day]. Kuzbari acknowledged Abdel Nasser's "retreat and admission of truth" which stemmed, however, merely from his "realization that... recognition of the new regime was imminent and inevitable and that a political siege would be directed against himself alone if he continued to sever relations with every state which recognized [Syria]." Dr Kuzbari restated the Syrian charges against Egyptian rule under the union, without referring to Abdel Nasser's demand for an Arab League committee of enquiry; he expressed his resentment at Abdel Nasser's continued smears of the new regime.

"The Arab people in Syria," Kuzbari continued, stretched out its hand to "the brotherly people of Egypt" as well as to all Arabs, to establish real Arab unity, but it refused to allow "an individual... to subject them to his designs." After further denunciations of President Abdel Nasser, Kuzbari concluded: "We only hope that the Arab people in Egypt will be able to do the same (i.e., "express their will with complete liberty") so that they may enjoy the freedom which God has bestowed upon us. Long live the Syrian Arab Republic! Long live true Arab unity!" (R. Damascus, Oct 6 [7]; Nasr, Oct 6, 7)

Kuzbari reportedly accepted Abdel Nasser's proposal on the committee of enquiry, but insisted that it should investigate the situation in both Syria and Egypt. (Daily Telegraph, Oct 7)

Comparative Let-Up in Propaganda Warfare. After Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 5, Cairo Radio discontinued its direct attacks on the Syrian regime (BBCM, Oct 9). Cairo radio stations, however, soon resumed with quotations from Cairo and Lebanese papers alleging failures of the new regime, its unpopularity, corruption and anti-nationalist character. There was no return to direct incitement to rebellion or sabotage. The response to Syria's call for a loose all-Arab federation was negative and abusive. (For details, see p 160 a.)

Syrian broadcasts continued to charge the Egyptians with a rule of terror, etc. under the union. (See BBCM, IMB, Oct 10-Nov)

Repatriation of Egyptians and Syrians. [The repatriation of Egyptians from Syria and Syrians from Egypt started within a day of the coup but was completed only on Nov 20, as it encountered many difficulties, apparently because the two sides suspected each other of intending to hold back certain of the other's military personnel.]

[No total figures on the number of repatriates was available] but it was reported that, on the eve of the coup, there were 1,800 Egyptian officers in Syria. (R. Amman, Oct 24-IMB, Oct 25)

On Sept 30, Communiqué No. 20 of the Revolutionary Command called on all Egyptian employees in Syria, women excepted, to surrender on Oct 1 to the military commands of the areas in which they worked. The deadline was subsequently extended to Oct 5. (R. Damascus, Sept 30, Oct 4 [3, 6])

Lebanon agreed to a request from Cairo to look after Egyptians during their repatriation from Syria. (Amal, Beirut, Oct 1)

On Sept 30 Kamal Rifat, the Minister of Labour, and Tharwat Ukashah, the Minister of Education, were reported on their way back to Egypt, accompanied by eighty five Egyptians. The exodus via Lebanon started on Oct 1 and by Oct 4 7,000 Egyptian civilians were reported to have been repatriated. (Ahram, Sept 30; Amal, Beirut, Oct 1; Hayat, Oct 3, 4)

However, difficulties soon arose. On Oct 3 it was reported that the Syrian government had decided to detain Egyptian military personnel in retaliation for the Egyptian refusal to permit Syrian officials and officers to leave Egypt. (Jaridah, Oct 3)

On Oct 7 the first group of Syrian officers and their families, 700 in number, arrived by sea at Beirut and were conveyed to Syria. (SNA, Oct 8; MENA, ANA, Oct 7 [10])

On Oct 12 Gen. Zahr ad-Din accused Cairo of preventing the repatriation of Syrian officers; in retaliation, Syria had stopped the repatriation of Egyptian officers. (Jaridah, Oct 13)

The next day Al-Ahram wrote that it was the Syrian authorities who had stopped repatriation of Egyptian officers, for which the paper found two reasons: (1) The officers who had led the revolt hoped that Egypt would retaliate by stopping the repatriation of the Syrian officers, in order that they might themselves occupy all the key positions before the return of these officers; (2) the authorities were attempting to force the Egyptian officers to work in order to alleviate technical deficiencies in the Syrian army. (Ahram, Oct 13)

Nonetheless, repatriation from both sides continued but Cairo complained on Oct 21 that Syria was repatriating far less Egyptians than Egypt Syrians. (R. Cairo, Oct 18, 21; R. Amman, Oct 24-IMB, Oct 18, 22, 25; Jaridah, Oct 21, 22)

At the same time, Nur ad-Din Kahhalah, the former Syrian Vice President of the UAR, and five former Syrian ministers in the UAR cabinet—Abd al-Wahhab Humad, Shawkat al-Qanawati, Nahid al-Qasim, Thabit al-Aris, Ahmad al-Hajji Yunis—returned to Damascus from Cairo. (Manar, Jordan, Oct 23)

At the end of Oct the UAR complained to the Arab League of maltreatment of the Egyptian officers in Syria and asked for an investigation. (R. Cairo, Oct 30-IMB, Oct 30)

On Nov 2 Cairo reported that the UAR and Syria had reached an agreement under the auspices of the Arab League for the completion of the repatriation. There were still 780 Egyptian officers in Syria and 930 Syrian officers in the UAR. (R. Cairo, Nov 1-IMB, Nov 1; Ahram, Nov 3). New difficulties arose, however, as Cairo claimed that the Syrians were not repatriating as many Egyptians as they had agreed to. (Ahram, Nov 5, 7)

An incident occurred on Nov 8/9, when an Egyptian captain who had carried Syrian repatriates in his ship to Beirut refused to enter the port as he was carrying some twenty Syrians less than had been agreed upon, and he feared, as he later explained, that the Syrian authorities would therefore refuse to let the Egyptian repatriates embark. The Syrian officers on board became alarmed and threatened to seize the ship. Later, assurances from the Arab League persuaded the captain to enter port. (Mid. Mir., Nov 11)

Repatriation was finally completed on Nov 20. (Mid. Mir., Nov 25)

Syria Charges Egyptian-Directed Infiltration From Lebanon. On Oct 27 a statement by a Syrian military spokesman said that the previous night an armed group had tried to enter Syria from Lebanon. After a clash with Syrian frontier guards, the infiltrators fled, leaving behind machine-guns and explosives; three of their number were killed. The Minister of the Interior added that the attempt had been organized by Abd al-Majid Farid, "an Egyptian saboteur expert." [Col. Abd al-Majid Farid had been UAR military attaché in Baghdad until he was expelled from Iraq in March 1959 in connection with the Shawwaf mutiny.] Later Damascus Radio asserted that the infiltrators had been sent by Abdel Nasser "to mar the Syrian Arab revolution and the rejoicing of the people at their deliverance." (R. Damascus, Oct 27, 30 [Oct 28, Nov 1])

Lebanon and Egypt Deny Syrian Charges. A spokesman for the Lebanese security authorities denied the Syrian allegations; he said that "the Egyptian officer mentioned" had stayed in Lebanon three days only and left it ten days before; the incident was one of the clashes between shepherds and Syrian forces along the frontier. (Jaridah, Oct 29)

The same day Al-Ahrām reported that the UAR had requested Lebanon to investigate the "Damascus allegations" and to submit its findings to the Arab League or to make them public. (Ahrām, Oct 29)

Cairo Radio added that "the allegation was part of a new reactionary, imperialist attempt to stigmatize the UAR as a plotter." (R. Cairo, Oct 29-IMB, Oct 30)

A Second Infiltration Into Syria Reported. On Nov 1 a Syrian military spokesman announced that another group of infiltrators had tried to enter Syria from the vicinity of Zahle. The group had retired after an exchange of fire with a Syrian frontier patrol (R. Damascus, Nov 1 [3]). A Lebanese spokesman stated that no information had been received from Damascus regarding this incident. (Jaridah, Nov 3)

Spat of Syrian Complaints of UAR Aggression. The specific Syrian charges recorded above were followed by more generalized accusations against the UAR for organizing, and against Lebanon for abetting, hostile actions from Lebanese bases. Abd al-Hamid Ghālib, the UAR ambassador in Beirut, and [Col.] Abd al-Majid Farid were accused of organizing infiltration and the landing of arms and explosives on the Syrian coast for the purpose of sabotage and propaganda.

A group of Egyptian officers, experts in subversion of the Arab countries, and headed by Muhi al-Din Khufajah, had arrived in Lebanon and had been handed $1.5m. by Ghālib to finance their activities. Captain Ahmad Shīnāwī, a UAR officer formerly stationed in Syria, was said to head a group of Egyptian engineering officers who were training Lebanese—especially members of the Popular Resistance (see MER 1960, p 347)—Palestinians and Jordanians in the handling of explosive devices for use in Syria. The Lebanese were urged to expel the "slanders and saboteurs," while articles in the press warned the Lebanese government not to let its country become "a corridor of aggression" against Syria. (R. Damascus, Nov 4-7 [7, 8]; Nasr, Nov 5, 6; Ayyam, Nov 7; NYT, Nov 7)

Syrian Commandos Destroy pro-UAR Radio Station Inside Lebanon. On Nov 6 "authoritative sources" in Damascus disclosed that, on the night of Oct 27, a Syrian force had blown up a secret radio transmitter which was being assembled under the supervision of [Col.] Abd al-Majid Farid [the Egyptian intelligence officer] at Hulwa, about a mile inside the Lebanese frontier near the Beirut-Damascus road; three men of the transmitter team were killed and seven captured, one of them an Egyptian and the others Lebanese and Palestinians. The station was to support Egyptian attacks on Syria. The action was taken since Lebanon had not acted on Syrian complaints in the matter.

Another secret transmitter, calling itself "The Voice of Arab Unity," was said to be operating from Sidon in Lebanon [40 kms. south of Beirut]. No such station was monitored either by BBCM or IMB; however, a pro-UAR radio station calling itself "Voice of the Arab Nation" (saunt al-ummah al-arabiyyah) was monitored by BBCM on Oct 31 on, to the end of the year. [No record of broadcasts by a "Voice of Arab Unity" could be identified.] (Dimashq al-Masā, No. 2672, Nov 7, erroneously dated Nov 6; Hayat, NYT, Nov 7; ANA, Oct 30 [W Nov 2]; BBCM, Nov 2, Nov-Dec)

Lebanese Denials; Syrian Warning. The Lebanese Minister of the Interior described as "untrue" all reports about the clandestine radio station and subversive activities and said he would send a senior security official to Damascus to discuss relations between the two countries and the Syrian charges. (Hayat, Nov 10)

During Nov 13-15, Damascus Radio repeatedly accused the UAR ambassador in Beirut of spending large sums of money to buy support for the UAR and to finance armed incursions into Syria. (R. Damascus, Nov 13-15 [15-17])

(Syrian warnings to Lebanon culminated on Nov 16 with a statement by Dr Kuzbari. See: Relations Between Syria and Lebanon.)

Lebanon Offers To Mediate. On Nov 27 Rafiq Naja, the Lebanese Minister of Economy, after his mission to Damascus (see: Relations Between Syria and Lebanon) declared that Syria welcomed an offer of mediation by President Shehab between Syria and the UAR, to end the propaganda warfare between them. (Jaridah, Nov 28)

Negative Egyptian Attitude to Syrian Elections. The Egyptian attitude to the referendum and elections held in Syria on Dec 1-2 was negative. The atmosphere was described as one of terror and corruption, and the Syrian public was called upon to abstain from voting. (See, e.g. R. Cairo, Nov 30 [Dec 2]; Dec 1, 2 [4].)

Egyptian comments saw in the election results proof that the Syrian people rejected the "separatist regime". (e.g. R. Cairo, Dec 2, 3 [5], 4 [6].)

[Cairo did not recognize Syria after the elections despite Abdel Nasser's statement of Oct 5 (see above).]

Question of Investigation Committee and Efforts to Settle Outstanding Matters. On Oct 28 an extraordinary session of the Arab League Council discussed the application of Syria for membership of the League and the UAR request to set up an investigation committee, which had been made by President Abdel Nasser on Oct 5 (see above).

The council approved Syria's application and decided to refer the UAR request to SG Hāsūnāh (Hayat, Oct 29, Nov 1). [No such committee was established.]

On Nov 2, through Hāsūnāh's mediation, the UAR and Syria agreed on the final repatriation of Egyptian and Syrian military personnel, as well as on the formation of expert committees to discuss and settle other outstanding matters between the two countries following the completion of the repatriation. (Hayat, Nov 7)

On Nov 22, following the completion of the repatriation, a Syrian delegation consisting of Col. Zuhayr Aql and Lt-Col. Muhammad al-Jandali came to the Arab League HQ in Cairo to negotiate on the formation of the committees, through the mediation of Sayyid Nawfal, the League Assistant SG. There were no direct meetings between the Egyptians and the Syrians. (Hayat, Nov 24)

At the end of Nov it was reported from Cairo that an agreement had been signed for the setting up of three committees to discuss foreign, financial and military affairs, to commence work on Dec 15 at the League HQ in Cairo. (R. Beirut, Nov 29 [Dec 1])

Syria appointed its delegates to the committees, but by the end of Dec negotiations had not been opened (ANA, Dec 9 [12]; Ayyam, Dec 10, 15, 29). [Egyptian sources made no mention at all of the whole issue of negotiations.]

On Dec 13 Syria lifted restrictions on the import of certain commodities from Egypt, including sesame, glycerine, cement and typewriter ribbons. (ANA, Dec 13 [W 21])

Syria Announces Abstention From Propaganda War. On Dec 20 Dr Mustafa al-Barudi, Syrian Minister of Propaganda and Information, "reaffirmed" that Syria would abstain from radio and press campaigns against any other Arab country, "despite provocations by Cairo." (R. Damascus, Dec 20 [22])

By the end of the year, no more mutual radio attacks had been monitored. (BBCM, IMB, Dec)

However, Abdel Nasser, in a speech on Dec 23, again attacked the Syrian "stooges of imperialism" and "reactionaries" who had destroyed the union and afterwards abused Abdel Nasser and the Egyptians. (Ahram, Dec 24; BBCM, Dec 28)

SYRIA-IRAQ

Iraq's Attitude on the Break-up of the UAR. Iraq's official attitude towards the revolt in Syria and the break-up of the UAR was cautious, but on Oct 2 Qasim let it be known that Iraq supported an independent Syria. Recognition of the new republic came on Oct 9, four days after Abdel Nasser had stated that he would not impose a diplomatic blockade upon Syria. (See: The UAR-Iraq)

Iraq Silent on Syrian Arab Union Plan. The Iraqi press published, without any comment, the Syrian proposal for a "comprehensive voluntary Arab union." (p 160 a.)

Economic Agreement and Expressions of Unity. On Oct 29 a Syrian economic delegation, led by Awad Barakat, Minister of Economy and Trade, and including, among others, Fu'ad al-Adil, Minister of Labour, and Brig. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini, Assistant Chief of Staff, arrived in Baghdad. (R. Baghdad, Oct 29-IMB, Oct 30)

On Nov 1 Qasim, at a dinner party for the delegation, said that the Iraqi Army had been alerted from the day Syria broke with Egypt, in order to "deal a blow" to "the treacherous imperialists before they reach Syria." He added that Syria was linked with Iraq "historically, nationally, geographically" and their peoples were one people. He continued that the lessons of history showed that all empires, whether secular or religious, were doomed to failure, and this was also true for the Arab empire. He therefore advocated "fraternal links" between the Arabs.

In reply, Fu'ad al-Adil declared that unity between Iraq and Syria was "natural, not artificial." (Zaman, Iraq Times, Nov 2)

On Nov 3 an economic agreement was signed in Baghdad.

The two countries would permit direct exports from and imports to each other of local products. Such products were exempted from customs duties except for certain manufactured articles. On some of these, duties were to be paid in full while on other items duties were reduced by 25% or 50%. The agreement also provided for most favoured nation treatment, facilities for freedom of personal movement by abolition of visas, and freedom of residence, work and economic activity "in accordance with the arrangements to be agreed upon." Goods in transit except oil through pipelines would be exempted from dues. Iraqi use of Syrian ports would be facilitated; vehicles would freely enter and cross Syrian and Iraqi territory; consignments to Iraq would be carried in equal measure by Iraqi and Syrian trucks.

A joint experts' committee would be established to overcome obstacles, suggest revisions, and study coordination of industry with a view to making the two countries economically complementary. The two governments would encourage joint investments.

The agreement would be valid for two years with automatic renewal unless one side asked for its termination or revision at least three months in advance. (Iraq Times, Nov 5; R. Baghdad, Nov 3 [W 9])

The head of the Syrian delegation said that the agreement would increase trade nearly ten-fold and from the long-term point of view, it would lay the foundations for complementary economies (Ayyam, Nov 5). The Iraqi and Syrian radio and press gave much publicity to the agreement, describing it as "the initiation of real Arab solidarity" and as "a bold step, opening wide vistas for economic expansion." (R. Baghdad, V. of A., Damascus-IMB, Nov 3-6; BBCM, Nov 6-7)

Instruments of ratification were exchanged on Dec 20. (R. Baghdad, Dec 20 [W, 28])

The First Syrian Ambassador Arrived in Baghdad on Nov 26. The Ambassador, Fahmi Sultan, told reporters that Gen. Qasim was "the leader of the entire Arab world." (Iraq Times, Nov 27)

[By the end of 1961, no Iraqi ambassador had apparently as yet been accredited to Damascus.]

Civil Aviation Agreement. On Nov 25 Iraqi Airways and Syrian Arab Airlines initiated a draft agreement providing for two weekly flights on the Baghdad-Damascus route by each airline; it was hoped that flights would commence in Jan 1962. (Iraq Times, Nov 27)

The Issue of the Euphrates Dam. [The building of a dam on the Euphrates, to irrigate the Jazirah and provide electricity, had for long been envisaged by the Syrian authorities as a major development project. Since 1957, Soviet aid had been expected. When it failed to materialize, West Germany agreed, in July 1961, to provide credits to the tune of DM 500m. Thereafter, German experts proceeded with survey works.]

The Euphrates has its source in Turkey and continues through Syria and Iraq into the Shatt al-Arab and the Persian Gulf.]

When implementation of the project began to seem practical, the question of Iraqi rights came up.

In May the Syrian Minister of Public Works said, in answer to a journalist's question, that the dam would also benefit Iraq by regulating the water flow; Syria would use less water than was its due (Ayyam, May 12). In July he said that the building of the dam was the "right of the UAR" and Iraq could not object to it. (R. Damascus, July 11 [W 20])

In Aug Iraqi papers began to protest that unilateral action by the UAR would cause Iraq untold harm, and urged joint utilization of the river (Bayan, Aug 7; Zaman, Aug 26). An (unnamed) Iraqi irrigation expert said that preliminary negotiations on the Euphrates' question had been going on for some time between Iraq and the UAR. He said that as both Iraqi and UAR plans for the development of the Euphrates valley had reached an advanced stage, it was both possible and imperative for them to coordinate these plans as a matter of urgency; thus each party would be made fully aware of the limits of its rights and its obligations. Iraq's acquired water rights were "fairly well covered by the terms of international law." Of the annual average discharge of the Euphrates at Hit near the Iraqi-Syrian border (29 million cubic metres), Iraq consumed at present 17 million, irrigating about 1.38 million hectares; these were "acquired rights." Syria utilized some 2 million cubic metres, irrigating some 200,000 hectares in an area which also enjoyed considerable rainfall. Thus there remained a balance of some 10 million cubic metres the division of which should be negotiated. (Iraq Times, Aug 17)

Also in Aug an Iraqi ministerial committee was established to draft an agreement with the UAR for joint use of the Euphrates waters. The UAR would be asked to open negotiations. (Bayan, Aug 29; see also Iraq Times, Sept 12, 22)

On Sept 23 Qassim, answering a question at a press conference, said that the Euphrates belonged to Iraq, Syria and Turkey, and that no country could utilize more water than the average quantity it was using at present. "Those who want to build a dam, have to come to an understanding with us." (Zaman, Sept 25)

After the break-up of the UAR and the establishment of the Syrian Republic, the issue was repeatedly discussed between the two countries (see e.g. Zaman, Nov 4). On Dec 16 the Syrian Ambassador to Baghdad stated that he had discussed the issue with Gen. Qassim who had said that the problem was simple as long as good intentions prevailed on both sides. The Ambassador added that further talks would be held in the near future. (R. Baghdad, Dec 16 [19])

SYRIA-JORDAN

Jordanian Support. Jordan was the first country to recognize the new regime in Syria, on Sept 29, the morning of the coup. King Husain extolled the "blessed upsurge" in Syria and expressed his "boundless support" for "the sons of valiant Syria." (For details, see: Relations Between the UAR and Jordan.)

Various Contacts. At the beginning of Oct Jordan permitted the import of Syrian newspapers. (Bilad, Jordan, Oct 8)

On Oct 11 the border between the two countries was opened and on the following day the railway service between Damascus and Amman was resumed. (R. Amman, Oct 11 [13]; R. Damascus, Oct 13 [14])

Diplomatic Relations. In mid-Oct the two countries decided to establish diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level (Jihad, Oct 16). The ambassadors took up their posts during Nov. (Jihad, Nov 1, 9; R. Amman, Nov 11, 15-16; Nov 12, 16)

Various Contacts. At the end of Oct and in Nov Syria and Jordan exchanged sport teams. (R. Amman, Oct 28 [31], Nov 9 [11]; R. Amman, Nov 10-16; Nov 12)

On Nov 9 150 members of the "Damascus trading club" arrived in Jordan for a two-day visit. (R. Amman, Nov 9 [11])

The Syrian Arab Airways opened on Dec 13 a service between Damascus and Amman (Falastin, Dec 14), and between Damascus and the Old City of Jerusalem on Dec 23. (R. Damascus, Dec 3 [W 7], Dec 10 [W 14]; Falastin, Dec 24)

SYRIA-LEBANON

Synopsis. Torn as Lebanon was by an internal struggle between pro-UAR and anti-UAR factions, the Sûlîm government withheld recognition from Syria long after the majority of other Arab countries had accorded it; only when a new government was formed by Rashid Karâmi did recognition finally come, on November 8. The uncertainty as to what the future held for Syria made even usually anti-UAR circles hesitant at first to commit themselves or the country. Meanwhile Syrian charges had appeared that the UAR was utilizing Lebanon as a base for the subversion of Syria and that Lebanon was not preventing these activities. The Syrians said they had blown up a clandestine UAR radio transmitter on Lebanese territory as the Lebanese government had taken no action. Lebanon denied all the charges. The Syrians showed their coolness towards Lebanon even after PM Karâmi had singled out Syria for a profession of friendship in his government's statement of policy; before any act which was in Lebanon's interest, as in the economic field or the facilitating of travel, "positive" steps on the part of Lebanon were expected. Later the two countries exchanged goodwill missions. (See also: Lebanon, Internal Affairs; Relations Between Syria and the UAR; Relations Between the UAR and Lebanon.)

Lebanese Attitudes Towards the Syrian Coup. On the morning of Sept 28, Beirut Radio broadcast a statement by the Ministry of Information that "Lebanon is following with a fraternal interest the developments in the UAR and prays that bloodshed may be averted." (R. Beirut, Sept 28 [29])

The following day, demonstrations against the Syrian coup occurred in various places, but no anti-UAR demonstrations were reported. The Progressive Socialist Party, the Najjâdah, the Popular Resistance and others supported the UAR while the Nationalist Social Party supported the Syrian revolution. The Ba'ath Party and the Phalanges refrained from openly adopting a definite attitude. (For details see pp 393 b-394.)

The government tried to calm the country. The Lebanese Press Association instituted on Sept 29 censorship of press material on the Syrian crisis (R. Beirut, Sept 29 [Oct 2]). Damascus Radio repeatedly complained of the "unfriendly" attitude of "certain circles in Lebanon." (BBCM, IMB, Oct 3-12)

Recognition of Syrian Republic Delayed. On Oct 2 the Lebanese cabinet agreed to delay recognition of Syria and reaffirmed this on Oct 5. The cabinet also decided to ban demonstrations of solidarity with any other state (Jaridah, Oct 3-6). (Although President Abdel Nasser called off the diplomatic boycott of Syria on Oct 5 and thereafter the majority of other Arab countries recognized Syria, Lebanon's formal recognition was delayed until Nov 8.)

A guarded attitude towards Syria was, at least at the beginning, also taken by such a usually anti-UAR paper as Al-Nahâr. "Though Lebanon is Syria's nearest neighbour, yet it finds itself in a very delicate position which obliges it to behave during the few coming days or weeks as if it was the most remote country... we hope the new leaders in Damascus will appreciate our position and extend us some credit." The paper concluded: "Damascus might complain of a possible hesitation on our part. But we must say frankly that Damascus was always in such a hurry to adopt pro-Egyptian attitudes or to cancel them, that we were always obliged to linger behind." (Nahar, Sept 30)

Lebanese PM Sends Message to Ma'mûn al-Kuzbari; Various Contacts Established. A message from PM Sa'ib Slâm to Dr Kuzbari, the Syrian PM, delivered on Oct 13, reportedly stated that the Lebanese government shared the Syrian government's desire to uphold the League

Charter, and to establish brotherly relations between the two countries. (Jaridah, Mid. Mir., Oct 14)

On Oct 16 Syria announced that exit visas to Lebanon were again being granted. (R. Damascus, Oct 16 [18])

Starting from the second half of Oct some Lebanese delegations and public personalities visited Damascus to express their congratulations to leaders of the new regime. They included a representative of the Maronite Patriarch, Bulus Ma'ashi, and a youth delegation from Zahle. (See e.g. R. Damascus, Oct 16 [18], Nov 6 [8])

Syria Charges Lebanon Services as UAR Base. From the end of Oct to mid-Nov Damascus repeatedly alleged that Lebanon served as a base for subversive activities directed by the UAR against Syria. According to Damascus, a Syrian raiding party blew up a secret UAR radio transmitter inside Lebanese territory on Oct 27. The Lebanese denied all the charges. (See: Relations Between Syria and the UAR, also next item below.)

Lebanese Recognition. The first major act of the new Lebanese cabinet, headed by Rashid Karāmi, was the recognition of Syria on Nov 8. In regard to the charges that Lebanon was being utilized as a base for the subversion of Syria, Kamāl Junblāt, Minister of State, stated on cabinet instructions that Lebanon would not be a centre for inter-Arab strife; he also said that a government delegation would go to Syria to tender congratulations. (Jaridah, Nov 9, 10)

On Nov 16 Rashid Karāmi, in his government's statement of policy in the Chamber of Deputies, singled out Syria for special mention while speaking of Lebanon's Arab relations. He declared Lebanon would "remain the faithful neighbour of her sister, the Syrian Arab Republic, and her other Arab sisters..."; Lebanon would avoid any sort of interference in their internal affairs. (R. Beirut, Nov 16 [18]; Hayat, Nov 17)

The same day, at a press conference in Damascus, the Syrian Premier expressed his desire that the above-mentioned declaration would herald the "re-establishment of relations as they should have been for a long time"; every good or evil affecting Syria would perforce also affect Lebanon and this was a truth "our brothers in Lebanon should learn." Kuzbari warned that if conditions did not return to their "natural course," Syria might take steps to safeguard her security which she "considered above any brotherhood." In reply to a question on the abolition of travel permits to Lebanon and as to whether an economic delegation would go to Lebanon, Kuzbari said that Syria was still awaiting positive steps on the part of Lebanon. (Hayat, Nov 17)

Exchange of Goodwill Missions. On Nov 26 a Lebanese government delegation led by Rafiq Naja, the Minister of Economy, arrived in Damascus on a one-day visit "to congratulate Syria on the new regime." The delegation also discussed "in general terms questions outstanding from the disruption of the customs union between Lebanon and Syria in 1950." (Jaridah, Nov 26, 28; R. Damascus, Nov 26 [28]; ANA, Nov 27 [29])

The Damascus As-Nasr, welcoming the delegation, said that Syria wanted Lebanon to preserve its national integrity and not to allow its territory to become a base for aggression against its neighbour. This was the most important foundation for good relations between the two countries (Nasr, Nov 27). On his return to Beirut, Naja announced that Syria welcomed an offer of mediation by President Sbehab between Syria and the UAR, to end the propaganda warfare between them. On the day of the visit, an explosion occurred in the garden of Rafiq Naja's house. (Jaridah, Nov 28)

On Dec 7, a Syrian goodwill mission headed by Abd as-Salām al-Tarmanini, the Minister of the Interior, arrived in Beirut on a one-day visit to return the Lebanese goodwill visit. The Lebanese PM declared afterwards that he had "exchanged views with the delegation on relations between the two countries, and discussed solutions of outstanding economic problems." (ANA, Dec 6 [8]; Jaridah, Dec 8)

SYRIA-SAUDI ARABIA

Saudi Arabia recognized Syria on Oct 10. King Saud was later charged by Cairo with having financed the conspirators in Syria. (See: The UAR-Saudi Arabia.)

On Nov 10 a Syrian economic mission, headed by the Minister of Economy, arrived in Riyadh. Damascus Radio described the mission as a "further move to strengthen the Arab economy and achieve eventual unity." (R. Damascus, Nov 11 [14]; Hayat, Nov 11)

The signing of an economic agreement was announced on Nov 16. It was to replace the 1955 trade agreement due to expire at the end of the year. The agreement provided for the promotion of capital investment and trade exchange. Capital would be allowed to move freely from one territory to the other, joint enterprises would be encouraged and the movement of persons between the two countries would be facilitated. Syrian goods would enjoy preferential treatment on the Saudi Arabian market over and above facilities provided under the multilateral convention between Arab League countries. Industrial products manufactured from local raw materials, as well as vegetables and animal products, were exempted from customs duties and import permits; customs duties on a number of other products would be equivalent to one-third of the usual tariff. Payments would be made in convertible currencies. A joint experts' committee was set up to deal with the implementation of the agreement.

The Syrian negotiators also obtained a two-year postponement of an instalment of the Saudi Arabian loan of 1955, falling due in Dec 1961.

Assurances were also given during the negotiations for the safeguarding of the rights of the Damascus branch of the Saudi Arabian National Commercial Bank, which had been nationalized by a UAR decree on July 20. (Hayat, Nov 17, 18; R. Damascus, Nov 16 [18])

MOROCCO AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES OF THE ME

SYNOPSIS

In 1960 Morocco had pursued a policy in favour of Arab solidarity on the basis of equality, which had brought her closer to such countries as Iraq and Jordan than to the UAR. From the beginning of 1961, however, while she kept on friendly terms with the other Arab countries, closer cooperation developed with the UAR. This turn of events had been brought about by a meeting of interests—the UAR's general international interests and Morocco's claim over Mauritania—which brought the two countries together in the Casablanca bloc (on which, see pp 48 ff). Morocco supported Cairo over the break-up of the UAR and was the last Arab country, besides Sudan, to accord recognition to the Syrian Republic.

General. [The death of the 51-year-old King Muhammad of Morocco on Feb 26 was widely mourned in all the Arab countries. Radio stations and the press praised the late King's struggle against imperialism, his work for the glory of Arabism and Islam, and support for Arab unity, nationalism and solidarity.]

In Jordan, a battalion of the regular army was named after the late King. (Bilad, March 5)

In Dec a Moroccan commercial mission visited Beirut, Damascus, Aleppo, Cairo, Jeddah and Amman. (Hayat, Dec 21-29)

RELATIONS BY COUNTRIES

Iraq. In March Isma'il al-Arif, Iraqi Minister of Education, declared on his return from a visit to Morocco that an Iraqi-Moroccan Cultural Agreement would be signed "shortly." Iraq would probably open a training institute for secondary school teachers in Morocco; she would also improve the standard of the training institute for elementary school teachers in Fes, founded by the Iraqi government and administered by Iraqis. This institute was helping to solve Morocco's main problem, the replacement of French-educated instructors by those with an Arabic education. (R. Baghdad, March 12 [W 16])

In April, in a letter to the Iraqi cultural attaché in Rabat, the Minister noted that the staff of the college in Fes was not carrying out the college's basic aims of helping to eliminate illiteracy and to publicize Iraq in Morocco. He described the college as "a cultural embassy void of national feelings": no Iraqi flag was visible, no Iraqi emblem was displayed and there were no maps or pictures symbolizing the Iraqi revolution. (R. Baghdad, March 29 [W April 6])

On June 17 Iraq banned the entry of the Moroccan paper Al-Mukāfih because of "its continued attacks on the policy of the Iraqi Republic." (ANA, June 17 [20])

In Aug PM Qasim invited King Hasan II to visit Iraq. (Zaman, Aug 15)

In Nov an Iraqi military mission attended the annual Moroccan military manoeuvres. (Zaman, Nov 14-17)

Jordan. In Feb Jordan transferred JD60,000, donated by King Muhammad V and the Ruler of Kuwait, to UNRWA for the expansion of its vocational training centre at Wadi as-Sir. (Jer. Times, Feb 13)

In March it was reported that King Hussein had accepted an invitation by King Hasan II to visit Morocco; no date was fixed. (R. Amman, March 2-IMB, March 2)

On April 29 a Jordanian royal mission left Amman for Rabat aboard a royal aircraft which King Hussein was presenting to King Hasan II. The mission carried congratulations to King Hasan on his accession to the throne and an invitation to visit Jordan. (ANA, April 30 [May 2])

On June 1 the Moroccan Minister of Public Works arrived in Amman, on his way from the pilgrimage to Mecca. (Jihad, June 2)

Lebanon. In Feb it was announced that Morocco had asked Lebanon to strengthen cultural ties between them. (Hayat, Feb 12)

On March 6 it was announced that King Hasan II had invited President Sbeih to visit Morocco; the latter accepted, but no date was fixed. (Hayat, March 7, 16)

In May a Moroccan mission arrived in Beirut to study questions connected with the free port of Beirut and transit trade in preparation for the establishment of a free-customs zone in Tangier. (Hayat, April 30)

On May 6 Driss M'Hammedi, Moroccan FM, arrived in Lebanon on a two-day private visit, on his way from Cairo to Rabat. (Hayat, May 6-7)

On May 16 an air agreement was initiated in Beirut, approving the existing arrangement under which "Air Liban" operated a weekly service to Morocco on its West Africa flight, and Morocco had the right to operate a weekly service to Beirut. (ANA, May 16 [W 25])

Saudi Arabia. In March King Hasan II invited King Saud to visit Morocco (Hayat, March 11). [The visit took place in 1962.]

Sudan. In April a message from King Hasan II was delivered to General Abbud. (R. Rabat, April 28 [30])

On May 2 a Sudanese economic mission headed by the Minister of Commerce arrived in Rabat on a 10-day visit. (BBC in Arabic, May 2-IMB, May 3)

Syria. [Morocco was the last Arab country—save Sudan—to accord recognition to the Syrian Republic. See also below: The UAR]

On Dec 16 King Hasan II cabled Nāzīm al-Qudsi congratulating him on his election to the presidency of Syria. Official recognition came the same day. (Jaridah, Dec 17)

The UAR; The Casablanca Conference. [Relations between Morocco and the UAR which, though correct, had been none too cordial (see MER 1960, pp 115, 161- Synopsis), became noticeably closer following the establishment of the Casablanca bloc to which both countries adhered. See pp 48 ff]

In Jan it was reported that Morocco had established a permanent educational mission in Cairo, to supervise Morocco's educational ties with the Arab countries. (Ahram, Jan 16)

It was reported in Feb that the UAR Economic Organization intended to buy out French owners of super markets in Morocco in order to convert the markets into permanent exhibition centres for UAR products. (R. Cairo, Feb 8-IMB, Feb 9)

On his way home from the Baghdad Conference, Abd al-Khāliq Torrès, Moroccan Deputy PM and Minister of Justice, stayed in Cairo for a week for discussions and was received by President Abdel Nasser. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 15, 16)

In Feb it was reported that Morocco had asked for Egyptian judges to replace French judges whose contracts were due to expire. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Feb 18)

On Feb 28 President Abdel Nasser called his congratulations to King Hasan II on his accession to the throne of Morocco, expressing confidence that he would "continue his father's struggle... to strengthen Arab solidarity and champion right and justice everywhere" (Eg. Gaz., March 1). UAR papers expressed some apprehension lest the young King deviate from the policy of positive neutralism followed by his late father. (Gumhuriyah, March 13, 27; Akhbar, March 14; Ahram, March 24)

Abd al-Khāliq Torrès, Moroccan Deputy PM, visited Cairo from April 5-17 to continue contacts within the framework of the Casablanca bloc. He carried a verbal message from King Hasan II to President Abdel Nasser. (R. Rabat, April 5 [7]). The convening of an African summit conference to establish an African League similar to the Arab League was reportedly also discussed (Hayat, April 9). Torrès carried home with him a personal message from Abdel Nasser to King Hasan. He said that the President's official visit to Morocco was scheduled for Sept. (Eg. Gaz., April 18).

In April it was reported in Cairo that six UAR professors of law recruited by the Moroccan government had collectively resigned, as the dean of the faculty was "making their working conditions impossible." (Eg. Gaz., April 10).

On May 31 Ahmad Balafrej, of the Istiqlal Party, delivered to President Abdel Nasser a message from King Hasan II regarding the proposed African summit conference (Ahram, June 1). On June 4 he returned with the President's reply. (MENA, June 4 [6]).

In June the two countries signed an agreement mutually abolishing the need for entry visas. (R. Cairo, June 20 [22]).

On July 19 Abd al-Khalil Torrès submitted his credentials to President Abdel Nasser as Morocco's new Ambassador to the UAR. (Eg. Gaz., July 20).

On July 10, an amendment of the Morocco-UAR trade and payments agreement of 1959 was initiated in Cairo (details on R. Cairo, July 10 [W 20]). By the end of the year the volume of trade between the two countries was expected to reach $22,140,000. (Eg. Gaz., Dec 9).

In Aug a Moroccan youth delegation arrived in Damascus on a 15-day tour. (Ayyam, Aug 15).

On Aug 27 King Hasan II arrived in Cairo to participate in a meeting of the Casablanca bloc prior to the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (see p 56 b).

In Oct it was reported in Cairo that Morocco wished to conclude with the UAR an agreement for technical cooperation; the UAR Government was studying the request (Ahram, Oct 7; Eg. Gaz., Oct 8). [No further mention of this topic was encountered.]

Following the breaking-off of diplomatic relations between the UAR and Jordan in Oct, Morocco agreed to look after UAR interests in Jordan. (Ahram, Oct 10).

On Nov 20 King Hasan II received a UAR military mission which had come to Rabat to participate in Morocco's independence anniversary celebrations and delivered a gift of arms manufactured in the UAR. (R. Cairo, Nov 20-IMB, Nov 21).

Morocco's Attitude on the Break-up of the UAR. On Sept 28 Rabat Radio broadcast a cable from King Hasan to Abdel Nasser expressing his hope that the crisis would result in strengthening the unity (wahdah) of the UAR.

[Morocco followed the UAR stand for several weeks. Rabat Radio news on the Syrian situation reflected support for the UAR. It was not heard to report Damascus announcements or to pass comment of its own on the new Syrian regime.] The Istiqlal Party organ Al-Alam, however, called for speedy recognition. (R. Tunis, Oct 15 [17]).

[Morocco was the last Arab country (save Sudan), to accord recognition to the Syrian Republic, on Dec 16, after the Syrian general elections and the election of Nazim al-Qudsi to the presidency.]

THE MAURITANIA PROBLEM

(The Islamic Republic of Mauritania)

Synopsis. Morocco continued to claim sovereignty over Mauritania. All Arab countries, save Tunisia, continued to support her claim. Morocco sought support in Africa also and her co-sponsoring of the Casablanca conference was in part motivated by this aim. However, she gained the support only of Guinea and Mali. Mauritania, when addressing herself to Arab states, identified herself as Arab. Mauritania was admitted to the UN on Oct 27, with Tunisia voting in favour and the other Arab countries against. (See also MER 1960, pp 163-4.)

Issue At Baghdad Conference. At the Baghdad Conference of Arab League Foreign Ministers, Morocco renewed the Mauritania question (Zaman, Jan 31) (This body—in Tunisia's absence—had supported Morocco's claim over Mauritania already at its Shtura meeting in Aug 1960; see MER 1960, p 163.)

Mokhtar Ould Daddah, the Mauritanian PM, cabled the conference expressing surprise at Morocco's request to put the question on the agenda. He reminded the conference that his country had been recognized by 39 states, and invoked "the solidarity of the governments and brother Arab peoples," saying that he was convinced they would recognize the established fact of Mauritania's independence. (Monde, Feb 9).

In its resolutions the Baghdad conference approved, over Tunisia's objections, a Moroccan proposal that League member states should continue to oppose Mauritania's admission to the UN (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6]). Later the League requested its members to oppose Mauritania's admission to membership of the WHO. (Ahram, Feb 13).

No United Arab Front Against Mauritania. [The Arab states did not follow Morocco's lead in international conferences, not withdrawing when Mauritania was accepted. In the voting on the question at such conferences, the Arab vote was not unanimous.]

In Feb it was reported that two Arab states had abstained from voting in Morocco's favour on the Mauritania question at the Economic Commission for Africa Conference in Addis Ababa, when Mauritania was admitted as an associate member. (Monde, Feb 9; Ruz al-Yusuf, Feb 27).

Al-Ahram expressed surprise at Libya's agreeing to take part in the Monrovia Conference (see pp 54-5) and to sit at the same table with Mauritania. (Ahram, May 15) [In the end, Libya did not attend the conference.]

On June 20 Mauritania was admitted as a full member of the International Labour Organization by 236 votes to 25, with 72 abstentions. Tunisia and all African states south of the Sahara voted in favour, while the majority of Arab states voted against. (Hayat, NYT, June 21).

Morocco Attacks Mauritania on Relations with Israel. In May the Moroccan embassy in Amman published a "clarification" on Mauritania's relations with Israel. Its main points were: (1) Since by agreement France represented Mauritania in her foreign relations, France's ambassador in Israel was also a representative of Mauritania. (2) Part of the shares of Mifera Co., an iron-ore company operating in Mauritania, were owned by the Jewish Rothschild Bank which had financed the Zionist government. (3) Israeli fishing vessels called at Mauritania ports. (4) The Israeli ambassador in Senegal took part in the Mauritanian independence celebrations. (Manar, May 1).

The PM of Mauritania, Mokhtar Ould Daddah, was reported to have stated later that Mauritania's stand on Israel was "the stand of the Arab who believes in his rights in Arab Palestine, which means that we stand together with the Arab camp, not against Israel; only, but against all the enemies of the Arab nation and Islam." (Hayat, July 16; on Mauritania-Israel relations see also MER 1960, p 313.)

Withdrawal of Mauritania Envoy to Arab East. Muhammad al-Banani, "Envoy of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania to the Arab East," was due to leave Beirut on Aug. 16 after being recalled by his government. Banani had made several trips to the Arab states in the east in order to acquaint them with his government's views on the Mauritanian problem. (Hayat, Aug 13)

Mauritania Admitted to UN. On Oct 26 the Security

Council recommended the admission of Mauritania to the UN by nine votes to one (UAR), with one abstention (USSR). Morocco opposed the recommendation on the grounds that Mauritania was an integral part of her territory which had been cut off by French colonialist machinations. The UAR supported the Moroccan arguments. On the following day, Oct 27, the Assembly admitted Mauritania by 68 votes to 13 with 20 abstentions. The resolution was sponsored by African states and France. All Arab countries, save Tunisia, voted against, as did Cuba, Guinea and Mali. The Communist countries abstained. (UN Yearbook 1961, pp 166-8, 170-1)

TUNISIA AND THE ARAB COUNTRIES OF THE ME

SYNOPSIS

In January, at the Baghdad Conference of Arab foreign ministers, Tunisia rejoined the Arab League Council which she had boycotted since she joined the League in 1958, because of her strained relations with the UAR. Iraq and Jordan, desirous of strengthening the anti-UAR forces in the League, were instrumental in persuading Tunisia to take this step.

An effort was made at the Conference to conciliate the UAR and Tunisia, but their relations remained strained and occasional mutual denunciations continued. While in the US, President Bourguiba said Abdel Nasser was trying to achieve Arab unity by war; Bourguiba in turn was accused by Cairo of cooperating with imperialism, with the French against Algeria, and with Zionism.

The Bizerta crisis, and especially the battle of Bizerta between French forces and Tunisian troops and civilians in July, changed Tunisia's position in the Arab world for the time being. Bourguiba had become a "fighter against imperialism." The Arab countries expressed their support, offered assistance and registered volunteers. No volunteers reached Tunisia but some financial and medical assistance apparently did.

There followed a rapprochement with the UAR; diplomatic relations were re-established, and Tunisia attended the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, from which she had been previously excluded by Abdel Nasser on the ground that she was following the policies of the West. The two Presidents met in Belgrade. It appeared, however, that the underlying strain in the relations between the two countries had not been removed. Cairo spokesmen remained somewhat critical of Bourguiba's attitude on "the struggle for independence." Bourguiba expressed to Abdel Nasser his grief at "the events" in Syria, yet expressed no support for the continued existence of the Egyptian-Syrian union.

Tunisia supported Kuwait's independence in face of Iraq's claim to sovereignty over it, but tried to avoid giving any further offence to Iraq.

Tunisia's relations with the other Arab countries of the ME were friendly. Comparatively close cooperation developed with neighbouring Libya.

GENERAL

Tunisia Rejoins League Council. Following Iraqi mediation, Tunisia participated in the Baghdad Conference of the Arab League countries' foreign ministers (Jan 30-Feb 4). Thus she rejoined the Arab League which she had boycotted since 1958—immediately after her adherence—because of her dispute with the UAR. (For details, see below: Relations with the UAR.)

The Bizerta Crisis. [Background: On July 6 President Bourguiba requested the French Government to start negotiations on the evacuation of the French naval base at Bizerta (at the same time, he also claimed part of the Sahara, see p 176 b). On July 17 he threatened to blockade the base. Following the arrival in Bizerta of French reinforcements on July 19, French and Tunisian forces engaged in battle. On July 22 French troops occupied the greater part of Bizerta. Tunisian casualties were officially given as over 800 dead and 1,155 wounded, most of whom were civilians. France refused to comply with a Security Council resolution calling for the withdrawal of all armed forces to their original positions, and boycotted a special session of the General Assembly which met on Aug 21-26. On Sept 8 Bourguiba agreed to allow the French to retain the base while the Berlin crisis continued, subject to its subsequent evacuation. On Sept 29 the two parties signed an agreement providing for the progressive withdrawal of the French troops from the town of Bizerta and their concentration within the base areas, pending "the examination of the Bizerta problem."]

Arab Support; Tunisia-UAR Rapprochement. All Arab countries expressed their support for Tunisia and made offers of assistance. The affair was given pride of place in Arab broadcasts and the press denounced France, NATO and imperialism (IMB, BBCM, IMH and the Arab press, July-Aug.). [However, the more important development in inter-Arab relations which arose out of the Bizerta crisis was a rapprochement between Tunisia and the UAR (for which see below).]

Volunteers Registered. [On July 21 President Bourguiba announced that Tunisian embassies would register foreign volunteers prepared to fight at Bizerta.]

On July 20 Gen. Qasim cabled Bourguiba expressing Iraq's full support. On July 24, it was announced that 400 Iraqi volunteers had registered with the Tunisian Legation in Baghdad. (Zaman, July 21, 25)

On July 21, it was reported from Libya that "hundreds, even thousands," had volunteered (Hayat, July 22). In Baghdad, Hashim Jawad, the Iraqi FM, "added his own name to the list of volunteers." (Zaman, July 22)

On July 23, it was reported, King Hussein ordered an infantry company to be flown to Tunisia but its departure was postponed at Tunisian request, since all Tunisian airports had been rendered unusable by French bombings. (Jihad, July 24-26)

On July 24 the League Council decided on the despatch of volunteers. (See below.)

During Aug "hundreds of volunteers" for Tunisia, including "one hundred girls," registered with the UAR Students Federation in Cairo. (Ahram, Aug 3, 17) [There was no report that any volunteers reached Tunisia.]

Extraordinary Meeting of League Council. On July 24 an extraordinary session of the League Council in Cairo unanimously condemned "the barbarous French aggression" and resolved to offer immediate material and military assistance, to send volunteers and medical aid to Tunisia, to exert pressure at the UN to evacuate the French forces from Tunisia and to form a committee of the delegates of Tunisia, the UAR, Libya and Morocco to implement these decisions. (Hayat, July 25)

On July 28 League SG Hassinah arrived in Tunis to coordinate the implementation of these resolutions and "to place himself at the disposal of the President of Tunisia." (Ahram, July 29)

Financial and Other Aid. On July 31 the Lebanese Chamber of Deputies voted a £1500,000 grant to Tunisia. (Hayat, Aug 1)

On Aug 1 the UAR contributed £200,000 and the Iraqi Red Crescent Society 1,000 dinars to aid the relatives of the "Biserta martyrs." (Ahram; Zaman, Aug 2)

On Aug 2 King Saud "donated" 2,000,000 riyals ($444,000 appx) for the relief of Tunisian victims. (R. Mecca, Aug 2 [4])

On Aug 2 a UAR Red Crescent medical convoy, consisting of four heavy lorries, arrived in Tunis. (R. Tunis, Aug 3 [4])

On Aug 22 a Saudi Arabian medical mission—three doctors and four nurses—arrived in Tunis. (R. Tunis, Aug 23 [25])

The Ruler of Kuwait informed Bourguiba that his government had decided to contribute $1m. for the relief of Tunisian victims. (R. Kuwait, July 27 [29])

On Aug 5 a Kuwaiti medical mission left for Tunis. It consisted of five doctors, sixteen nurses, chemists and administrative staff, with tents, a surgical theatre and a mobile pharmacy. (R. Kuwait, Aug 5, 5 [5, 8])

Sudan also sent medical supplies. (Sudan, Oct)

Tunisia and the Kuwait Crisis: See: The Kuwait Crisis.

TUNISIA—THE UAR

Propaganda Warfare. During Jan Cairo radio stations continued the propaganda campaign against President Bourguiba (BBCM, IMB, Jan; see MER 1960, pp 164-5). He was accused of collaboration with the imperialists by preventing volunteers for the Algerian front from entering Tunisia (Voice of the Arabs, Jan 29 [31]). Tunis Radio claimed that Tunisia was not the first to suffer from "Nasserist plots"; many countries and leaders had suffered abuse. It accused Abdel Nasser of using the slogan of "Arab nationalism" to cover "sinister" activities such as the swallowing-up of Syria and plotting against the governments and leaders all over the Arab world. (R. Tunis, Jan 30, Feb 2 [Feb 1, 4])

The Baghdad Conference; Bourguiba Demands Radical Change in UAR Policy. Following Iraqi mediation, Tunisia participated in the Baghdad Conference of the Arab League countries' foreign ministers (Jan 30-Feb 4). The issue between the two countries was discussed at the conference and further mediation by the Iraqi FM brought about meetings between the UAR and Tunisian foreign ministers. They agreed, according to the Tunisian FM, on the basis for a settlement of the dispute, namely the Shura resolutions on Arab solidarity and non-interference in each other's internal affairs.

It was reportedly also agreed that Salah Ben Youssef (on whom see also below) would not return to Cairo.

When the Conference was still in session, President Bourguiba declared in a press interview that Tunisia's return to the League was conditional upon the cessation of "conspiracies, abuses and the protection of Salah Ben Youssef" on the part of Egypt; Cairo must also cease considering itself the "government of all Arab countries." Bourguiba concluded on a note of optimism that the efforts of PM Qasim and others at Baghdad had yielded positive results. "Today we obtained assurances, tomorrow we shall resume our diplomatic relations with Cairo." (R. Tunis, Feb 5 [7])

In Feb a Cairo paper, quoting UAR official circles, denied that the resumption of diplomatic relations with Tunisia was imminent. (Akhbar, Feb 5)

Cairo Reports Bourguiba Tribute to UAR. On Feb 20 Cairo papers reported a statement by President Bourguiba saying that he would never forget that President Abdel Nasser had given substantial aid to Tunisia at the time of the French attack on the village of Sakhiyet Sidi Youssef [on the Tunisian-Algerian frontier, in 1959] and that the UAR had been the first country to recognize Tunisia and Tunisia the first to recognize the UAR. Bourguiba also said that the UAR and Tunisia, more than any other Arab states, were "philosophically and sociologically identical." (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Feb 20)

Tension Continues. During March-April the atmosphere between the two countries again became clouded, when the UAR press and radio cast doubt on President Bourguiba's intentions in intervening in the Algerian question. (For details, see pp 175-6.)

In May Cairo reported a diplomatic incident in Ottawa during Bourguiba's visit. The Tunisian FM and Ambassador to Canada had asked the Canadian authorities not to invite the UAR Ambassador to a reception in Bourguiba's honour. Later they apologized to the UAR Chargé d'Affaires who then accepted the Tunisian Ambassador's invitation to a reception. (Ahram, May 5)

On May 5 President Bourguiba, in reply to questions at the National Press Club in Washington, said that Abdel Nasser's policies were dangerous and harmful to Tunisia. Abdel Nasser, he alleged, considered Cairo the capital of the Arabs and everybody who resisted this kind of Arab unity was called a "stogee of colonialism." Abdel Nasser's "acquiescence of Syria" was nothing new; he was following in the footsteps of Muhammad Ali who considered that Arab unity should be achieved by war and who also subjugated Syria. Abdel Nasser had tried to demolish Bourguiba by propaganda and when this miscarried had tried to "get rid of him" with the help of Bourguiba's political foes and even the Algerian nationalist forces. (NYHT, May 6-7)

Abd al-Qadir Hatim, UAR Minister of State, said that such a statement might be expected from Bourguiba, for he had always conducted a pro-colonialist policy against Arab nationalism and against the UAR. (Ahram, May 7). Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrām, wrote that Bourguiba represented reactionary and backward trends in the Arab world and this was the reason why the UAR's policy was dangerous for him. He described Bourguiba as an imperialist stooge and a dictator who was trying to strip the Tunisian people of their Arab character, but would not be able to evade the hour of reckoning. (Ahrām, May 7; see also BBCM, IMB, May 7-16; Cairo press for the period.)

One Cairo paper attributed "Bourguiba's abuses of Arab nationalism" to "his strong ties and cooperation with World Zionism." (Akhir Sa'ah, May 17)

In July, on the eve of the Bizerta crisis, Bourguiba demanded part of the Sahara for Tunisia and was consequently accused by Cairo of aiding France against the APG. (See below: The Arab Countries of the ME and the Algerian Question.)

Bizerta Crisis Brings Tunisia-UAR Rapprochement; Diplomatic Relations Resumed. When the fighting in Bizerta broke out (July 19), Mahmūd Riyād, political adviser to President Abdel Nasser, met with the head of the Tunisian delegation to the Arab League. Following the meeting, a UAR official communiqué expressed the unlimited support of the UAR for "the gallant Tunisian people in their heroic struggle." (Ahrām, July 22)

On July 22 President Abdel Nasser, in his speech on the anniversary of the Egyptian revolution, stated: "We are ready to give Tunisia everything it needs in the political and military fields... because the Arab battle is one and the same in every Arab country... I declare that we support Habib Bourguiba in his battle... There are many people who will wonder and say: How did this come about? They were quarrelling yesterday; is it different today? 'My brother and I against the foreigner'—this is a famous old Arab saying... We may differ, but we can never allow imperialism or a foreigner to shed the blood of any Arab..." (R. Cairo, July 22 [25])

The next day, Muhammad al-Masmoudi, Tunisian Secretary of State for Information and Tourism, arrived in Cairo to inform Abdel Nasser about the Bizerta crisis. He stated that the "resumption of diplomatic relations would be announced within the next few hours." (Gumhuriyah, July 24)

On July 28, Sadok al-Mokaddem, Tunisian FM, arrived in Cairo and was received by President Abdel Nasser, to whom he conveyed a verbal message from President Bourguiba. An official UAR statement promised support for Tunisia and announced the immediate despatch of military supplies. (Ahrām, July 31)

Finally, on Aug 3, a joint communiqué announced the resumption of diplomatic relations between the two countries "as a result of the recent brotherly contacts" between the two governments and "with a view to strengthening the solidarity between the two fraternal countries, particularly in the current delicate circumstances..." (Ahrām, Aug 4). The ambassadors took up their posts during Oct. (Ahrām, Oct 12, 14, 15, 29)

During the second half of Aug a mission of UAR journalists visited Tunisia. They were received by President Bourguiba, who used the opportunity to reaffirm Tunisia's determination to stand by the other Arab countries on a basis of "common aims, high principles and freedom of choice for their peoples in accordance with its geographical position and aims." (R. Tunis, Aug 15 [17])

In a special interview with Al-Gumhuriyah's correspondent, Bourguiba said he intended to visit Abdel Nasser and expressed his willingness to maintain sincere and close cooperation with "my brother President Abdel Nasser within the framework of ensuring the integrity and security of the Arab homeland." He added that President Abdel Nasser's good intentions had become clear to him and he was convinced that he was striving for the welfare of the Arab people. (Gumhuriyah, Aug 20)

Assassination of Salah Ben Yūsuf. [On Aug 12, Salah Ben Yūsuf, Bourguiba's chief political opponent, who had been living in exile in Cairo, was assassinated in Frankfurt-am-Main, West Germany. Ben Yūsuf, a former secretary-general of the Neo-Destour Party, had been sentenced to death in absentia by a Tunisian court in Dec 1958 for plotting against President Bourguiba and his government.]

The Cairo Al-Gumhuriyah claimed that the assassins carried Tunisian passports (Gumhuriyah, Aug 4). [However, there was no comment either in the UAR press or on the radio.] A Beirut [pro-UAR] paper said that no Arab could have committed such an act, and placed the blame on imperialism. (Beirut al-Masa, Aug 15)

The body of Ben Yūsuf was flown to Cairo for burial. (Ahrām, Aug 19, 25)

Bourguiba-Abdel Nasser Meeting. On Sept 1 Presidents Bourguiba and Abdel Nasser met in Belgrade, where they attended the Conference of Non-Aligned Countries. [Originally, Tunisia had been excluded from this conference by Abdel Nasser on the grounds that she was following the policies of the West. Following the Bizerta crisis, Tunisia accepted an invitation to attend. (See also p 60 a, 62 a.)] The two Presidents breakfasted at the residence of President Abdel Nasser, and "had a very cordial discussion." (R. Tunis, R. Cairo, Sept 1 [6]; Ahrām, Sept 2)

Muhammad Hassanein Haykal on Bourguiba. Following a three-hour interview with Bourguiba at Belgrade, Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrām, concluded that Tunisia was at the stage in the struggle for independence which Egypt had reached in 1922. Bourguiba was following "the traditional way we followed in Cairo," of "taking what you can get now and asking for more after that," and was hoping for US help to achieve French evacuation. The "Arab East," on the other hand, had gone beyond these stages to a "comprehensive war." Haykal considered that Bourguiba was suffering from a "Cairo complex" induced by his having entered Egypt unclaimed when he first came there as a refugee. (Ahrām, Sept 15; R. Cairo, Sept 15 [18])

Bourguiba on Break-up of UAR: Arab Unity Must be Founded on Consent of Peoples. On Sept 29 President Bourguiba sent a telegram to Abdel Nasser expressing his grief at the events in the UAR's Northern R. "which were leading brothers to confront each other," and deepest regret that the Arabs "are forced to settle their differences through the use of force while tied by kinship..." He expressed his hope that "hearts will return to serenity" and "the Lord protect us all from all that may harm our unity." (R. Tunis, Sept 29 [30])

The following day, in a second message, Bourguiba praised Abdel Nasser for his orders to avoid bloodshed. He added: "We greatly admire [your] wise attitude... since Arab unity should be founded on the consent of peoples and their conviction that this unity complies with their interests and well-being. This attitude shows great courage and deep wisdom... it leaves the door open to reconciliation... It places no importance on transitory human feelings, and leaves room for the true permanent interests of the Arab motherland." (R. Tunis, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

Tunisia Radio repeated both Damascus and Cairo reports on the Syrian situation. (BBCM, Oct 6)

On Oct 2 Tunisia requested the Arab League SG to call an urgent meeting of the political committee, lest the events in Syria "become a source of weakness and a cause of differences within the Arab entity." The SG replied on Oct 4 that the UAR regarded the request as "an unacceptable interference in the UAR's internal affairs." (R. Tunis, Oct 2, 5 [4, 6])

[Tunisia recognized Syria on Oct 9, after Abdel Nasser had called off the diplomatic boycott on the new republic.]

Various Contacts. In Sept Tunisia and the UAR concluded an agreement providing for a weekly flight on the Damascus-Cairo-Tripoli-Tunis route by the UAR National Airlines. (Ahram, Sept 6)

In Nov a UAR television team touring Tunisia to prepare programmes for Cairo Television was received by President Bourguiba. (Gumhuriyah, Nov 10; R. Tunis, Nov 8 [10])

In Dec a Tunisian agricultural mission came to Egypt on a 10-day study tour. (Ahram, Dec 7)

RELATIONS WITH OTHER ARAB COUNTRIES

Iraq. In Jan it was reported in Tunis that the Tunisian Government was working for the conclusion of a cultural agreement with Iraq. (Dép. Tun., Jan 5)

During Jan Iraq made efforts, which were crowned with success, to bring Tunisia back into the Arab League. Consequently Tunisia participated in the Baghdad Conference (Jan 30-Feb 4) where Iraq continued efforts to bring the UAR and Tunisia together (see p 104). Bourguiba, in a press interview, welcomed in this connection PM Qasim's "efforts and clear and sensible attitude." (R. Tunis, Feb 5 [7])

On Feb 4 the Tunisian FM announced that PM Qasim had accepted an invitation by President Bourguiba to visit Tunisia. (R. Beirut Feb 5, R. Baghdad, Feb 6-IMB, Feb 6, 7)

Iraq commemorated the fifth anniversary of the Tunisian Republic, March 20, with special radio programmes and newspaper editions, in which President Bourguiba was much praised. (R. Baghdad, March 20-IMB, March 21; Zaman, March 20; Dép. Tun., March 21)

On April 17 it was announced that President Bourguiba had accepted PM Qasim's invitation to visit Iraq; no date was officially fixed but Sept was mentioned (Dép. Tun., April 18). (Both Qasim's and Bourguiba's visits failed to materialize.)

In the Kuwait crisis, which started in June, Tunisia supported Kuwait's right to self-determination (against Iraq's claim to sovereignty over the Shaykhdom) and participated with a token force in the Arab Force which was dispatched there. (See: The Kuwait Crisis.)

On Dec 28 PM Qasim received a delegation from the ruling Neo-Destour Party. (Zaman, Dec 29)

Jordan. (For Jordanian efforts to induce Tunisia to participate in the Arab League Foreign Ministers' Conference in Baghdad, see p 104 a.)

In Feb Sadok al-Mokaddem, Tunisian FM, on his way from Baghdad, discussed in Amman the strengthening of relations between Jordan and Tunisia. It was reported that he had delivered to King Hussein a message from President Bourguiba which included an invitation to visit Tunisia. This was in a reply to a message sent by Hussein to Bourguiba about the Baghdad Conference, the strengthening of Tunisian-Jordanian relations and the normalization of inter-Arab relations. (R. Amman, Feb 8-11-IMB, Feb 9-12; R. Beirut, Feb 10-IMB, Feb 10; Hayat, Feb 10)

The Jordanian radio and press hailed President Bourguiba for his "activities on behalf of a just solution to the Algerian question" (compare p 175 a), which were a great service to world peace and would block Communist inroads into North Africa. (R. Amman, March 14-IMB, March 15; see also Palestina, March 14; Manar, March 6, 15.)

Kuwait. Tunisia supported Kuwait's right to self-determination in the Shaykhdom's dispute with Iraq and participated with a token force in the Arab force which was stationed there. (See: The Kuwait Crisis.)

In Oct a Kuwaiti economic delegation visited Tunisia amongst other Arab countries. (For the background of this visit, see p 136 a.) The head of the delegation said he would recommend to his government ways in which Kuwaiti capital could be employed to help carry out Tunisian projects to raise the standard of living. (R. Tunis, Oct 22 [24])

Lebanon. In March ten Lebanese journalists toured Tunisia by official invitation. (Hayat, March 12)

Libya. Following discussions by a Libyan official in Tunis, in Jan (Dép. Tun., March 25), a Tunisian medical mission left for Libya on April 1. (R. Tunis, March 27, April 1 [W, March 30, April 6])

In March a Libyan official examined the prospects of recruiting technicians and telecommunications experts for work in Libya. (Dép. Tun., March 26)

On Feb 9 President Bourguiba met with the Libyan PM, Muhammad Uthman as-Sa'id, who was on a private visit to Tunisia. (Dép. Tun., Feb 10)

On March 25 eight agreements between Tunisia and Libya were initialled in Tunis. They concerned nationality and residence (both countries would facilitate the movement of their citizens across their borders; citizens of one country residing in the other would be entitled to obtain the nationality of the state of their residence); communications (both sides would facilitate operation and maintenance of the Post, Telephone and Telegraph services, including the training of personnel); an extradition agreement; coordinating and facilitating land, sea and air communication; exchange of information on agricultural pests; a health convention calling for cooperation and coordination for prevention of epidemics; and a commercial agreement. (Hayat, March 30)

On June 21 the Tunisian Foreign Minister visited Libya and signed the agreements. (R. Tunis, June 21 [23])

On June 7 the Libyan Minister of Agriculture arrived in Tunis, at the government's invitation, to study agricultural development. (Sabah, Tunis, June 8)

Saudi Arabia. In April a delegation of Saudi Arabian journalists toured Tunisia. They were received by President Bourguiba who discussed with them, inter alia, the question of the Ramadan fast. (R. Tunis, April 10, 14 [12, 17].)

On Oct 18 a Saudi Arabian economic delegation visited Tunis. (R. Tunis, Oct 18, 24 [20, 26].)

Sudan. In Sept a Tunisian goodwill mission to Sudan was received by Gen. Abbud. (Dép. Tun., Sept 28)

Syria. On Oct 5 it was reported that President Bourguiba had received a cable from the Syrian PM requesting the establishment of diplomatic relations. However, Tunisia would not take any decision "unless the situation becomes clear and unless it can have talks with the brother Arabs within a meeting of the Arab League" (R. Tunis, Oct 5 [6]). [A Tunisian request to call a League meeting had been rejected by the UAR. (See also above: Relations with the UAR.)] Following Abdel Nasser's decision to call off the diplomatic boycott of Syria, Tunisia recognized the Syrian Republic. In a message sent by Bourguiba to PM Kuzbary on Oct 9, he stressed Tunisia's determination "to establish close and fraternal relations between the two sister republics." (R. Tunis, Oct 9 [11].)

On Dec 19 a Tunisian delegation arrived in Damascus to congratulate Nāzim al-Qudsi on his election as the President of the Republic. (R. Damascus, Dec 19-IMB, Dec 20)

The appointment of the Tunisian Ambassador in Damascus was announced on Dec 31. (R. Amman, Jan 1, 1962-IMB, Jan 2, 1962)

THE ARAB COUNTRIES OF THE ME AND THE ALGERIAN QUESTION

NOTE: APG = Algerian Provisional Government

SYNOPSIS

The APG continued to enjoy the political support of all Arab countries, but remained closest to the UAR. The Algerian leaders frequently informed and consulted Cairo on their affairs. It was reported that Abdel Nasser had advised them to hold peace talks but to shun any alliance with France; the UAR information media, however, claimed that only through military operations could final victory be achieved. President Bourguiba, who mediated between the APG and the French and who warmly advocated a peaceful settlement, was sharply denounced by the UAR.

The APG remained somewhat critical of the scope of Arab political support. There was virtually no League or international meeting, joint communiqué, or political speech in which the Arabs omitted to express support for the Algerian cause; however, the APG's main political demands, e.g. for an Arab boycott of France and the evacuation of foreign bases on Arab soil, were not met.

Arab financial and other aid, such as scholarships and military training, continued as before.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

Reactions to Referendum. [On Jan 6-8 the French Government held a referendum in France and Algeria on the bill "concerning the self-determination of the Algerian population and the organization of public powers in Algeria prior to self-determination." The referendum was boycotted by the APG, which condemned it as a denial of the principle of self-determination. There were many abstentions. The bill became law on Jan 15.]

[Arab reactions were extremely hostile. The press and radio of all Arab countries sharply attacked France and President de Gaulle before, during and after the referendum.]

On Jan 7-10 anti-French rallies and demonstrations took place in Beirut, Damascus, Aleppo, Baghdad, Amman, Cairo, Tunis and Rabat. (Hayat, Jan 7-14; Ahram, Jan 10; BBCM, Jan 9-13)

From Jan 9-11, 500 UAR ulamā' (1,000 according to Eg. Gaz., Jan 12) met in Damascus "in support of Algeria" and against the "theatrical referendum." Their long list of resolutions included a declaration to the Arab and Islamic worlds that in the eyes of Islam France was in a state of war with them and that any Muslim in the French army was a deserter from Islam. It declared the Algerian struggle a holy war (jihād). (Hayat, Jan 10; Ahram, Jan 12)

On Jan 9 the UAR National Assembly appealed to the Arab countries to boycott France in all domains, to confiscate French properties and to extend aid to the Algerian fighters. Arab countries which had NATO bases on their territories were called upon to abolish them; friendly countries were asked to recognize the APG. (Ahram, Jan 10)

On Jan 11 the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions resolved to call on the Arab governments to impose a boycott on French aircraft, shipping and goods (Hayat, Jan 12; Ahram, Jan 12). [No such boycott was imposed.]

At the Baghdad League Council Conference. The conference (Jan 30-Feb 4) discussed the Algerian question at three prolonged secret sessions, on the basis of a memorandum submitted by Krim Belkacem, Foreign Minister of the APG. The memorandum urged that the resolutions adopted by the Arab foreign ministers in Sbtura (MER 1960, p 166) regarding Algeria should be immediately implemented. (Hayat, Jan 31)

Al-Ahram reported that the debate was heated and Mahmūd Fawzi, the UAR FM, threatened to withdraw from the conference in protest against some remarks by the foreign ministers of Libya, Jordan and Sudan. The dispute was over two points. Fawzi, supported by the delegations of Morocco, Iraq, Lebanon and Algeria, demanded that "all resolutions by any conference on the Algerian question should be supported." [This probably referred in particular to the Casablanca Conference in which, of the Arab countries, only the UAR, Morocco and the APG participated, see pp 48 ff.] Morocco proposed that the resolution include a demand for the liquidation of all foreign bases in the Arab states. Sudan, Jordan, Libya and Tunisia "hesitated to approve the resolution" (Ahram, Feb 2). [There were foreign bases in Libya and Tunisia but not in the Sudan and Jordan.]

The resolution on Algeria included the following points:

the granting of additional and immediate military and financial assistance to the Algerian insurgents; permission for recruitment and transit of volunteers; support for the unity of the Algerian territory; increase in diplomatic efforts on behalf of Algeria; support of the APG offer to enter into bilateral negotiations to secure the right for self-determination [In a statement issued on Jan 16, following the referendum, the APG had said it was ready to "engage in negotiations with the French government on the conditions for a free consultation of the Algerian people"]; to reconsider the Arab states' political and economic relations with France if the Algerian war continued; to make certain that foreign bases on Arab soil would not be used against Algeria; to step up the campaign against countries and organizations aiding France against Algeria; to appeal to other countries harking the Algerian struggle to support this resolution (text in Hayat, Feb 2). "Very important secret resolutions" were also reported to have been adopted. (Gumhuriyah, Feb 3)

Krim Belkacem told the press that though some of the resolutions were not strong enough [probably a reference to the questions of an Arab boycott of France and foreign bases on Arab soil], yet considered as a whole, he was pleased with them. (R. Baghdad, Feb 2-IMB, Feb 3; Zaman, Feb 3)

Al-Hayat commented that the only constructive resolution was the support for bilateral negotiations with France. (Hayat, Feb 3)

President Bourguiba's Mediation. The Greater Maghrib Issue. During Feb Tunisia began to mediate between France and the APG. Talks between President de Gaulle and President Bourguiba took place in Rambouillet on Feb 27. Subsequently Bourguiba held talks with PM Ferhat Abbas and King Hassan of Morocco in Rabat (where they had attended the funeral of King Muhammad). A joint communiqué, issued on March 2, stated that they considered that "no obstacle must obstruct the opening of the direct negotiations between the APG and the French Government within the framework of total decolonization." They noted their complete agreement on the correct methods for the realization of Algerian independence. They reaffirmed their determination to build the greater Maghrib (i.e.: Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia) and expressed their pleasure at the progress made in this direction. On March 30, the French Government and the APG announced that talks would open at Evian on April 7.]

The Jordanian press and radio hailed President Bourguiba's mediation efforts, expressed optimism as to the solution of the Algerian question and full support for the union of Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia. (Falastin, March 2; Manar, March 5, 6, 15; IMB, March 7-9, 13-15)

[Baghdad commented in a similar vein.] FM Hashim Jawad said that Iraq hoped that the Algerian question would be solved through negotiations. (R. Baghdad, March 5 [7])

Cairo's "Two Minds." On the other hand, UAR comment was critical. Wide circulation was given to an attack upon Bourguiba by Abd al-Karim al-Khattabi [a Moroccan political exile residing in Cairo]. He accused Bourguiba of wishing "to create a French state in North Africa similar to Israel in the Arab East," and warned the "Algerian fighters" against accepting Bourguiba's proposals "which were built on treachery and lies." (See e.g. BBCM, March 3; IMB, March 2-3). The "supporters of imperialist solutions" were denounced and the Algerians warned to beware of a tendency to dissipate their moral and material forces. (V of A, March 2 [4])

On March 5-9 Krim Belkacem, the Algerian Deputy Premier and FM discussed with Abdel Nasser the latest developments in the Algerian question before attending a meeting of the APG in Tunis (R. Cairo, March 5 [7]; Ahram, March 6-10). A foreign observer noted that the Algerians had depended heavily on Abdel Nasser's support during their six-year fight and the APG now wanted his approval before falling into step with President Bourguiba. Abdel Nasser had advised the Algerian leaders to hold peace talks but had urged them to shun any military or political alliance with France. Financial ties should be accepted if the Algerians considered them advantageous. (NYT, March 13)

However, even while the Algerian leader was conducting his talks in the UAR, the UAR mass media continued to express reservations and warnings regarding the negotiations and claimed that only military operations could achieve final victory. Cairo Radio said that by insisting on a preliminary cease-fire and demanding that pro-imperialist factions [a reference to the Mouvement National Algérien (MNA) of Messali Hadj] should also take part in the negotiations, France had shown that her attitude had not changed. (R. Cairo, March 6 [8]; see also BBCM, IMB, March 8-18)

Regarding the effect of peace in Algeria on the position of the UAR in the Arab world, C.L. Sulzberger of The New York Times wrote from Cairo: There was in Cairo an initial feeling of satisfaction that the cause of Algeria was about to triumph. However, there did not seem to be full awareness of what the implications for Cairo might ultimately be. If a confederation evolved between Morocco, Tunisia and independent Algeria, possibly French-orientated, an important shift in Arab political relations might take place. There was likelihood that Abdel Nasser's position in these westward regions would diminish, and that of pro-French leaders, symbolized by Bourguiba, would grow. (NYT, March 22)

On March 24 two APG Ministers, Abdelhafid Bousouf (Armament) and Muhammad Yazid (Information) arrived in Cairo to "inform the UAR authorities on the latest development in the Algerian question." They stated that the APG would hold a special meeting upon their return to Tunis (Hayat, March 25). They were received by President Abdel Nasser for a 5-hour talk. (R. Cairo, March 27-IMB, March 27)

APG Withdraws Its Agreement to Send Delegates to Evian. [On March 31 the APG made known the withdrawal of its agreement to send delegates to Evian on April 7 because of French "negotiations with the valets of colonialism" (i.e. the MNA). However, the APG reaffirmed its wish to open peace negotiations as soon as possible.]

The radio and press of all the Arab countries supported the stand of the APG and attacked France; those of the UAR recalled their previous warnings and scepticism. (See BBCM, IMB, Arabic Press, April 1-8.)

In a speech on April 6 President Bourguiba exhorted both the French and the Algerians to distinguish between "the important and the more important" in order to achieve a solution. While Lebanese [western-orientated] papers supported this attitude (R. Tunis, April 6 [8]; Hayat, April 9; L'Orient, April 12), a Cairo paper spoke of the "strange statements by the well-known defeatist, Bourguiba." (Akhbar, April 9)

Muhammad Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, disclosed UAR suspicions in an article entitled "Algeria In Its Most Critical Time." He wrote that Bourguiba wanted to use his friendship with President Kennedy and the USA to exert pressure on de Gaulle. Facts indicated that Washington had advised de Gaulle to receive Bourguiba in Paris in order to strengthen his prestige in the Arab world and also because of Bourguiba's plan to settle the Algerian question in the framework of a Mediterranean alliance to be joined by the Maghrib, including Algeria. The Maghrib would thus form an Arab bloc to counterbalance the anti-Western force in the Arab East. Bourguiba returned from France with dreams of a share in the Algerian oil. "This is the reason behind President Bourguiba's attempts to press the Algerian Government to appease de Gaulle even on the question of the Sahara." (Ahram, April 7)

Reactions To Abortive Military Coup in Algeria. [A military uprising, directed against President de Gaulle's Algerian policy, broke out in Algeria during the night of April 21-22; it collapsed within four days.] Jordanian, Tunisian, Moroccan and [pro-Western] Lebanese papers praised the stand of General de Gaulle, urged the APG to support him and later commented positively on his victory over the rebels. (BBG, April 28; IMB, April 27, 28; L'Orient, April 24, 27; Amal, April 25; Bilad, Tunis, April 25; Sabah, April 25, 27; Bilad, Rabat, April 26; Hayat, April 27; Jihad, Falastin, Jordan, April 27, 28)

On the other hand, UAR broadcasts and papers as well as Lebanese [pro-UAR] papers associated de Gaulle with the rebel leaders. De Gaulle and the rebels were said to be pursuing the same objective, that of opposition to Algerian freedom, and to differ only in the ways in which they sought to secure France's interests. (R. Cairo, April 22, 23, 25, V. of A., April 22-26 [23-28]; IMB, April 23-27). Al-Akhbar wrote that Gen. de Gaulle was not unconnected with the rebels, just as he was not unconnected with the rebels of May 1958 who brought him to power. (Akhbar, April 23; also Ahram, April 24)

Mecca Radio followed the Egyptian line of argument. (R. Mecca, April 24 [26])

UAR comment argued that the presence of French troops in Algeria would not guarantee the fulfilment of any agreement reached with de Gaulle. The only solution was to continue the struggle until full victory. (R. Cairo, April 26 [28]; Akhbar, April 27; Gumhuriyah, April 27, 29; Ahram, April 28)

The Evian Negotiations. [Background: On May 20 negotiations between the French government and the APG opened at Evian. On the same day the French government announced that it had ordered its troops in Algeria to cease all offensive operations, that a large number of political prisoners and detainees would be released and that the FLN leaders detained in France would be placed in less rigorous confinement. The negotiations were suspended on June 13, on French initiative; were resumed at Lugrin on July 20 and broken off by the Algerians on July 28 as France refused to recognize the Sahara as Algerian territory. On Sept 5, however, President de Gaulle suggested that France might accept Algerian sovereignty over the Sahara if French interests there were safeguarded. In Oct first the French and then the Algerians offered to resume negotiations. At the same time, the two sides established secret contacts. Their progress was temporarily interrupted when about 4,000 FLN detainees in France began a hunger strike on Nov 2. Contacts were resumed, and continued into 1962. On March 7, 1962, negotiations opened at Evian and on March 18, 1962, the two sides signed a cease-fire agreement and a declaration on the future of Algeria.]

On the eve of the Evian talks, the radio stations of Amman, Baghdad, Cairo, Mecca and Umdurman each broadcast an essentially identical statement declaring their respective governments' support for the APG, and affirming the Sahara to be part of Algeria (R. Cairo, Amman, Umdurman, Baghdad, Beirut, Mecca, May 18-20 [20, 23]; Ahram, May 20; Hayat, May 20). [There was no such Tunisian statement], and in a broadcast on May 20 President Bourguiba called on the APG to respond favourably to the French "gesture of goodwill." (R. Tunis, May 20 [23])

With the suspension of the Evian talks, Cairo Radio said on June 22 that as France had broken off the negotiations, the issue would now be decided on the battlefield. (R. Cairo, June 22 [24]; the Cairo press commented in the same vein.)

On June 16 the Arab Joint Defence Council, which met at the time in Cairo [see p 108], issued a statement in support of the APG and called for the immediate resumption of talks. If France did not resume the talks or if they failed, the League Council should meet to consider the implementation of the anti-French measures previously decided upon. (Hayat, June 17)

On July 9 President Abdel Nasser received an APG delegation headed by Krim Belkacem, the Deputy PM and FM. An official statement said the delegation had acquainted the UAR with the progress of the Evian talks and their expected developments. The President had reassured the delegation of the unqualified support of the UAR. (Ahram, July 11)

Bourguiba's Claim to Sahara Denounced by UAR. [In July President Bourguiba renewed his demands for French evacuation of the Bizeria base and the modification of the border with Algeria so as to annex to Tunisia a part of the Sahara in which there was prospecting for oil.]

A Cairo paper commented that with his claim to the Sahara, Bourguiba had entered as a third party into the Algerian dispute on the side of France. This was a "treacherous blow" to the APG. (Akhbar, July 19; see also July 20, 21; Gumhuriyah, July 20; Ahram, July 21)

36th Ordinary League Council Session. This was attended by a representative of the APG. Resolutions on Algeria passed on Sept 19 called on the member-states to implement promptly previous resolutions, to continue their efforts to secure a UN resolution asserting Algeria's right to independence and territorial integrity, to secure recognition of the APG by additional countries and to convene an emergency session if requested by the APG. (Hayat, Sept 15, 20)

Jewish Community in Algeria Denounced for Provocative Activities. On Sept 11 and 12 severe clashes occurred between Jews and Muslims in Oran; one Jew and two Muslims were killed. The FLN (over Tunis Radio) appealed to the Jewish community for calm and asked it not to let itself be "manoeuvred by the colonialists" against the Algerian people as the community itself was part of the people; the Algerian revolution wished the Jews to take part in the life of the Algerian nation. (R. Paris, Sept 13 [14]; Ha'aretz, Sept 13)

A Tunisian paper appealed to leading Jews of the world to stop the activities of their "ignorant masses" in order to safeguard their future in Algeria and other parts of the Arab world. (Sabah, Sept 13)

A Cairo broadcast accused the Jews of siding with French imperialism, long-standing treachery and ingratitude to the people which had given them shelter. The Jews had passed sentence on themselves by their "savagery aggression," and the day would come when "every criminal aggressor will receive punishment." (V of A, Sept 13 [15])

Arabs Warn the OAS. During Nov and Dec, with the mounting of OAS activity, Arab comments denounced the "criminal activities of the racist European ultras" and warned—in the words of a Tunisian minister—that "our people will come down ruthlessly on those responsible," whether these were in the OAS, "round the OAS," in the French administration in Algeria, or in France. (R. Tunis, Nov 30 [Dec 2]; see also various broadcasts by R. Amman, R. Cairo, R. Tunis, during Nov-Dec, IMB, BBCM)

The Cairo Voice of the Arabs repeatedly claimed that the OAS was being used as a tool by the French imperialist government to impose its hateful policy on Algeria. (e.g. V of A, Nov 30, Dec 2 [Dec 2, 5])

More Expressions of Solidarity, Celebration of the Algerian Revolution Anniversary. [The Seventh anniversary of the Algerian revolt, Nov 1, was an occasion for renewed professions of support for the Algerian cause by the governments and various organizations of all the Arab countries.]

On Nov 2 about 3,900 FLN detainees in France went on a hunger strike, demanding an improvement in their conditions. The strike ended on Nov 20 when the French Government granted the demands. [The Arab League Secretariat issued an appeal to consider Nov 16 as a "day of solidarity" with the detainees and to stop work for one hour (Eg. Gaz., Nov 11). There were reports on work stoppage in Iraq and Jordan for one hour (Zaman, Falastin, Nov 17), in the UAR for half an hour (Ahram, Nov 17) and in Kuwait for ten minutes (R. Kuwait, Nov 16 [17]). Demonstrations, government statements and other expressions of support for the detainees were reported from all Arab countries.]

APG Premier Consults with Abdel Nasser. On Dec 11 Premier Youssef Ben Kheddah of the APG [who had replaced Ferhat Ahbas at the end of August] arrived in Cairo on a tour which also included Libya and Rabat. Al-Ahram wrote that the Premier was consulting with President Abdel Nasser on problems unsolved in the secret negotiations then taking place between France and the APG. (Ahram, Dec 12, 16)

ARAB AID TO APG

Iraqi Aid. ID2m. was allocated in the Iraqi budget to be paid to the APG during 1961. The sum of ID1m. was paid on July 8 and a similar amount on Nov 24. Qassim declared that Iraq would continue financial aid to Algeria also after it attained independence. (Zaman, March 17, July 9, Nov 25)

On April 8 a special APG envoy arrived in Baghdad to inform the government of developments in the Algerian question. (Zaman, April 9-11)

On Aug 8 it was officially announced that Iraq was ready to receive "any number" of Algerian students free of charge at her universities and military institutions. Fifteen Algerians were to enter the Iraqi military academy in the coming year. (ANA, Aug 8 [W 17])

In Aug. some hours after the election of the new APG, a special envoy was ordered to leave for Baghdad to "see General Qassim on a special secret mission." (Zaman, Aug 30)

In Nov it was reported that some Algerian officers had joined Iraqi military institutions. (R. Baghdad, Nov 25-IMB, Nov 26)

Jordanian Aid. On Jan 11 the Jordanian Parliament held a special session to discuss ways and means of supporting the APG. (Jihad, Jan 12)

On Jan 26 the sum of JD7,042 was handed by the Jordanian CGS to the APG representative in Amman as a contribution from the armed forces. (R. Amman, Jan 26-IMB, Jan 26)

In Feb an official spokesman declared that "tens of students" well trained and equipped, were ready to leave for Algeria at "a moment's notice" (Falastin, Feb 5). [There was no report that they did so.]

In Oct there were 40 Algerian students studying in Jordan on Jordanian scholarships. (ANA, Oct 8 [W 12])

[There was no report that they ever left.]

THE ARAB-ISRAEL CONFLICT

SYNOPSIS

NOTE: Detailed synopses have been prefixed to most of the subsections, below. This synopsis therefore charts a general outline of events only.

No significant change took place in the pattern of the Arab-Israel conflict during the year. (Compare MER 1960, p 169 ff)

The terms of the conflict were restated by the two sides, with only slight variations. Israel continued to advocate direct negotiations for a peace settlement with the Arabs, as well as a non-aggression pact and controlled disarmament as preliminary steps. At the same time she continued to regard the build-up of her military power and the strengthening of her international ties both as a deterrent to the Arab threat, and as a means of paving the way to peace by ultimately convincing the Arabs of the futility of their aspiration to destroy Israel.

The Arab countries continued to reject Israel's approaches. For, in their view, Israel had committed the unforgivable crime of evicting the Palestinian Arabs from their homeland; moreover, having been established by aggression and constantly seeking expansion, she endangered the very existence of the Arab nation. In the Arab image, though Israel was a small and weak country, she had powerful allies in imperialism which used Israel as its tool, in world Zionism, and in world Jewry which was depicted—in the images of European anti-Semitism—as a satanic force. Thus the Arabs maintained, in President Abdel Nasser's words, that Israel was "an evil that should be uprooted." Abdel Nasser, who was apparently the only Arab leader to refer to practical aspects of the problem, did not, however, foresee the realization of this aim in the near future. For, in his view, this needed an effective, united Arab force, materially and politically independent.

Such conditions were far from being established. The setting up of a united Arab force was prevented by the inter-Arab disputes which, as in previous years, overshadowed the Arab-Israel conflict (pp 97 ff). The first half of 1961 witnessed a détente in inter-Arab disputes. The protagonists of "Arab solidarity," who opposed President Abdel Nasser's idea of "Arab union," and who had promoted the détente, had been aided in their efforts by the issues of Israel's nuclear capacity and her progress on the Jordan waters project; these aroused Arab concern and, it was argued, made solidarity imperative. The détente, however, was preserved only by the tacit agreement not to discuss at all or to defer matters of contention, a category comprising all the major issues related to the Arab-Israel conflict. This was the case with the "Palestinian-Entity" scheme, sponsored by the UAR and ostensibly designed to represent the "Palestinian people" in the conflict but understood by Jordan to be aimed at her dismemberment (p 109). This was also the case with the question of the Jordan waters and a unified Arab military command which were dealt with by the Arab League Joint Defence Council, meeting for the first time since 1954.

Even this limited inter-Arab understanding was soon shattered, by Iraq's claim to sovereignty over Kuwait, in June. Three months later the UAR was broken up by a Syrian coup d'état, and prospects for establishing the conditions Abdel Nasser thought necessary for the destruction of Israel were rendered even more remote. Abdel Nasser now declared that the elimination of the Arab "fifth column and reaction" in Syria, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere must be accomplished first.

In the crucial field of armaments, a significant development was the appearance of signs that were interpreted as evidence that the UAR and Israel had entered a race for atomic weapons and guided missiles. These signs were the disclosure at the end of 1960 that Israel had started building a large nuclear reactor,—although Israel declared that it would be used for peaceful purposes only; Israel's launching of a meteorological rocket; and guided missile development in the UAR (Egypt), with the aid of German experts. There were, however, no indications that either of the two countries would be able to produce atomic warheads for years to come, nor was it thought likely that the atomic powers would supply them with such weapons. In the field of guided ground-to-ground missiles too observers surmised that both countries had still a long way to go. Thus the practical effects of this development in the short run were psychological and political rather than military; it served to heighten anxieties and tension.

In the field of conventional military power the established balance was apparently maintained, with the Arab forces possessing considerable quantitative preponderance, and the Israel forces an assumed qualitative superiority. The UAR continued to rely exclusively on Soviet arms; Israel obtained hers principally from France, but also from Britain and other Western sources. Neither the East nor the West, however, provided weapons liable to give one side a decisive advantage. In view of this situation, the possibility of independent and uncontrolled weapon development in the area assumed additional significance.

As regards the international aspects of the conflict, the USSR continued to side with the Arabs in every instance. She provided Iraq and Yemen with arms in addition to the UAR. However, while the Soviet Union, like the Arabs, depicted Israel as an aggressive tool of imperialism, she expressed no support for the declared Arab aim of liquidating Israel.

The United States, while abstaining from supplying arms to the principal antagonists, was nevertheless the world power most involved in the conflict.

The US position underwent an appreciable change during the year. President Kennedy in the election campaign the previous year had pledged an effort to seek a solution to the conflict. The US also made it clear that she wished to probe the possibilities of a solution to the refugee problem. Consequently, both the Arab countries and Israel were apprehensive about being pressed into accepting solutions which they considered disadvantageous. Later, however, the US administration succeeded in promoting confidence in its intentions; on the Arab side this development was helped by a general improvement in the US-UAR relations. Recognizing the deep gulf which separated the two sides in the conflict, the US sought to maintain friendly relations with both and, by helping to keep the balance between them, to preserve the relative tranquillity in the area. Cold war considerations continued to play an important role in US policy on the conflict.

The Arab countries, and in particular the UAR, spent much effort to isolate Israel on the international scene, especially among the African and Asian countries. With increasing emphasis, the Arabs sought to stigmatize Israel as a colonialist creation and a tool of imperialism; Arab propaganda in Africa also employed anti-Semitic themes, including the dissemination of the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion." The aim of thwarting Israel's "infiltration into Africa" featured prominently, and often exclusively, in the efforts of the Arab League in Africa and in the bilateral relations between Arab and African countries.

The Arabs easily obtained Israel's condemnation as imperialist in the non-governmental Afro-Asian organizations which were largely dominated by the UAR. More important, Israel was so condemned by the Casablanca Conference in January, in which three sub-Saharan countries—Ghana, Guinea, and Mali—joined the UAR, Morocco and the Algerian Provisional Government in a neutralist anti-Western African grouping. The great majority of sub-Saharan African countries, however, which joined together at the Monrovia conference, in June, continued to strengthen their friendly ties with Israel. Nine of these countries co-sponsored at the UN General Assembly an Israeli-backed resolution calling for direct Arab-Israel negotiations. Ethiopia, whose ties with Israel had grown ever closer, accorded Israel de jure recognition, notwithstanding Arab opposition.

At the Conference of Non-Aligned Countries which met at Belgrade in September—the first conference of its kind—the Arabs' effort to pass a condemnation of Israel as imperialist was frustrated though nine of the 25 participating countries were Arab.

At the UN General Assembly, the Arab representatives reiterated the theme that Israel was "the embodiment of imperialism." They rejected the renewed Israel proposals for direct negotiations, a non-aggression pact and disarmament on the grounds, among others, that this was mere propaganda, that the establishment of Israel was responsible for Arab rearmament, and that "with Israel out of the region" total disarmament would automatically follow.

Regarding the Arab refugees, the UN re-endorsed its 1948 resolution calling for repatriation or compensation. The Arab delegations also advocated the implementation of the resolution, but their spokesmen made it clear that in their eyes the true solution of the problem lay in the elimination of Israel. Israel saw the Arab demand to return the refugees as an intent to destroy her and the Knesset (Parliament) resolved that no refugees would return; this resolution constituted a formal hardening rather than a new departure in Israel's attitude on the question. On US initiative a special representative of the Palestine Conciliation Commission was sent to the ME to probe the possibilities of a settlement of the problem. However, he could only reaffirm that no progress could be made in this direction apart from or in advance of an overall settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict; he also reported that UN assistance would be needed at least a decade. In the end the US attitude at the UN proved material in maintaining the political status quo in face of attempts by both the Arab states and Israel to change it in their favour.

The Arab boycott offices carried on their routine activities in the economic and cultural fields. Arab opinion as to their effectiveness was divided in the face of Israel's obvious economic prosperity and the marked growth in her foreign trade, her tourist industry and in foreign investment. The boycott offices claimed successes, but their Arab critics spoke of failure. The US Congress again attacked an amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act directed against the Arab boycott; the US administration, however, maintained that coercive tactics should be avoided.

The Arab-Israeli borders were relatively quiet during the year; the Syrian border remained the most unruly, with rather frequent armed clashes, but no incident on the scale of the Tawafiq raid of 1960 occurred.

The question of Arab reaction to the utilization of the Jordan waters by Israel continued to be a subject of discussion and dispute in Arab councils. The Arab countries found themselves in a dilemma. They were not ready for military action against Israel. Yet to deny Israel the waters, they had either to attack her or divert the headwaters of the river in the immediate vicinity of the border; in the light of Israel warnings against it, the latter course of action, however, was also liable to lead to military involvement. Also, Jordan feared that an Arab joint diversion project might adversely affect her own project. The issue was left in abeyance. Meanwhile both Israel and Jordan carried on with their projects for the utilization of the waters, both of which fitted into the Johnston plan; Israel planned to start pumping from the Sea of Galilee in 1964.

IEWS AND POLICIES

Note: No new departure was discernible during the year in the views and policies publicly expressed by the Arab leaders on the Arab-Israel conflict. Consequently, there have been recorded only the views of the two principal antagonists, the UAR and Israel, of Tunisia, which aroused attention for the first time in 1961, and of Syria, after her secession from the UAR on Sept. 28. An appendix records an Arab image of Judaism, Zionism, and Israel as broadcast to the Arab world by Cairo's state-directed "Voice of the Arabs." No similar effort to form and disseminate systematically an image of the Arabs was found to have been made in Israel.

UAR VIEWS AND POLICIES

Note: Important pronouncements by President Abdel Nasser on the Arab-Israel conflict were included in his letters to President Kennedy and King Hussein; these are recorded on pp 198-9 and p 143 h respectively.

Synopsis. No new departure was discernible in Abdel Nasser's publicly expressed views and policies on the Arab-Israel conflict. There were only variations and shifts in emphasis in accordance with changing circumstances (compare MER 1960, p 171). The excerpts recorded below from the President's public utterances serve therefore mainly as additional illustration of his views. Abdel Nasser professed to see two dangers in Israel's existence; the one, "the attempt to destroy the Arab people of Palestine," the other, expansionism at the expense of the Arab world. The second danger he claimed to have found confirmed in pronouncements made during the Israeli election campaign. In his letter to President Kennedy, Abdel Nasser said that the large-scale immigration would lead to Israel's expansion (compare below: Israel Views and Policies). Over and above these "dangers," Abdel Nasser attributed to Israel—acting in collaboration with imperialism—the intention to "destroy Arab nationalism," and to keep the Arabs backward.

The Arab aim in the conflict was termed mostly as "the restoration of the rights of the Palestine people," its "return to its homeland." When speaking to non-Arabs, Abdel Nasser consistently abstained from any stronger terms. In his letter to President Kennedy, Abdel Nasser made no reference to a solution of the conflict. When addressing Arab audiences, however, Abdel Nasser also spoke of "the destruction of Zionism," the "inevitable end of Israel"; and in his letter to King Hussein, he said that Israel was an "evil that should be uprooted" (sharr yajtaala).

To achieve this aim, Abdel Nasser said in his letter to Hussein that "a comprehensive sovereign Arab force" was needed. (This probably meant an effective united command of the Arab armies, if not the unification of the Arab countries themselves, the material independence of the force from foreign sources, and freedom from international limitations upon its actions to the greatest possible measure.) The UAR was the vanguard in the struggle for Arab union, which was the forerunner of Israel's destruction, Abdel Nasser said; Israel, well aware of this, concentrated her hostile attention on the UAR, as e.g. in her Arabic broadcasts (compare PM Ben-Gurion's views, below).

After the break-up of the UAR Abdel Nasser first concentrated his attention on Egypt's internal affairs (see below for Ben-Gurion commenting on this), but later returned to the Israel theme in the framework of the "struggle against Arab reaction." Reaffirming Egypt's policy of pursuing Arab union, Abdel Nasser said that now the Arab "fifth column and reaction" must be got rid of as a prerequisite for "liberating Palestine." At the same time he said the UAR (Egypt) was now doubling her army so as to enable it to face Israel alone independent of the "Arab fifth column."

In the wake of the Casablanca conference, which stigmatized Israel as an imperialist bridgehead, Abdel Nasser much emphasized what he termed the UAR success in exposing Israel's "imperialist activities" in Africa; he made it clear that Israel's relations with African countries were a main reason for the UAR's efforts in the continent (see e.g. p 675 b).

The President mentioned—though he did so relatively seldom—the competition between the Arabs and Israel for the sympathy of world opinion. He said that Zionism falsified the image of the Arab, and that the Arabs should present to the world what he claimed was the truth about the conflict, to convince the world that the Arabs were right, and that the creation of Israel was a blunder. In his letter to Kennedy, Abdel Nasser said that US policy on the ME was influenced by "un-American factors" such as "calculation of election votes."

Abdel Nasser took pains to emphasize, in his letter to Kennedy and elsewhere, that his pronouncements on Israel were not meant for "home consumption" and that he expressed the same views to Arab audiences as to foreigners behind closed doors.

The Enemies: Imperialism, Israel, Arab Stoges of Imperialism. Abdel Nasser at NU Rally, Cairo, July 22: "The imperialists, Israel and the agents of imperialism in the Arab world, all of them are the enemies of Arab nationalism. Israel was created by imperialism in the heart of the Arab world to destroy Arab nationalism, strike the Arab nation and prevent the Arab nation from waking up to build itself up socially, economically and politically..." (Eg. Gaz., July 23)

Abdel Nasser to Syrian Youth Groups, Alexandria, Aug 17: "There was an election battle in Israel last week... In the past nine years, in every election battle, we were able to learn the intentions of Israel from the campaign speeches and articles... [They] show us the intentions of the enemy. The enemy wants western Jordan, the Gaza sector, the region east of Tiberias in Syria. They see that they had chances to attain these objectives, which they now regret. But does this mean that they have abandoned the idea?" The President specifically referred to an article which he said had appeared in Herut, the organ of the Herut Movement [for whose attitude on the Arab-Israel conflict see below: Israel Views; party platforms] (R. Cairo, Aug 17 [19])

Abdel Nasser in American Television Interview, Aug 25: "... We always saw a double danger in the existence of Israel. The first arises from what the Arab people in Palestine were exposed to; the attempts to destroy them. The second arises from the threat directed by Israel against the Arab nation, a matter which can easily be confirmed by reading the Israeli papers and studying the [election-campaign] speeches..."

"I expect Israel will attack any day. Now, tomorrow or the day after. They are concentrating their forces and they receive assistance from the West and modern weapons principally from France." (Eg. Gaz., Aug 26)

The UAR—Vanguard in Struggle for Palestine. Abdel Nasser to Palestinians, Damascus, March 13: "The United Arab Republic also serves as the vanguard of the Palestinian people for the sake of the restoration of their rights and country." (Eg. Mail, March 4)

The Aim: "To Return Palestine People to Its Homeland, Restore Its Rights—By Employing All Means. Abdel Nasser, at Arab League Conference, Cairo, Feb 1: "Today, when we talk about Palestine, we say we want to liberate the Palestine people and restore their political and social rights..." (Eg. Gaz., Feb 2)

Abdel Nasser, to Palestinians, Damascus, March 3: "... Today, we say that the Palestine people must return to its homeland and that it must regain its rights." (Eg. Mail, March 4)

Abdel Nasser at NU Rally, Cairo, July 22: "We know our right and insist on it. We shall defend and strive for our right until we will wrest it by all means at our disposal from those who have taken it from us." (Eg. Gaz., July 23)

Abdel Nasser in American television interview, Aug 25: Q: "When Mr. Kennedy sent you his letter, one of the Cairo papers said: 'We believe that the only full and dignified solution of the Palestine problem is that Israel be obliterated.' Does this represent the view of the government also, or do you believe other solutions are possible?' A. "We believe that the rights of the Arabs of Palestine must be restored. More than a million Arabs have been expelled from their country and must return to their land... The question which should also be asked is what is the point of view of the government of Israel... They say they will not allow any Arab to return, yet surprisingly they advocate Jewish immigration to Palestine... On our part we said at the Bandung Conference and at other conferences that we want the UN resolutions on the question of Palestine implemented... the Israel government... obstinately refused to carry out one resolution."

Q. "It seems that the problem cannot be solved without a struggle, since Israel rejects these conditions while you insist upon them..." A. "There is naturally a problem, and there is a continuing danger and an existing threat." (Eg. Gaz., Aug 26)

"Liberation of Palestine," "Destruction of Zionism" After Elimination of "Arab Reaction," Arab Unity. Abdel Nasser, Damascus, Feb 21: "Why does Zionism see a threat in your revolution?" "Planning to seize Palestine, Zionism, in collaboration with imperialism, divided the Arab nation into small weak countries giving a chance to imperialism and the imperialistic stooges to gain more ground and consequently Zionism also gained more ground."

"When the Arab nation once again reverts to its unity with a view to destroying the influence of imperialism as well as the imperialistic stooges, we must destroy [naqdi] Zionism."

"Zionism is aware of this fact, hence it is fighting against this Republic alone. If we listen to the Israeli broadcasts, we find that they only attack this Republic..." (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., Feb 22)

[Abdel Nasser returned to the above theme after the break-up of the UAR]:

Abdel Nasser at Port Said, Dec 23: "In 1948 the people [of Egypt] used to say: what have we gained from the Arabs except treason and treachery?... We were constantly fed with a call which advocated that we should isolate ourselves altogether from the Arab East. Brothers, the authors of this talk were imperialism and Zionism... Ben-Gurion... said that the cause for the [1956] aggression and for the collusion with Britain and France was the joint Arab command set up between Egypt, Syria and Jordan. He said that Israel was like a hazelnut in a nutcracker because of this command. The party which will meet its inevitable end at the hands of Arab unity and solidarity is, of course, Israel and Zionism..." (R. Cairo, Dec 23 [28])

"They claim that there is no hope of liberating Palestine now that the unity [the Egyptian-Syrian union] has failed. They ask: What are you waiting for, Abdel Nasser? Why do you not enter Palestine and liberate it? I am first waiting to get rid of the reactionaries and the fifth column in the Arab countries. How can we enter and ignore the fifth column and reactionism?... We are waiting for the Arab peoples to get rid and purge themselves of the fifth column. When this happens, the time for the Palestine battle will have drawn nearer. Reaction has an alliance with imperialism and Zionism." (R. Cairo, Dec 23 [28])

UAR to Rely Only on Own, Not on Other Arab Armies. Abdel Nasser, Port Said, Dec 23 [following the dissolution of the UAR]: "... We are now increasing our army by three divisions, to face imperialism and Zionism. We are now enlarging our army so that we can depend on ourselves. We cannot depend on the fifth columns of treason outside the country. He who asks: 'What are you waiting for, Abdel Nasser, to launch a war against Israel?' is seeking an operation against Israel on our part so that he can stab us in the back..."

"We are naturally strengthening ourselves, because Israel is also saying: 'We have no enemy except the UAR.' Ben-Gurion said these things. Our duty is to fortify ourselves. We are doubling our army, air force and navy. We are manufacturing weapons to enable us to break the neck of anyone who approaches us [applause]..." (R. Cairo, Dec 23 [28])

Putting the Case before the World. Abdel Nasser at NU Rally, Cairo, July 22: "Is it reasonable to let Ben-Gurion go to America and France and tour the world in an attempt to convince the people that he is in the right and we in the wrong?... It is the duty of everyone of us to try to convince anyone asking this question that we are in the right and that the creation of Israel was a blunder." (Eg. Gaz., July 23)

Abdel Nasser to an Arab emigrants' delegation from the US and Canada, Alexandria, July 27: "Zionism managed to mislead and deceive with the aid of money and influence... The Zionists falsify the image of the Arab in the US, Canada and Europe... but we feel that truthfulness is essential so that the world can know the realities of our cause." (Nasser's Speeches, p 185)

Fighting Israel in Africa and Asia. Abdel Nasser before National Assembly, Jan 23: "The highlight of the Casablanca conference was, in the words of your message, its anti-colonialist and anti-Zionist aspect."

"... Israel... was not allowed to attend the Bandung conference, although she claimed to be a part of Asia. There was Afro-Asian unanimity to place Israel within the walls of isolation as a source of infection and as a purveyor of the imperialist disease and one of its symptoms. This also happened at the Casablanca conference... the liberated vanguards in Africa have opened their eyes to the truth of Israel and exposed its hidden motives and objectives." (Eg. Gaz., Jan 24)

TUNISIAN VIEWS AND POLICIES

Bourguiba on War and Negotiations. On May 11 President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia made a statement on the Arab-Israel conflict at a press conference at UN headquarters in New York. No transcript of the press conference was available, but only newspaper reports. A week before Bourguiba devoted a press conference in Washington mainly to a reckoning with Abdel Nasser; (see p 171 b)

According to The New York Times, Bourguiba said that the continuing exercise by Israel of a "right of conquest" and the "concentration camp" treatment of Palestine Arabs, resembling the Nazi persecution of Jews in World War II, made it impossible to negotiate peace in the Middle East.

Israel, like France, he declared, must learn that she will not always be the stronger and that until injustices are remedied bloodshed will continue and Israel's position will remain "precarious."

According to The Jerusalem Post, quoting Reuter, Bourguiba predicted a war on the lines of the Algerian conflict if Arab-Israel differences were not settled. "If there emerges a real will for peace and just solutions in Israel," there was a possibility of negotiating a modus vivendi, but Israel had never displayed any desire to abide by UN decisions, he declared. The day Israel "demonstrates any desire to implement these decisions, then perhaps one can speak in terms of negotiations" he said, adding: "But this is a secondary aspect of the big problem imposed by the position of Israel."

Bourguiba said Israel represented a kind of colonialism even worse than that of France in Tunisia; and he attributed "the ease with which Communist influence has invaded the ME" to the Arabs' feelings of frustration and injustice. (NYT, May 13; Jer. Post, May 14)

President Bourguiba's statement was the subject of questions asked in the Israeli Knesset (Parliament) and a detailed reply by PM Ben-Gurion, especially in refutation of Bourguiba's remarks on the alleged situation of Israel's Arab citizens. Ben-Gurion also said that in the joint communiqué issued by Presidents Kennedy and Bourguiba a week before the latter's press conference the two had declared that the international problems of Africa and the ME should be solved by direct negotiations between the interested parties. (ICPO/WNB, May 11-16)

According to a New York paper, the communiqué said the two Presidents "believe that negotiations and peaceful application of the principle of self-determination are the key to peace in Algeria and to stability in North Africa and the Mediterranean." (NYHT, May 6-7)

SYRIAN VIEWS AND POLICIES

NOTE: The Syrian Arab Republic, during the first months after the secession from the UAR, was fully occupied with efforts to stabilize the regime. Little was done to elaborate policies on foreign affairs, including the Arab-Israel conflict. Policies during this period were stated in the main not by the head of the provisional government but in various official statements and in a joint declaration by Syrian politicians.

Policy Declarations

Programme of Provisional Government, announced by PM Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari, Sept 29: To strengthen the army to enable it to protect the borders and "carry out its anticipated role in the realization of the aims of Arab nationalism"; participation in the Arab struggle in Palestine and Algeria... (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 2]; Nasr, Oct 1)

The "Principles and Aims of the People," formulated by the army Revolutionary Command on Oct 2, made no reference to the Arab-Israel conflict. (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4]; Hayat, Oct 3)

Appeal for Arab Unity, announced by PM Kuzbari in name of the Revolutionary Command and government, Oct 11: Para. 8, specifying the duties of the proposed unified Arab command, said its duties would be to protect the borders, repulse aggression and liberate its "occupied and usurped components and the components suffering from the yoke of imperialism." (R. Damascus, Oct 11 [12])

The National Charter, sponsored by the government and signed by representative Syrian politicians, made only a reference in passing to "the liberation of the usurped lands in Palestine, Algeria, Oman" and elsewhere in "the Arab homeland." (R. Damascus, Nov 10 [13]; Nasr, Nov 12)

ISRAEL VIEWS AND POLICIES

As with President Abdel Nasser's views, recorded above, those of PM Ben-Gurion quoted below serve mostly as an additional illustration of the views set out in MER 1960 (pp 175-6)

The one innovation in Israeli declared policies was the Knesset (Parliament) resolution adopted in Nov that the Arab refugees should not be returned to Israel. At the same time the offer made in 1949 to take back 100,000 refugees was officially withdrawn. PM Ben-Gurion said that the "insidious" proposal to grant the refugees freedom of choice between compensation and repatriation was designed to destroy Israel. (See pp 234 b-235.)

The PM saw the UAR, headed by President Abdel Nasser, whom he depicted as the "Egyptian dictator" (rodan), as Israel's primary enemy. Recalling the precedents of the slaughter of the Armenians in WWI and of the Jews in WWII, he warned that Israel was faced with a danger of genocide. He claimed to have found the existence of this danger confirmed in Abdel Nasser's admitted "design to destroy Israel" (compare above, Abdel Nasser's views). Israel, Ben-Gurion said, faced the struggle against this danger under conditions of political isolation. While world politics developed into growing interdependence between the nations, Israel did not belong to any group of nations, to any bloc or pact. Thus, Ben-Gurion said, Israel's struggle had two interrelated aspects: maintaining deterrent military strength, and proving the "justice of Israel's cause" to world opinion.

The PM often reiterated Israel's will for peace and expressed his confidence that peace was bound to come. The military deterrent, in preventing war, would pave the way for peace, Ben-Gurion said. Other factors conducive to peace were, in his view, a genuine rapprochement between the world powers and what he described as the "goodwill between the Jews and Arabs in Israel." Ben-Gurion said that the break-up of the UAR might perhaps further the cause of peace, insofar as Abdel Nasser would in fact devote all his efforts to solving Egypt's internal problems as, in the PM's understanding, he had promised to do. (This was apparently a reference to the UAR President's speech of Oct 16, in which he outlined his revolutionary programme and made no mention of Israel or Zionism; see pp 624-5). Ben-Gurion made it clear that he regarded favourably the continued independence of the Arab states in face of Egyptian efforts "to annex" them. He said that Israel's victory in the Sinai campaign of 1956 had decisively helped in preserving their independence and thus, by inducing Abdel Nasser to reconsider his policy, had perhaps helped along the road to peace. (Compare Abdel Nasser's view on Israel's attitude to Arab union.)

Israel continued to advocate direct negotiations with the Arabs, without prior conditions, as a means toward a settlement of the conflict.

The views quoted below include references to the Arab-Israel conflict from the platforms of the Israeli parties issued before the general elections to the Fifth Knesset (Parliament), which took place on Aug 15. These parties held the following positions in the political spectrum, from left to right (number of members elected to the fifth Knesset in brackets; total—120 members: Communists (5), Mapam (9), Ahdut Ha'avodah (8), Mapai (42), National Religious Party (12), Liberal Party (17), Herut Movement (17). The government coalition was formed by the three parties in the centre, headed by Mapai, as well as Poale Agudat Yisrael (4) which had no reference to the conflict in its programme, and 2 Arab parties (4) for which no programme was available. These parties agreed on the government programme, which is also quoted below. The Communists on the one hand and Herut on the other had been in opposition since the inception of the State. The position of the Liberal Party on the conflict was essentially the same as the official position. On the left, Mapam, in calling for an Israel "peace initiative," emphasized the "just rights" of both sides without, however, defining them; (see also p 234 b for the party's attitude on the refugee question). The Communists were the only party demanding for the refugees the freedom of choice between return and compensation, in addition to recognition of the "just national claims of the Arabs." Herut, on the right, was the only party to claim "Israel's right to its historic boundaries," i.e., to lands of the sovereign Arab states.

In its official programme the government said it would take "active initiative for the advancement of peace in the region" and advocated, in advance of a peace agreement, a non-aggression pact and a disarmament agreement between the Arab countries and Israel.

Abdel Nasser Considered Principal Enemy; Israel Seen Threatened with Genocide; Ben-Gurion, May 8: Israel was besieged and several of her neighbours were planning her destruction, Ben-Gurion declared. The "Egyptian dictator" had learned from Hitler and the revelations of the Eichmann trial that "if it was possible to exterminate six million Jews, why should it be impossible to exterminate the two million Jews of Israel?" "We must constantly remind ourselves of the increasing growth of the Arab population and of the UAR armies—guided by Soviet instructors and free supplies of arms," he said. "The danger must be recognized and faced." (IGPO/WNB, May 17-23)

Ben-Gurion, Tel-Aviv, June 20: "We must act according to the cruel reality of the situation in which we are placed... a constant threat to Israel, to her actual physical survival." Ben-Gurion recalled the attempt to destroy the Armenian people in WWI and the Jewish people in WWII. "The rulers of the Arab countries during the Second World War were all adherents of Hitler," he declared. He mentioned the Mufti (Amin al-Husseini, the head of the Arab Higher Committee) as Hitler's collaborator, and added that Hitler's disciples were living in Egypt and were advising the Egyptian dictator in the anti-Jewish and anti-Israel propaganda which he was conducting throughout the world.

"It will be disastrous if we deceive ourselves with the assumption that what happened to the Jews of Europe could not happen to us—unless we are defended by the power of the Israel Defence Forces. The Egyptian dictator makes no secret of his design to destroy Israel... I admit that I am not aware of any moral value greater than to safeguard the survival of the Jewish people..." (IGPO/WNB, June 14-20)

Policy of Israel: Building Military Deterrent; Winning World Support. PM Ben-Gurion, Oct 29: "We are a small people, surrounded by enemies who wish to destroy us... and only a small part of our people, a sixth, is concentrated in our own country. We are a people without relatives, racial or religious... We do not belong to any pact, to any bloc, or to any family. The race closest to us as far as language is concerned—the Arab race—has since the renewal of the State been our greatest enemy."

"...Our only ally in the world is Diaspora Jewry."
"...Today there is a growing interdependence between all regions and all nations... and some kind of world authority is being gradually created which cannot be ignored."

"In view of all these basic facts, it is clear that Israel faces a struggle that has two interrelated aspects:

military and political, and the struggle will take place in two spheres: the small sphere of the ME and the large sphere of the world. In this struggle we shall have to depend on two things: our military strength and the justice of our cause... We would not be able to survive without deterrent military power—which could ensure victory in case of purely military necessity—but we would not hold our own if the justice of our cause were not proved to decent public opinion in the world and to the human conscience..." (IGPO/WNB, Oct 25-31)

Military Strength as Deterrent; Deterrent as Means to Peace; PM Ben-Gurion, June 20: "We do not want to win a war—even if we have complete confidence in victory (and I have such confidence)—for even victory would cost us very dear. We need an army that will serve as a deterrent force and prevent war, for only the prevention of war and an adequate deterrent force will bring about peace—together with other factors, such as the population of the wastelands in the south—the Negev—and the north." (IGPO/WNB, June 14-20)

Belief in Peace to Come; PM Ben-Gurion, July 10: "Fate has commanded us to live together in the Semitic area of the ME, and the people of Israel are striving for a peace covenant between Israel and her Arab neighbours on the basis of equality, independence and liberty for each and every nation in this area." Ben-Gurion expressed his belief that "the day will come when the hand that has been stretched out for peace for such a long time will be accepted in friendship by the Arab people, and thus open a new era in this part of the world." The PM expressed his confidence that Israel's neighbours in Egypt, Lebanon, Syria and Iraq, "who declared war on us 15 years ago, will understand that the good-will that has been developed between the Jews and the Arabs in Israel can also be for their benefit." (IGPO/WNB, July 5-11)

Peace in the ME through World Peace; Ben-Gurion, Sept 29: "And if in the course of this period [15 years] what we call the Cold War is ended—and I hope that it will be ended without the world blowing up—in twenty years Russia will be a democratic country and America will be a welfare state, and then there will also be peace in the ME... The prerequisite for peace is that there should be no external forces helping our enemies. Peace is bound to come—peace in the world guarantees peace here." (Israel Digest, Sept 29)

The Break-up of the UAR and the Prospects for Peace; PM Ben-Gurion, Oct 29: "Perhaps... the Sinai campaign may bring nearer the coming of peace between ourselves and Egypt, no matter how strange this statement may be. Last month a great event happened in the ME: Syria liberated herself from the yoke of Egypt... If... Jordan and Lebanon had been annexed by Egypt... I doubt whether Syria would have been able to regain her freedom. If Jordan and Lebanon have still succeeded in preserving their independence, this is only thanks to our army's... victory in... Sinai..."

"...After the self-liberation of Syria, the Egyptian ruler stated in a very candid and also very wise speech that from now on he would devote all his efforts to solving Egypt's difficult problems, which have not been solved in the course of 5,000 years. If the speech was not delivered only for the purposes of the moment, but is the resolute decision of the Egyptian ruler or rulers, I see a ray of light in the decision. A serious, sincere and consistent approach to the solution of Egypt's internal problems is incompatible with military adventures... They will need peace in the area, and they will be able to obtain assistance in their difficult task from only one of the neighbours, namely Israel."

"Anyone who is well acquainted with... this region... will not build a political policy on the basis of one speech... But we must not ignore even the faintest hope for peace... All our neighbours... may rest assured that there is no resentment in Israel's heart for what they have done to us, if peace and quiet are preserved on the borders from now on... We are helping, to the best of our modest ability, the new countries in Asia and Africa; we shall be prepared to give our neighbours the benefit of our experience in settlement and our technical know-how, and offer all the aid in our power to make the whole region, and any country that makes peace with us, flourish..."

"That is perhaps a dream, but we have a devoted and highly competent army in the Israel Defence Forces, and we may be permitted to dream a dream of peace. Sometimes dreams come true." (IGPO/WNB, Oct 25-31)

Party Platforms. (Parties placed according to strength in Knesset)

Mapai: For peace on basis of respect for integrity and sovereignty of all ME states.

Herut Movement: For efforts at "actual" peace to preclude formal settlement based on "the right of each people to its land."

"The right of the Jewish people to the Land of Israel within its historic boundaries is eternal and unshakable." The return of the Arab refugees would become possible only after "re-unification of the land of Israel."

Liberal Party: For peace on basis of integrity and sovereignty of Israel.

National Religious Party: For neighbourly relations based on the recognition of a sovereign Israel; for efforts to show the world that Israel's desire for peace is "firm and genuine."

Mapam: For "peace initiative"; for direct negotiations without prior conditions; against "pleas of adventurous activism." For constructive initiative to speedily settle the refugee problem; Israel to contribute to the solution of the problem in the framework of a peace settlement safeguarding the "just rights" of both sides.

Ahdut Ha'avodah: For continued efforts at direct peace talks without prior conditions. Against "free choice" between return and compensation for Arab refugees.

Communists: For peace on basis of "right to self-determination" and Israel's recognition of "the just national claims of Palestine Arabs."

For the right of the Arab refugees to "free choice" between return and compensation.

(Platforms to the Fifth Knesset, prepared by the Central Elections Board 1961; party pamphlets)

Government Programme. The new Israel coalition government, presented to the Knesset by PM Ben-Gurion (Mapai) on Nov 2, adopted as its programme the "Basic Principles of Government Programme," submitted to the Knesset by the former government, on Dec 16, 1959. (Israel Government Yearbook, 1961/2)

The passages in the programme relating to the Arab-Israel conflict read as follows:

Para. 8 (Basic Objectives): "Active initiative for the advancement of peace in the region and in the world, and vigilant attention to the security of the State."

Para. 42: "Israel will propose to all the Arab Governments—even before the establishment of permanent peace between us and the ensuring of political, economic and cultural cooperation—that the armistice agreements be replaced by non-aggression pacts and that all political, economic and military acts of hostility shall cease, with effective guarantees by the United Nations authorities."

Para. 43: "Until general disarmament is accepted and carried out throughout the world, the Government of Israel will propose to all Israel's Arab neighbours—Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon—an agreement leading to full disarmament and the abolition of the armed forces in Israel and the above-mentioned Arab States, on condition that constant and unimpeded mutual control of this agreement is assured, and that the borders and sovereignty of all these states shall not be affected." (IGPO, Basic Principles of Government Programme, Dec 16, 1959)

APPENDIX

ARAB VIEWS OF JUDAISM, ZIONISM, ISRAEL

Synopsis. The UAR state-owned radio and press—but not the President—condemned not only Israel and Zionism but also Judaism, which, in the image of European anti-Semitism, they depicted as a satanic force. The notorious "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," fabricated by the Tsarist secret service at the beginning of the century and serving ever since as a corner stone for anti-Semitic literature, was alleged by Cairo spokesmen to constitute the secret protocols of the First Zionist Congress. They were translated in the UAR, as were also what Cairo papers alleged to be "sections from the Talmud," such as that assuring Paradise to the Jew who killed a non-Jew. All this was for dissemination in Africa. Such images, however, were used not only for propaganda purposes abroad but were heard also in broadcasts to the Arab world. The Jews were said to dominate the Western states, especially their economies and information media, having acquired power by devious means. The image of Judaism, Zionism and Israel as inherently immoral found its expression also in such often repeated allegations by UAR and other Arab sources as that Israel was disseminating in Africa copies of a "forged Qur'an" or sending young Israeli girls there to ensnare African leaders (see e.g. pp 202 b-203).

The "Jewish Story" in the "Voice of the Arabs." In March-April, Ahmad Sa'id, the director of the Cairo "Voice of the Arabs" broadcasts, devoted a series of talks to the "Jewish story throughout the world." Following are the major points in these talks as recorded by the BBC Monitoring Service:

The "Depavity of the Jews." Sa'id rejected the claim that Zionism was established to end the persecution of the Jews (V of A, March 4-5 [7]). The Jews, he said, had a traditional solidarity and a hostility to all that was non-Jewish; this went back to rabbinical precepts, which had urged them to disregard all moral considerations in their pursuit of riches (V of A, March 6 [8]). Jews had always been skilled in imposing conditions on the countries and peoples among whom they lived; during wars they welcomed invaders and had themselves caused many wars. (V of A, March 7 [9])

The ancient high priests of Israel (Arabic: ahbab) introduced into Judaism things to arouse the feelings of the Jewish people and prompt them to seek means of dominating the Christians and all other peoples, particularly when the tide of belief in Judaism was halted with the birth of Christ. (V of A, March 9 [11])

The "Immoral Teachings of the Talmud." The Talmud said this to the Children of Israel, Sa'id continued: Every Israelite should endeavour to prevent other nations from becoming sovereigns on earth; the Children of Israel must have absolute authority wherever they may be. Without this they are considered exiles and captives. When the real Messiah comes, the awaited victory will be realized. The Messiah will then accept gifts from all peoples, and reject those of the Christians. The nation of Israel will then be extremely rich, because it will have acquired all the wealth of the world.

The Talmud states, Sa'id continued, that in God's eyes an Israelite is respected more than angels, and that the difference between Israel and other nations is as that between men and animals. According to the Talmud and the high priests of Israel, theft from the foreigner is no theft, but simply a restoration of Israel's property. An Israelite may not make a loan to a foreigner except with interest. Jewish religious authorities said: An Israelite may cheat a customs inspector outside the pale of Israel's laws, and may take a false oath provided he can succeed in his lies. God commanded the Jews to take interest from the Gentile, and not to lend him anything except on this condition; "otherwise, we would be helping him, while it is our duty to harm him." The Israelites meet every week and boast among themselves about the acts of cheating and trickery they have committed. Finally, the Talmud says: The oath taken by an Israelite in his dealings with other peoples is no oath, because he would be making an oath to an animal; and an oath to an animal is no oath.

Sa'id concluded: These are a few of the main points which the high priests introduced into Judaism, revealed in the true Torah. They sought thereby to create a people devoid of moral values, who would rob other peoples of their riches and dominate their fortunes and destinies. (V of A, March 9 [11])

A prominent Shaykh of Al-Azhar attributed similar sayings to the Talmud (Akhir Sa'ah, Jan 11, in an article on alleged forgeries of the Qur'an). It was reported in Cairo that parts of the Talmud were being translated for dissemination in Africa; according to this report the Talmud assured of Paradise whoever killed a non-Jew. (Ahram, Jan 20)

The "Protocols of the Elders of Zion" — "The Basic Zionist Document." When the Zionist movement began at the end of the 19th century, Ahmad Sa'id said, it had not originally looked on Palestine as a national home for the Jews, but had considered any possible territory, such as Uganda, parts of the USA, and the shores of the Black Sea: Palestine had first been mentioned at the Basle conference in 1897. This conference had adopted both public and secret resolutions. The secret ones, however, had leaked out; they were "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion." The Zionists decided to fight virtue and honesty, to present religion and morality as old-fashioned, to encourage the use of alcohol, to destroy moral sense, to dominate the press, to raise prices to meet wage increases, and to encourage foreign countries to fear their neighbours, so as to make them devote their resources to arms. The "Protocols" had produced a great reaction in all parts of the world, including massacres of Jews and Jewish protests. (V of A, March 14 [15, 16])

Zionism and the Power of World Jewry. Ahmad Sa'id said that Herzl, the founder of the Zionist movement, had planned that the Zionists should hold the economic and political reins of the big Powers: statistics showed that the Zionists controlled a great many newspapers and news agencies in Britain, the USA, France and South Africa. (V of A, March 15 [17])

The Jews in France had been able to gain control of the French economy, and consequently of the media of information, including three radio stations, as a result of having pretended to embrace Christianity when threatened with anti-Jewish measures by Louis XII. (V of A, March 16 [18])

In America the Jews became so powerful that as early as 1789 Benjamin Franklin, in one of his speeches, referred to "the Jewish danger." (V of A, March 17 [20])

In Britain there were 450,000 Jews, who despite their small numbers dominated many commercial houses and most of the organizations in direct contact with the public. British Jews, Sa'id said, were more intelligent than Jews elsewhere; they were aware of the British people's dislike of any interference in their affairs, and therefore adopted British nationality. (V of A, March 19 [21])

Sa'id said that Britain had acted as a guardian of world Zionism when it was administering Palestine (V of A, March 26 [28]). He said that Zionist propaganda used to allege that the Arabs had sold their land willingly, because of the high prices offered; in truth the British had collaborated with the Zionists to compel the Arabs to sell the land. (V of A, April 3, 4 [6])

"Zionist Plot For World's Nuclear Annihilation." An article in the [semi-official] Al-Gumhuriyah attributed to Zionism a plot to annihilate the world with nuclear weapons.

The writer cited four "facts" in support of his theory. (1) The aim of world Zionism, the writer alleged, was to sow destruction in the world in order to dominate it. In support of this "fact" the writer purported to quote Winston Churchill from an alleged article on world Jewry in the "Sunday Herald of Feb 8, 1920" saying that this "hrutal movement" intended to establish "a new world society on the basis of tyranny, hate and sucking the blood of the peoples." Also, a Rabbi had allegedly written in the "American monthly Century of Jan 1928" that the Jews were behind all the wars and great revolutions in history, had sown among the gentiles the seeds of anarchy and despair, and were still ruling them. (2-3) The Jews had originated the atomic bomb—the article mentioned Albert Einstein and Robert Oppenheimer—and in order to make sure of the destruction of the world, the Jewish Rosenberg family had handed the atomic secrets to Russia. (4) President Harry Truman had given the order to drop the atomic bombs on Japan in "his capacity as a Zionist agent."

The writer was not quite certain in his mind as to the final consequences of this "Zionist plot." For, he said, if world Zionism, under the protection of the new US administration headed by a President "whose power derives from the spirit of Israel," found the opportunity to launch a world war in the ME by employing an atomic bomb (built in Israel) in order to achieve world domination, this could mean in practice only that Zionism had resolved to annihilate the Western and the Communist worlds and to commit suicide at the same time. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 15, 1960)

Eichmann—An "Old Friend of the Jews." With the opening of the trial of Adolf Eichmann, in Israel, Arab papers made the following points, among others: Al-Gumhuriyah (Cairo): The world wonders about the views of the Arabs on the Eichmann case. Our opinion is that he is an old friend of those who are today trying him. He visited Palestine in 1938 as the guest of the Haganah. He concluded the secret agreement with world Zionism, according to which he undertook to expel the Jews from Germany, while Zionism undertook to receive those Jews on the shores of Palestine. Our belief is that had it not been for the legend of Nazi persecution of the Jews, Israel would not have existed.

VIEWS AND POLICIES

Al-Jihad (Jordan): In the person of Eichmann the Jews are not trying Nazi Germany alone, but also the Christian world. They will try Eichmann on the soil which they usurped 13 years ago with their own crimes. If the Jewish authorities have the right to try Eichmann, the Arabs have more right to try Ben-Gurion and his gang for the massacres they carried out in Palestine. (V of A, April 11 [13])

THE STRUGGLE FOR INTERNATIONAL SUPPORT

ARAB-ISRAEL CONFLICT AT GENERAL DEBATE IN UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY SIXTEENTH SESSION

(September-October)

Synopsis. As in previous UN sessions the debate on the Arab refugee question, which took place in the Special Political Committee in December, (see p 235 ff) was foreshadowed in the speeches of the Arab and Israeli representatives in the course of the general debate in the Assembly plenary at the opening of the session. Most Arab delegates (obviously having in mind the new African members of the UN) strove to stigmatize Israel as an "imperialist" or "colonialist" outgrowth. The Israeli representative, on the other hand, emphasised the need for direct negotiations to settle the conflict.

Only a few of the other speakers at the general debate made any reference to the Arab-Israel conflict.

Arab Speakers: "Israel is the Embodiment of Imperialism." The first of the Arab participants in the General Debate, Lebanon's representative Fu'ad Amoun, said that the tragic death of Dag Hammarskjöld reminded him of the murder of Count Bernadotte, which had put an end to his efforts to secure the implementation of the UN resolutions on Palestine. He called on the UN to act with speed to ensure respect of its resolutions and declared that "the negative attitudes towards the UN, beginning with that relating to Palestine and continuing with those adopted with regard to other problems connected with the ending of colonialism, must be denounced once and for all." (A/PV, 1020, Oct 2)

The representative of Saudi Arabia, Ahmad Shukairy, [in a strongly anti-Western speech], chided the Western powers because to them "divided Berlin is everything, and Jerusalem, the holy, is nothing," although "the Berlin hardships can be found multiplied a thousand times in Palestine." He deplored the plight of "the hundreds of Arabs who are machine-gunned yearly by Israel forces" only because "they attempt to cross to their homes or their fields on the other side of the barbed wire." Addressing himself to the newly-independent nations of Asia and Africa, Shukairy declared that Israel's emergence to independence was not the legitimate establishment of a legitimate state, since Israel was "the embodiment of imperialism, the symbol of colonialism, the fruition of capitalism, and the author... of anti-Semitism." He concluded by denouncing what he termed the United States' "support for this flagrant injustice called Israel" and its treatment of Israel as if it were "the fifth state of the United States." (A/PV, 1022, Oct 3)

The representative of Iraq, Foreign Minister Hashim Jawād, described Israel as "the Trojan horse of imperialism in the ME." He declared that there could be only one way for the removal of "this great injustice": "by removing the source and root of the problem, Israel." (A/PV, 1028, Oct 6)

The UAR delegate, Foreign Minister Mahmūd Fawzi, branding Israel as "the spearhead of imperialism and neo-colonialism," said that "it is on record" that Israel had taken the side of colonialism each time a decision had to be adopted concerning vital problems about Africa — notably Algeria, the Congo, the French nuclear tests and Bizerta. Referring to the issue of freedom of navigation through the Suez Canal, he said that Israel's charges in this respect were "a deviationary argumentation" and that the Security Council resolution of Sept 1 1951 could not be separated from its context and singled out for implementation. (A/PV, 1034, Oct 11)

President Ibrahim Abbud of Sudan referred to the Arab-Israel conflict only to state that the Arab refugees' plight was a constant source of anxiety and unrest in the ME and that any search for a solution to their problem must start from "the basic premise" that they must be given freedom of choice between repatriation and compensation. (A/PV, 1036, Oct 13)

Farid Shahlāwi, the representative of Syria [which was readmitted to the UN on Oct 13, following her secession from the UAR], stated, i.e., that Syria "will never forget martyred Palestine." (A/PV, 1036, Oct 13)

Other Arab representatives who made references to the Arab-Israel dispute in a similar vein were those of Libya (A/PV, 1024, Oct 4), Tunisia (A/PV, 1028, Oct 6), Morocco (A/PV, 1032, Oct 10) and Yemen. (A/PV, 1035, Oct 13)

Israel Call for Negotiations, Non-Aggression Pact. The representative of Israel, Foreign Minister Golda Meir, said with reference to the situation in the ME that the majority of the area's inhabitants were non-Arab, and that Israel enjoyed relations of friendship with all ME countries except those belonging to the Arab League. She further pointed out that the Arab-Israel conflict was only one source of tension in the area, hostility to Israel being "largely a means used by Arab leaders to divert the attention of their peoples from their own unsolved problems and hardships." Referring to Shukairy's speech Mrs Meir observed that she "could not help wondering why he did not worry less about other countries and worry more about the state of affairs in his own."

As regards the Arab population of Israel, Mrs Meir stated that she challenged any Arab country to match the social and economic progress achieved by the Israel Arabs. Border incidents, she said, were only the result of Arab belligerence against Israel. Concluding her statement, Mrs Meir declared that "no Israel-Arab issue can be solved without negotiation; every one of the issues can be solved by negotiation." Pending Arab willingness to conclude a final peace settlement, she proposed that there should be an Arab-Israel non-aggression pact and that a fresh effort be made to bring about regional cooperation in development programmes. (A/PV, 1030, Oct 9)

Shukairy-Meir Exchange. Taking the floor again on Oct 17 under the right of reply, Shukairy said that "the lady from Israel" had challenged the Arabs to find fault with the situation of the Israel Arabs. He quoted from a number of newspapers and books to prove his thesis that "the apartheid of South Africa is being practised by Israel" against the Arab minority. He denied Israel's right to try Eichmann since Israel was "another Eichmann in a State." In conclusion Shukairy made three "concrete proposals": the establishment of a UN commission to implement the UN resolutions on Palestine; the appointment of a UN "committee of inquiry" to ascertain the conditions of the Israel Arabs; and an investigation by the International Atomic Energy Agency of "the true nature of the atomic reactors recently built in Israel." (A/PV, 1038, Oct 17)

In reply to Shukairy, the Israeli FM expressed surprise that "this vicious speech, with its racial incitement... and its outright falsehoods," had been allowed to continue unchecked. [The Assembly President was Mongi Slim of Tunisia]. An equation between Israel and Nazism, she said, could only be made "by someone who is either totally ignorant of what Nazism was, or was indifferent to it." Indeed, she added, Shukairy had once been a member of the Arab Higher Committee whose leader had spent the war years in Germany. As to the suggestion for a commission to investigate the conditions of the Israel Arabs, Mrs Meir declared that she believed "that a rather more urgent investigation would be appropriate in regard to the question of slavery in Saudi Arabia." (A/PV, 1039, Oct 18)

Other Speakers. In passing references to the Arab-Israel conflict the Foreign Ministers of Guinea and Indonesia called on the UN to secure the implementation of its resolutions regarding Palestine (A/PV, 1020, Oct 2; A/PV, 1030, Oct 9). The Foreign Minister of Mali urged the Assembly to find a solution "under which all Arab refugees can recover their land." (A/PV, 1025, Oct 4)

The representative of Niger, on the other hand, expressed the view that "it is through direct and frank negotiations between the Arab States and Israel that a real and peaceful solution can be found." (A/PV, 1032, Oct 10)

ARABS AND ISRAEL AT INTERNATIONAL MEETINGS; CHANGES OF VENUES

International Press Institute Conference in Tel Aviv. At its conference in Tokyo, the Institute decided to hold its next annual conference in May 1961 in Tel Aviv. Consequently the chairman of the journalists association in Lebanon announced his resignation from the Institute and called upon all Lebanese journalists to follow this step; a number of them did so (Hayat, March 25; Kol Israel, May 29 [31]). Pakistan decided not to participate in the conference because it had not recognized Israel, it was reported by Arab sources (R. Baghdad, April 3-IMB, April 6; Jihad, April 6). The conference took place in Israel as scheduled. (Jer. Post, May 28, 30)

World Conference of Chambers of Commerce. Jordan cancelled its participation in the seventh World Conference of Chambers of Commerce, which was to take place in Holland, because of Israel's participation. Jordan similarly cancelled its participation in an archeological conference which convened in London. (Manar, April 5)

Aeronautical Meteorology Conference. The International Civil Aeronautics Organization and the World Meteorological Organization planned a seminar on aeronautical meteorology to be held in Cairo. However, to enable Israel to participate, the conference had to be divided into two parallel meetings. Eighteen nations were to participate in Nicosia, and 18 others in Cairo. (Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, Nov 20)

International Fiscal Union. Iraq asked Indonesia to frustrate Israel's efforts to hold this congress in Israel (Manar, April 28). (The congress took place in Jerusalem in Aug-Sept—Jer. Post, Sept 1)

Israel Membership in GATT. The Arab League Secretary requested the Arab countries to exert efforts to prevent Israel's full membership in GATT (Ruz al-Yusuf, July 31). On Dec 9 the contracting parties in GATT agreed to the full membership of Israel—which had been an associate member since 1959. (Jer. Post, Dec 10)

THE ARAB-ISRAEL CONFLICT AND VARIOUS STATES

Belgium. The Lebanese FM protested to the Belgian ambassador after it received from the embassy a note on Israel's joining the International Atomic Energy Agency. The note reached Lebanon, as a member of the Agency. A Lebanese official source said that the embassy had violated diplomatic usage, which prescribed that no such note must be delivered to an Arab state which did not recognize the existence of a state named Israel. (V of A, April 8-IMB, April 9)

Burma. The Iraqi Ambassador in London, it was reported in Baghdad, had told the Burmese Ambassador there that if Burma wished to maintain good relations with the Arab countries she would have to break all relations with Israel (Akhbar, Baghdad, Dec 31). (For Burma's position on the conflict see: The Arab-Israel Conflict at the Belgrade Conference (below); Israel, International Relations (Burma).)

Cambodia, Thailand. A Cairo paper claimed that Israel had attempted "in her cheap way" to create difficulties for UAR irrigation engineers who had been invited by Cambodia and Thailand, in order that her own engineers might be given the job, but her efforts had failed. (Masa, April 4)

Cyprus. In Feb the British press reported that the UAR Ambassador had made representations to Cyprus over the establishment of Cyprus-Israel diplomatic relations; (see MER 1960, pp 181-2). The UAR embassy in Nicosia issued a statement in which it described the British press report as "completely unfounded." It said that "any widening of the scope of relations between Israel and countries friendly to the UAR, like Cyprus, may harm relations between these friendly countries and the UAR..." but that the UAR preferred "to leave these friendly countries to discover for themselves their attitudes towards it accordingly." The Israel embassy in Nicosia expressed regret at the UAR's "attempt to undermine the friendship existing between Cyprus and Israel." (Jer. Post, Feb 28; see also Ruz al-Yusuf, March 6)

The Lebanese FM claimed that the efforts of the Arabs had prevented the appointment of a Cyprus Ambassador to Israel. (R. Amman, March 9-IMB, March 10)

A Cypriot government delegation, headed by the President of the Chamber of Deputies, visited Lebanon in April. A Lebanese source said the delegation had been invited in accordance with the Arab League programme to stem Israel penetration into Cyprus. (Falastin, April 29)

In May a Cairo source claimed that the Arab ambassadors in Nicosia had convinced Cyprus to cancel its recognition of Israel (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 15). (The report was proved baseless.)

Eastern Europe; Jewish Immigration. The Arab League SG requested the League member-states to instruct their diplomatic representatives in Eastern Europe to intervene against the spread of Jewish immigration to Israel. (Akhbar, April 3)

Ethiopia. Following Ethiopia's de jure recognition of Israel, (see: Israel International Relations), Abd al-Halim

Hassūnab, the Arab League SG, met with the Ethiopian Ambassador in Cairo and expressed the dissatisfaction of the League with Ethiopia's step. The Ambassador told a press conference that he was sure that the recognition of Israel would not harm the existing friendship between his country and the Arab countries. (Ha'aretz, Oct 31)

In Dec Hassūnab urged the League member-states to take a "united and determined" position against Ethiopia for her recognition of Israel. He declared that any country which sided with Israel was "practically conducting an anti-Arab policy" (Ha'aretz, Dec 15). At the same time, it was reported that the Arab countries were contacting the Ethiopian government in an effort to persuade it not to exchange diplomatic representation with Israel, or at least not to expand the existing scope of relations. (Akhbar Sa'ah, Dec 13)

The German Federal Republic. [During the year the GFR maintained her policy of not establishing diplomatic relations with Israel for fear that to do so might provoke the Arab states into recognizing East Germany.] There was continued Arab pressure on Germany not to extend any new aid to Israel. (See MER 1960, pp 180-1; R. Amman, March 15-IMB, March 16)

Willy Brandt, the Mayor of West Berlin, and West German socialist leader, who attended the Congress of the International Union of Local Authorities in Tel Aviv (MER 1960, pp 296-7), became a special object of Arab attention. It was reported that he had been asked by an Arab mission not to visit Israel (Musawwar, Dec 12, 1960). In Feb, 1961, it was reported that the Arab League Secretariat was organizing a propaganda campaign against Brandt, who was said to be raising funds and selling bonds for Israel. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Feb 18)

India. India was persistent in not establishing diplomatic relations with Israel. PM Nehru said that "after Suez... it is utterly difficult to lend any recognition whatsoever now." (Jer. Post, Sept 5)

Clovis Maksūd, Director of the Arab League office in New Delhi, claimed credit for the non-establishment of relations (Hayat, May 20). Later, Maksūd as well as the UAR Ambassador were credited with what was described as India's refusal to permit the mayors of Tel Aviv and Nazareth to visit India (Ahram, Oct 17). The visit of the two mayors took place, however, in Dec. (Jer. Post, Dec 13)

The Arab League asked India not to use Israeli experts as instructors at cooperative villages. The previous year some 20 Indians had received agricultural training in Israel (Falastin, Sept 3). (For India's position on the conflict see also: The Arab Refugees; The Arab-Israel Conflict at the Belgrade Conference.)

Iran. [The Arab countries continued to be concerned with the close relations prevailing between Iran and Israel. A special grievance was the reported export of oil from Iran to Israel, shipped by way of Eilat, Israel's Red Sea port. (No mention of oil exports was made by Israeli or by the available Iranian sources (see also MER 1960, pp 216 ff, 307-8).)]

[The Arab League repeatedly dealt with the question.] The Baghdad Conference of Arab Foreign Ministers adopted a resolution to continue efforts with the Iranian authorities "so that the latter may truly respect relations with the Arab countries when dealing with Israel." (R. Baghdad, Feb 4 [6]). In March, in a note to the Arab League Council, the League SG stated that Zionist penetration and influence in Iran were increasing daily. The Arab states must consider this issue especially since the "Zionist penetration" of Iran had extended into the oil area (V of A, March 20 [22]). At the League Council meeting of March 21 the UAR recommended that all Arab countries break off diplomatic relations with Iran, whose activity defeated the aim of the economic boycott of Israel (R. Cairo, March 27-IMB, March 28). Lebanon, on the other hand, was reported to have recommended signing trade agreements with Iran, to enable the Arabs to supplant Israel in the Iranian markets (Al-Yaum, Beirut, April 16; in Oct it was reported that the Lebanese Ambassador in Tehran had urged such a step—Jaridah, Oct 26). The Council was reported to have passed confidential resolutions on the issue. (Hayat, April 2)

In March it was reported that Iran had made an official promise to Iraq not to permit oil exports to Israel (Zaman, March 7). Throughout the year, however, Arab sources continued to report on what they said was the ever closer cooperation between Iran and Israel and the flow of Iranian oil to Eilat, as well as Arab measures to stop this cooperation. (Akhbar Sa'ah, April 12; Jaridah, Nov 17; Hawadith, Dec 23)

The celebrations in Nov of the 2,500th anniversary of the reign of Cyrus the Great put the Arab League in a quandary, a Cairo source reported. The ambassadors of Lebanon, Jordan, Morocco, and Iraq in Tehran, advised their governments to participate in the celebrations; their absence, they argued, would make it possible for Israel to emphasize her presence. A Cairo paper advised the League to reject the recommendation, while it remarked that Israel would of course attend the celebrations in appreciation of Cyrus returning the Jews to Palestine (Akhbar al-Yaum, Sept 9). After the anniversary, the Arab governments which had diplomatic relations with Iran expressed to Tehran their disapproval of the invitation which had been sent to Israeli ambassadors by the Iranian embassies abroad. In Rome the Arab ambassadors who attended the reception at the Iranian embassy had been surprised and embarrassed to find themselves face to face with the Israeli ambassador. (Ahram, Dec 12)

Italy. The Arab countries, it was reported, had called the attention of the Italian government to the danger inherent in the teaching of Zionist ideology as a basic course in the Israeli institutes in Italy. They warned that the new Jewish generation thus educated would endanger the existence of Italy. (Ahram, July 24)

Malaya. The Arab League called the attention of its member-states to the undesirable outcome which was likely to result from the development of relations between Israel and Malaya. The League suggested that Arab diplomatic efforts be exerted to convince Malaya of the negative aspects of cooperation with Israel (Zaman, Baghdad, Aug 5). Earlier the question had been discussed in the League Council. (Eg. Gaz., March 28)

Nepal. The Arab League office in India recommended that the Arab countries establish diplomatic relations with Nepal without delay, in order to prevent Israel from extending her activity there. (Akhbar al-Yaum, June 3)

Switzerland. The Arab League SG asked the Arab governments to urge the Swiss government to reject the Israeli claim to the Jewish heirless assets in Swiss banks (on which see p 316 b). The director of the Arah information centre in Geneva reportedly told the Swiss FM that to respond to Israel's request would violate Swiss neutrality (Akhir, Sa'ah, July 5). The UAR also intervened with the Swiss government on this issue. (Ahram, Sept 25)

United Kingdom Centurion Tanks. [At the beginning of the year it was revealed that the UK was shipping Centurion tanks to Israel.] Arab commentators saw in this a sign of the continuing "struggle" between the UAR and Britain and of British enmity towards the Arabs in general. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 1; MENA, Feb 2 [4], quoting various newspapers)

In May in an interview with a Times correspondent, Abdel Nasser said that ultimately relations between the UAR and Britain would determine the latter's attitude towards the Arabs and Israel. "We feel," he said, "that you are on the side of Israel" which received from Britain tanks and submarines. But, he said, "Britain is a big power and should be fair and just." (Times, May 15)

Vatican. In March it was reported that the Arab ambassadors who met in Bern to discuss Zionist activities in Europe had decided to send a Palestinian mission to the Pope to counter Zionist attempts to infiltrate the Holy See. (V of A, March 20 [23])

Abd al-Halîq Hassûnah, the Arab League SG, had an audience with the Pope on March 10. He later stated that (as reported by the BBC monitoring service) "the Pope had expressed his support for the just rights of the Palestinian people in their usurped homeland." (R. Baghdad, March 10-IMB, March 12; R. Cairo, March 17-IMB, March 19; R. Damascus, March 20 [22]; no non-Arab sources on this interview were available to the editor.)

BANNING PERSONALITIES

In March it was reported that the Arab states had decided to prohibit the entry of foreign statesmen and scientists who had maintained contacts with or who had participated in conventions in Israel. Some 100 world-famous personalities would not be allowed into Iraq because they had maintained contact with Israel or because they had taken part in the Congress of the International Union of Local Authorities which was held in Tel Aviv in 1960. Among the names mentioned were those of scientists from Denmark, Iran, and the UK, and ministers from Nepal, the Philippines, Singapore, and Chad. (Falastin, March 8; NE Report, March 15; Anwar, March 25)

THE ARAB-ISRAEL CONFLICT AT THE BELGRADE CONFERENCE OF NON-ALIGNED COUNTRIES

(September)

The conference (Sept 1-6) was attended by heads of state or government of 25 countries; including nine Arab and five non-Arab Muslim countries. Israel was not invited. For participants and proceedings, see pp 56 ff.

During the general debate, the Arab-Israeli conflict was mentioned only by Arab representatives and the representative of Guinea (who mentioned, in passing, "Palestine" as one of the unsolved problems). In the closed session in which the resolutions of the conference were framed, however, the question became a major issue and, after a long-drawn debate, an Arab draft resolution condemning Israel as imperialist was defeated.

Arab Speakers Attack Israel as Imperialist Bridgehead. President Abdel Nasser, the first Arab speaker in the open session, as well as the majority of Arab representatives who followed him, mentioned Israel or the "Palestine question" in the context of colonialist issues. Speaking of the dangers of "neo-colonialism," he recalled that the Casablanca Conference had "branded Israel as a bridgehead of neo-colonialism in Africa and a tool of its ambition." He again referred to Israel when speaking of the UN's failure to enforce its resolutions unless "permitted by the policies of the major powers." There could be no better evidence of this situation, he said, than the fate of the resolutions on the Arab refugees, which had remained "no more than scraps of paper because the policy of certain major powers in our area wished to bolster Israel in defiance of every law and justice." (Doc. Belg. pp 48, 50)

These themes were echoed by President Abdudd of Sudan (who used the most extreme language, calling Israel "this cancerous abscess in the Arab world"), PM Sâ'ib Slâm of Lebanon, FM Hâshim Jawîd of Iraq, King Hasan of Morocco and Prince al-Hasan of Yemen, with the difference that they used the term imperialism instead of neo-colonialism. (Doc. Belg. pp 62, 131, 151, 206, 240)

Shaykh Suwayl of Saudi Arabia spoke only of the plight of the Arab refugees.

President Bourguiba of Tunisia, speaking of "decolonisation," urged support for the case of "tortured Arab Palestine" and said that "a hasty decision" had led to an "international denial of justice which has left hundreds of thousands... without a country." "We ought not to be afraid of recommending a just solution," he concluded.

The official text of the speech of PM Ben Khedda of Algeria (published after the conclusion of the conference) did not have any reference to the Israel question (Doc. Belg. pp 234-37). However, it was reported that at the last moment, after a conversation with Abdel Nasser, he had added to his prepared speech a short passage on the rights of the Arab refugees and support for the national movement of Palestinian Arabs. (Ma'ariv, Sept 5)

[None of these speakers proffered any concrete solution, but it was clear by implication that Israel as a "colonialist bridgehead" must be liquidated like colonialism in general.]

Arab Draft Resolution Calls Israel Neo-Colonialist; UAR-Iraqi Differences. The Arab draft resolution was first presented by a UAR representative at a drafting sub-committee headed by Mahmûd Fawî, the UAR Foreign Minister. It condemned Israel as an example of neo-colonialism, and urged the implementation of the UN resolutions by forcing Israel back behind the lines of the 1947 partition plan and by the return of the Arab refugees. The Iraqi delegate, however, demanded that the UN resolution on the partition of Palestine not be mentioned and that the resolution be couched in general terms, stressing the need to solve the Palestine question in accordance with international law and the UN Charter. The UAR insisted, however, and the draft was not changed. (R. Baghdad, Sept 5-IMB, Sept 6; R. Baghdad, Sept 6 [8]; Ma'ariv, Sept 6)

The Debate; Afro-Asians, Yugoslavia Oppose Arab Draft. According to an Israeli correspondent in Belgrade, the debate on the Israel question developed as follows: When the committee, after a lengthy debate, failed to reach agreement it referred the issue to the plenary of the foreign ministers. As their discussion also remained inconclusive, they referred the issue to the heads of state. The latter debated the issue twice, in the closed sessions of Sept 4 and 5.

In the session on Sept 4, the Arab resolution was opposed by Emperor Haile Selassie, King Mahendra of Nepal, President Tito of Yugoslavia, President Nkrumah of Ghana, President Makarios of Cyprus, PM Nehru of India, and PM U Nu of Burma. It was suggested that Tito's attitude was influenced by Abdel Nasser's opposition to a proposal by Tito to call for the recognition of the German Democratic Republic (see p 68 a). No agreement was reached at this session. (Ma'ariv, Sept 5, 6)

On Sept 5 the heads of state again sat in closed session for over eight hours—from 5.00 p.m. to 1.15 a.m.—to frame finally and approve the resolutions (Doc. Belg. p 14). Half of this time, it was reported, was taken up by the debate on the Israel question. The following details, reported by a Ma'ariv correspondent, were essentially substantiated by Arab and Western sources.

Abdel Nasser again described Israel's "imperialist" activities in Africa and urged the conference to condemn Israel for "neo-colonialism." He was followed by Nehru, who now reportedly agreed with "Abdel Nasser's theory that Israel is a threat to the Arabs in the ME," and that "everybody is aware of Israel's imperialist role in Africa." He added, however, it was further reported, that, in line with his views that the conference should not deal with local quarrels (compare p 65 a), he refused to support any documents that contained a condemnation of Israel. Nehru explained that "others are responsible too, but we are not condemning them." He advised the conference to be "practical" and to call upon Israel to implement the UN resolution on the Arab refugees.

PM Mrs Bandaranaike of Ceylon, who had earlier supported the Arabs, now seconded Nehru. Nepal and Cambodia defended Israel, but strongest was U Nu's opposition. He reportedly said that he had hesitated whether to accept the invitation to Belgrade because he knew that the Arabs would raise the Israel question. "I am a friend of the Arabs—but also a friend of Israel," he was quoted to have said, adding that Burma had proved that friendship with both sides was possible. "But your conduct here has shocked me. Each and every one of the Arab leaders has exploited Israel's absence from the conference to ascribe deeds to her which I know she has not committed. If I support your proposal, what will Israel think of my friendship, and what will you think of me? Both sides will accuse me of hypocrisy—and both sides will be right." U Nu concluded that he came to the conference to help relieve world tension and not to intensify the quarrel in the ME.

Dr. Nkrumah, who spoke after U Nu, reportedly declared that he was familiar with Israel's imperialist role from his own experience. He suggested, however, that Abdel Nasser's original proposal be worded in milder language. Tito reportedly supported Nkrumah's proposal and said that "after all Israel joined the imperialists in the Suez war." Mobido Keita also supported Nkrumah's suggestion (according to Beirut Radio, Keita described Israel as a "robber state.") Ethiopia, Cyprus, Indonesia and Afghanistan did not take part in the discussion. (Ma'ariv, Sept 5, 6, 7; see also NYHT, Sept 12)

The Lebanese Prime Minister, Beirut Radio reported, warned the Asian countries of the "Israeli danger" and said that they would come to realize it, as the African nations had already done. He told Burma and Ceylon that countries doing business with Israel would one day, like Ghana, have to take steps to prevent Israel's imperialist penetration. (R. Beirut, Sept 6-IMB, Sept 7)

U Nu "Ultimatum" Defeats Arab Resolution. At this point, again according to Ma'ariv, PM U Nu presented an ultimatum: if the proposals of Abdel Nasser or Nkrumah were accepted, he declared, "I will not be party to the final communique and I will publicly dissociate myself from this conference." Nehru again intervened to say that a condemnation of Israel had nothing to do with the aims of the conference and suggested that the issue be taken off the agenda. Abdel Nasser asked for a short adjournment, after which he declared that, owing to the opposition to his proposal, he was ready to withdraw it, but suggested that Israel be called upon to comply with UN resolutions, to which the participants agreed. (Ma'ariv, Sept 7; Jer. Post, Sept 8. NYHT, Sept 12)

The Resolution. The result was the passage in the final resolutions (Part II section 10) which declared: "The participants in the Conference condemn the imperialist policies pursued in the ME, and declare their support for the full restoration of all the rights of the Arab people of Palestine in conformity with the Charter and resolutions of the United Nations." (Doc. Belg. p 258)

UAR Reactions: No Defeat. [The UAR elaborated the theme that the Arabs had suffered no defeat over the Israel question.] Cairo Radio explained that "as everyone knows, Arab representatives submit strong draft resolutions to obtain eventually resolutions against Israel." Referring to reports of U Nu's ultimatum and other opposition to Abdel Nasser's proposal, the commentary said there had been "no threats and no objections," but "free discussion," and that the Arabs had received more support than Israel, despite the fact that some states received "a high price" from Israel in the form of grants and services. (R. Cairo in Hebrew, Sept 8 [12])

Arab Disappointment. In Iraq there was little comment on the Israel question. Ath-Thawrah wrote that the Arabs had expected more than a resolution merely calling for compliance with UN resolutions. (Thawrah, Sept 8)

The [pro-Western] Al-Jaridah, Beirut, said that it was the Arabs' own fault that the Israel question was only a secondary issue at Belgrade, while at former conferences it had occupied a prominent position, and it seemed they would never recover from this setback. "Palestine," the paper concluded, was "the price the Arab countries paid for non-alignment, international conferences and summit talks." (Jaridah, Sept 12)

The Jordanian press criticized the "shameful attitude" of India, Burma, Ceylon, Nepal and Congo in defending Israel (Falastin, Sept 8). In an exceptionally severe criticism of India's attitude, Nehru was alleged to have persuaded Ceylon, Burma and Congo to support him in such a way that the Arab representatives thought "Ben-Gurion was facing them." The paper attacked Krishna Menon as the originator of India's pro-Israel attitude, and alleged that while living in the US he was paid by Jewish organizations and lived in conditions of luxury and moral degeneration. (Jihad, Sept 20)

An "Israel Incident." On Sept 2, Yugoslav security officers suddenly confiscated the press cards earlier granted to Israel journalists attending the conference. They gave no reason, but an Israeli source reported that the UAR had exerted pressure on them to bar the Israelis. Before the journalists had time to complain, the Yugoslav Foreign Minister, who happened to arrive on the scene, instructed the officers to return the cards with apologies. (Ma'ariv, Sept 3) -

"Neutralists Neutral in Arab-Israel Conflict; Recognize Israel's Role." A New York Herald Tribune correspondent, whose account of the proceedings generally coincided with the above, noted "the failure of the largely Afro-Asian gathering to deliver to... Abdel Nasser a crucial political weapon"—an implied challenge to Israel's existence—which he had reportedly intended to use in a "major-diplomatic offensive" against Israel at the forthcoming UN General Assembly. The UAR had thus suffered a "severe setback." The 4,000-word resolutions included only one "vague sentence" on the Palestine question, while the conference "would not spell out whether Israel fell under its blanket condemnation of 'imperialist policies.'" The condemnation of imperialism in the ME could apply equally to the powers, or even to "the UAR's periodical display of belligerence towards its neighbours." The reference to the UN resolutions was similarly vague; they also spoke of ending the Arab-Israel dispute while the Arabs were bent on Israel's destruction.

Abdel Nasser had intended to stamp Israel's technical assistance to the Afro-Asian countries as "neo-imperialism," but some observers tended to regard the attitude of the non-Arab delegations as a "quiet recognition... that Israel, in fact, played an important role in liquidating imperialism from the ME, and in rendering significant assistance to new countries of Asia and Africa." "The Belgrade results pointed to a widespread desire among the neutralists to remain neutral in the Arab-Israel dispute," the correspondent concluded. (NYHT, Sept 12)

THE UNITED STATES AND THE ARAB-ISRAEL CONFLICT

SYNOPSIS

While cold war considerations continued to play an important part in US policy on the Arab-Israel conflict, (compare MER 1960, p 103), public policy statements seemed to emphasize such considerations less than in previous years, when policy statements still appeared under reports on the Eisenhower doctrine.

In practice, too, relations between the US and the UAR—Israel's principal antagonist—were influenced more by the UAR involvement in international issues than by the US attitude to the Arab-Israel conflict. Thus, their relations were at low ebb at the beginning of the year over the Congo dispute; they improved in midyear with President Kennedy's opening a correspondence with President Abdel Nasser and other Arab leaders, with the occurrence of a dispute between the UAR and the USSR, and with the adoption by the UAR of a moderate attitude at the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries.

After the election of John F. Kennedy to the Presidency of the US, and particularly, after his inauguration, the Arab countries and Israel were apprehensive of US initiative in trying to settle the Arab-Israel conflict. During the election campaign in 1960, Kennedy had pledged an effort in this field (see MER 1960, pp 108-9), and the US also made it clear that she wished to probe—by means of the Palestine Conciliation Commission (PCC)—the possibilities of a solution to the refugee problem. (For details see: The Arab Refugees.)

The Arab countries and Israel both apparently feared that they might be pressed to accept solutions which they considered disadvantageous. Arab spokesmen, especially from the UAR, warned that any US attempt to impose a settlement "at the expense of the Palestinian people" was tantamount to an alliance with Zionism and to enmity with the Arab nation, and they emphasized that any pressure would be in vain. PM Ben-Gurion of Israel also advised President Kennedy against attempting to impose a settlement. Israel, according to unconfirmed reports, suggested to the US a policy of encouraging non-Nasser forces in the Arab world, of assistance in maintaining the balance of power between Israel and the UAR so that the current relative tranquillity might continue and of resettling the Arab refugees in the Arab countries, with international aid. (US Zionist spokesmen, on the other hand, as well as Sen. Keating (Rep.-N.Y.), urged the President to take the initiative for a settlement.) President Kennedy and Ben-Gurion discussed the refugee question at an informal meeting in New York, in May.

President Kennedy expressed the US attitude to the conflict in letters sent to six Arab heads of state in May. Referring to Arab-American friendship and mutual respect, the President made the following principal points: The US was willing to assist ME countries desirous of maintaining their independence, progress and peace; the US was ready to contribute to the search for solutions to ME disputes; the US was willing to continue economic aid; the relative tranquillity in the area should be preserved; there was no easy solution to the Arab-Israel conflict, but it could be found, and the US was willing to share in "the labours and burdens" which the search for a solution entailed; in particular the US was ready to assist in resolving the questions of the Jordan waters and the Arab refugees; as to the latter, the US position was firmly based on the UN resolutions and it would fully back the activities of the PCC and the programme it might indicate.

Of the Arab replies to this letter, only that of President Abdel Nasser was made public (and this a year later). Abdel Nasser reiterated his views of Israel as an ever-present danger to the Arab nation, an aggressor, and a tool of imperialism. He described the US attitude to the Arab-Israel conflict as a major—though by no means the only—factor in the deterioration of Egyptian-US relations over the years. He said that US policy on the ME was influenced by US internal politics and suggested that the time had come for the US to view developments in the area with a "purely American outlook." Abdel Nasser emphasized that his statements on the conflict were not meant for home consumption.

By the time these letters were exchanged, the apprehension in the area as to American intentions had apparently begun to subside; there were indications that both the Arabs and Israel now regarded the new Administration's approach to the area with more confidence and—in some cases—even with favour. The question of possible PCC recommendations remained. However, a PCC special representative, appointed to explore means of solving the refugee problem, found that no progress could be made apart from or in advance of an overall settlement; the Palestine refugees and their need for UN assistance would remain for at least a decade. In the discussion of the refugee question at the UN General Assembly, the US attitude proved in the end material in maintaining the political status quo in face of attempts by the Arab states and Israel to change it in their favour (see: The Arab Refugees).

The US stand on the Arab boycott of Israel and freedom of navigation in the Suez Canal gave rise to an amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act, 1962. The anti-discriminatory amendment replaced the more-strongly worded "Freedom of the Seas Amendment," or "Douglas Amendment," to the Mutual Security Act for 1961. The stand of the Administration on the question was that coercive tactics should be avoided: while the US supported the principles of freedom of navigation and trade, any attempt to link US aid to these questions would only help to intensify the restrictions while playing into the hand of the Communists by exacerbating ME tensions. The Administration further pointed out that the boycott was an outgrowth of the basic Arab-Israel conflict and, in this sense, no different from the question of the "plight of the refugees." Again, as in 1960, Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.), Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, was the chief opponent to the amendment in the Senate, on the grounds, among others, that it was offensive to the Arab world.

As for the utilization of the Jordan waters, one of the potentially most explosive problems between the Arab countries and Israel, there were indications that the US viewed favourably the implementation of projects—by both Israel and Jordan—within the framework of the Johnston plan.

The US rejected an Israeli bid for anti-aircraft missiles. (The US was the only Western country making such missiles.) The US was unwilling, as was later officially explained, to bear responsibility for setting off an even more dangerous form of the arms race between the Arab countries and Israel and to open opportunities for new Soviet moves in the area.

The US continued to support, politically and financially, the UN and its instruments in the conflict, and in particular UNTSO, UNEF and UNRWA. In general, an official statement said that the US was convinced of the need for quiet diplomacy in dealing with a complex issue where deep emotions were involved.

ARABS AND ISRAEL APPREHENSIVE OF US INITIATIVE

UAR: Arabs At War with Israel; US Pressure Useless. On Jan 11 a member of the UAR National Assembly asked the Minister of Foreign Affairs a question "on the measures to be taken by the UAR Government in respect of the US President-elect's promise to bring pressure to bear on the Arabs to come to terms on the Palestinian issue and open the Suez Canal to Israel vessels." Hussein Dhu al-Fiqar Sabri, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, replied that apparently the American leader overlooked the fact that the Arab peoples considered themselves at war with Israel, and were in constant readiness to meet all eventualities inherent in the aggressive "Zionist bastion." The President-elect had likewise forgotten that survival was for the fittest, not for the parasite, which was born to die.

Sabri went on: "I would like to make it plain that the efforts the US [may] contemplate making in the light of Mr. Kennedy's pledge are not an innovation and the pressure the American leader may think he can bring to bear on the Arabs has already been tried by his predecessors but to no avail." (Eg. Gaz., Jan 12)

"Arab Anxiety." On Jan 14, a week before President Kennedy's inauguration, Al-Hayati reported that "an atmosphere of anxiety and tension" marked Arab-American relations. The paper said "certain American personalities" had advised the Arab governments to establish contacts with the new administration—a suitable occasion would be the inauguration ceremony in Washington. Some Arab foreign ministers tended to accept the idea, others doubted its utility. The paper also reported that in inter-Arab consultations, it was decided to adopt a moderate attitude until President Kennedy's policy became apparent. (Hayat, Jan 14)

Arabs Denounce Alleged US Plan. At the end of Feb a Cairo weekly published news of an alleged American plan "bearing the name of Vice-President Lyndon Johnson" for the solution of the Palestine question. The plan was said to envisage: the amending of the old UN partition plan so as to open an Arab corridor linking Sinai with Jordan, and granting access to Israel's port of Eilat to both Jordan and the UAR; forming an international fund for the rehabilitation of the refugees to which the US would contribute $500m.; returning some of the refugees to Israel; internationalizing both parts of Jerusalem; amending the Johnston plan for the distribution of the Jordan waters to accommodate Arab demands; suspending immigration to Israel for 10 years; a US guarantee for the new borders; opening the Suez Canal to Israeli ships and non-military cargo. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Feb 27)

On March 11 Amman Radio denounced the alleged plan and said that the Arabs rejected any plan which recognized the right of the Jews in any part of Palestine. (R. Amman, March 11-IMB, March 12)

A MENA comment said that "any attempt by America to impose a settlement of the Palestine question at the expense of the Palestinian people means that Kennedy's Government has begun to involve itself in an open alliance with world Zionism, and in an open enmity with the Arab nation." The commentator continued: "This plan is no more than a redrafting of previous American plans, all of which strive to impose US trusteeship on the Middle East, and to subject the area to the ambitions of Zionism, which is allied with imperialism." (MENA, March 13 [15]; for similar comments see V of A, March 13, 15-IMB, March 14, 16; Sharq, Baghdad, March 15; Jihad, March 13-15; Akhbar, Baghdad, March 16; Gumhuriyah, March 16)

UAR: Future Relations with US in Balance. Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram [and generally considered a spokesman of President Abdel Nasser], in an article on "The Future Between the UAR and Kennedy," said that the coming weeks would show whether the US and UAR would find a way to understanding or were heading for a new struggle; Cairo was still trying to avoid a clash.

Amongst other issues between the two countries, such as the Congo conflict and a rumoured Mediterranean anti-UAR pact, Haykal referred to the Arab-Israel conflict. Referring to Kennedy's election statements, the writer said that the UAR did not hold the President responsible for the statements of the candidate. Haykal said that Ben-Gurion had sent a message to the Secretary of State requesting that first Abdel Nasser, and then the UAR, be got rid of. [For report on an Israeli message, see below.] Following this message, Haykal wrote, Kennedy at a press conference personally announced $25m. aid to Israel [on March 15, see also below]. The article also mentioned other instances purporting to show US support for Israel. (Ahram, March 24)

UAR Regards Neutral US Attitude to Arab-Israel Conflict as Unneutral. Coincidentally with the Haykal article, C.L. Sulzberger, of The New York Times, concluded, after meeting Abdel Nasser, that Arab-US relations would never be entirely friendly until a solution was found for the Arab-Israel conflict. Israel was the cardinal question for Abdel Nasser who believed that the US was prejudiced against the Arabs. Israel threatened the UAR, Abdel Nasser claimed; any country that helped Israel in the slightest way was therefore regarded as unfriendly. Consequently, "the mere fact... that Washington affects a neutral attitude is seen here as unneutral." (NYT, March 29)

Arab Reactions to US Loan to Israel. On March 15 President Kennedy at his press conference announced a $25m. loan to Israel (USIS, March 16; see also p 320 h). [This statement aroused angry Arab reactions such as Haykal's, quoted above.]

The Cairo Al-Gumhuriyah said the loan was an act of provocation, an indication that the US was disregarding the Arabs' rights, future and security. The Arabs had become hostile to America because they considered any support for Israel as an act of hostility directed against themselves (Gumhuriyah, March 16). Cairo Radio said the loan was a pay-off by President Kennedy for American-Jewish support in the elections. (R. Cairo, March 17-IMB, March 19)

At the same time Cairo sources claimed that the loan would be of no help to Israel because of her ultimate insolvency. (R. Cairo, March 16-IMB, March 17; Akhbar Sa'ah, March 22)

Damascus Radio attacked President Kennedy for having "forgotten that he is a human being, that he is an American, that he is a Christian, that he is a Catholic who belongs to the Pope's faith, and that he has made a loan available to the gangster state called Israel... Why does Kennedy not follow [in] the steps of the Pope, his spiritual leader, and support the Arab rights against the evil of the Jews?" (The Arab League SG reportedly said, after his reception by the Pope, that the Pope had expressed his support for "the just rights of the Palestine people in their usurped homeland.") (R. Damascus, March 20 [22])

A [pro-UAR] Beirut weekly claimed that Arab trade unions had taken a secret decision to boycott American ships and aircraft. (Kul Shay', April 1)

On March 30, Amir Talal, Minister of Finance of Saudi Arabia, told the press in Cairo that his country would not renew the Dhahran air base agreement because the US intended to continue aid to Israel. (Jer. Post, March 31; Siyasah, Beirut, April 2) [In fact the Dhahran issue was connected with different questions. See p 428]

Israel Against Imposing Settlement on ME. Israel's reservations regarding a possible US initiative appeared towards the end of March.

Replying to a journalist's question, PM Ben-Gurion advised President Kennedy against attempting to impose a ME settlement upon Israel and the Arab States. "One must understand that a settlement cannot be imposed by force." (Yedioth Aharonoth, March 31)

At the same time, according to Ha'aretz, an official note was submitted by Avraham Harman, Israel Ambassador to the U.S., to Secretary of State Dean Rusk. The note reportedly urged the administration to refrain from dramatic moves in the ME and from taking premature initiatives but rather to make every effort to consolidate the relative stability which prevailed in the region.

The Jerusalem Post reported that the note made the following points: a) The Arab League conference in Baghdad during Feb (pp 103 ff) had vindicated the policy of encouraging non-Nasser forces in the Arab world and strengthened Jordan's position through its closer ties with Iraq. b) To assure the present relative tranquillity in Arab-Israel relations, the balance of power between Israel and the UAR should be maintained with the active assistance of the U.S. c) The major outstanding problem, that of the Arab refugees, should be solved through their resettlement in Arab countries with the aid of an international programme in which Israel would be prepared to participate.

Ha'aretz noted that this was practically the opposite approach to that of the American-Jewish community which had urged the President to take the initiative. (US Zionist leaders had been urging the President to make efforts to bring peace to the ME. See e.g. NYT, Feb 7; Eg. Gaz., March 12, 21. So did Senator Keating (Rep.-N.Y.) while speaking at a Jewish National Fund convention.—NYT, Feb 17)

An Israel FM spokesman denied that any note had been sent to Secretary of State Dean Rusk by FM Golda Meir. (Ha'aretz, March 29; Jer. Post, March 30)

FREEDOM OF NAVIGATION AND THE ARAB BOYCOTT

(The Douglas Amendment)
(February-August)

Senator Keating's Move. On March 15, Senator Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) released texts of an exchange of correspondence with the State Department on the implementation of the so-called Freedom of the Seas Amendment (or the Douglas Amendment) to the Mutual Security Appropriation Act (Section 2 F) which he had cosponsored in the Senate the previous year (MER 1960, p 106). Keating told the press that he was "disappointed" with what he regarded as the State Department's lack of effective action to carry out the intention of the amendment.

Keating's letter, dated Feb 2, recalled that the amendment had urged that "the principles of freedom of navigation and economic cooperation between nations be applied in any future negotiations for the use of American Mutual Security funds. It was supported at that time by President Kennedy." Boycotts, blockades and restrictions on the use of international waterways were particularly destructive of economic growth and progress among free nations, Keating wrote. (USIS, March 16)

State Department: Implementation of Amendment Would Prove Harmful. On Feb 24, John S. Hogland, 2nd Acting Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations in the State Department, wrote to Keating in reply that the "US has consistently supported the principle of freedom of transit through the Suez Canal for all nations, including Israel." Accordingly, "our diplomatic posts throughout the world were promptly informed of the details of the new amendment and were specifically reminded of the Department's long-standing policy in favour of freedom of navigation. They were reminded that efforts should continue to be made... to make clear the will of the American government... Special instructions in the same sense sent to our missions in the Near East."

Hogland continued: "Based on views from our field posts, the Department has so far concluded that efforts to link Mutual Security Act and P.L.480 assistance directly to the Suez transit question would only intensify the very trade and transit restrictions... while at the same time playing into the hands of the Communists by exacerbating ME tensions." Hogland added that "we fully share your concern that every effort should be made to ensure that there will be no discrimination to the use of the Suez Canal for Israeli commerce... It remains our view, unanimously supported by the field posts, that avoidance of coercive tactics in such area disputes is more likely to produce an atmosphere conducive to settlement of the basic problem than would unilateral economic pressure by the U.S." Hogland concluded that the UN SG had sought a solution to the Suez transit problem and the US government was giving him the fullest support. The government believed that, through such endeavours on the part of the international community, the problem—in itself an outgrowth of the basic Arab-Israel conflict—could eventually be removed. (USIS, March 16)

State Department Minimizes Scope of Boycott: Links Boycott to Refugee Question. During the spring months, the State legislatures of New York and California adopted resolutions asking the Department of State to move against the Arab boycott; Senator Keating (R-N.Y.) transmitted the New York resolution to the Department.

In reply, in a letter to Keating dated May 4, Brooks Hays, Assistant Secretary of State, speaking for the Secretary of State, expressed strong disapproval of the boycott. Hays then explained that the Arab boycott was an outgrowth of the Arab-Israel conflict. He wrote: "As sovereign states, the Arab states assert that they are entitled to establish rules and regulations that proscribe dealings with any individuals or firms in accordance with what they deem to be in the interests of their national security. In the absence of a definite settlement between Israel and the Arab states, including a settlement of the plight of the Arab refugees, the boycott and similar problems continue to manifest themselves."

Hays further said that the New York resolution had erroneously implied that the US government acquiesced in the boycott and also had "portrayed the boycott as more discriminatory than it actually is." Only 25 American ships had been blacklisted for trading with Israel and the blacklist included only vessels carrying war material to Israel, Jewish immigrants or Israel products, and only to firms which operate in Israel or have a connection with Israel commerce. The State Department asserted that boycott regulations are not applied against persons or companies because they are Jewish but rather because they do business with Israel. The Department denied that any department or agency of the US government had sanctioned ship charters barring American flag vessels touching at Israel ports from carrying gifts of surplus American agricultural commodities.

Hays noted that "the Israel Government has included a clause in its Title 1, Public Law 480, cargo charter contracts which forbids the transporting vessels to sail in Arab waters or call at Arab ports prior to discharge."

Near East Report noted that this clause was a "defensive measure, designed to protect cargo destined for Israel from seizure because any cargo destined for Israel is seized if it is found in an Arab port. On the other hand, the provision inserted in the UAR contract dealing with surplus food shipments is an aggressive blacklisting measure directed against shipowners who do business with Israel, and who are barred from the contract if they do. It provides: Wheat must not be shipped on—(1) vessels blacklisted by the Egyptian Government; (2) any vessels passing through Israeli territorial waters or ports." (NE Report, May 15)

The Israel Minister in Washington protested to the State Department in regard to the above letter which, The Jerusalem Post noted, "had sought to link the Arab blockade and boycott of Israel with the settlement of the Arab refugee problem." The State Department reportedly replied that the Hays letter did not represent any modification of the US disapproval of the Arab boycott but merely had reviewed its actual effect on American firms. (Jer. Post, May 11)

US Stand Re-affirmed. In a letter dated June 2, Assistant Secretary of State Hays assured Representative Seymour Halpern (R-N.Y.) that "every effort should be made to facilitate progress towards a resolution of the boycott problem and to eliminate discrimination in the use of international waterways." (NE Report, June 15)

The "Douglas Amendment" in Congress. [The US Congress included in the preamble to the Foreign Assistance Act for fiscal year 1962 a paragraph stating that, in the administration of this act, the principle of non-discrimination between recipient countries should be supported. This paragraph replaced the "Freedom of the Seas Amendment" or "Douglas amendment" to the Mutual Security Act for 1961 which was rather more strongly worded; see MER 1960, p 106.]

The Administration included a statement in the bill declaring the support of Congress for the principles of international economic cooperation, freedom of navigation and non-discrimination of all private persons. (Near East Report said the Administration hoped to avoid a repetition of the bitter floor debate which marked the adoption of the 1960 statement in the Senate.) (For sources, see below.)

Senator Fulbright Opposes Statement on Foreign Relations. Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.), Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, objected in the Committee on June 12 to the inclusion of the amendment. He said that the statement "expresses a principle we agreed on" but it was not relevant to the Foreign Assistance Act, and it had "an historical significance that is offensive to the Arab world." If it were to remain in the act, the Senator added, there ought to be a further statement to the effect that "until the Israel government—or language that would indicate the same—complies with the UN resolution on refugees, we could deny them tax exemption on contributions, or something like that." In response to his question, two administration witnesses, ICA Director Henry Labouisse and Assistant Secretary of State Phillips Talbot, agreed to the elimination of the phrases in question. There was also opposition to other parts of the Administration's statement of policy. The Committee then tentatively decided to eliminate the entire statement.

Senators Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) and Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) appealed to the Committee members to reconsider their position. Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.) moved to restore the anti-discriminatory paragraph. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) suggested that the entire preamble might be reinstated. It was reported that the Department of State preferred that course to a fight on the issue on the Senate floor. The Committee agreed.

On July 24, when the Committee took final action, Sen. Fulbright and Sen. Bourke B. Hickenlooper (R-Iowa) renewed their opposition. Their motion to delete the sentences linking aid to freedom of passage etc. was defeated 8 to 6. Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vermont) moved to have the paragraph also refer to the press, information and religion. The Committee agreed.

Sen. Fulbright then proposed an additional amendment, which provided that the principles should be supported in such a way as to avoid taking sides between countries having friendly relations with the US.

The House Committee on Foreign Relations had meanwhile combined the 1960 "Douglas amendment" and the Morse-Javits amendment to the 1959 Foreign Aid bill into a strongly worded anti-discrimination statement. (For sources, see below.)

Text of Statement. The following final draft of the statement was agreed on by both the Senate and the House committee: "In addition, the Congress declares that it is the policy of the US to support the principles of increased economic cooperation and trade among countries, freedom of the press, information, and religion, freedom of navigation in international waterways, and recognition of the right of all private persons to travel and pursue their lawful activities without discrimination as to race or religion. In the administration of all parts of this Act, these principles shall be supported in such a way in our relations with countries friendly to the US which are in controversy with each other as to promote an adjudication of the issues involved by means of international law procedures available to the parties."

[The first sentence corresponded to the paragraph proposed by the Administration, with the words "freedom of the press, information and religion" added. The second sentence originated with the Fulbright amendment but excluded the insertion in this amendment after the words "in such a way" of the phrase "as to avoid taking sides in any controversy between countries..." (NE Report, Aug 1, Sept 1)]

THE BEN-GURION VISIT TO THE US AND THE REFUGEE QUESTION

(May-June)

The refugee question was one of the issues discussed by President Kennedy and PM Ben-Gurion in their informal meeting in New York on May 30 (for details of the visit and topics reportedly discussed see pp 319-20).

Ben-Gurion started at a press conference before leaving the US that he had found "a large measure of agreement" with the President on the refugee problem. Ben-Gurion did not elaborate except to say that Kennedy had offered "a suggestion that might be a solution" of the problem if the Arab leaders accepted it. (NYT, June 2)

Press Reports of the Kennedy "Suggestion." According to press reports, the US plan as put by Kennedy to Ben-Gurion provided for the solution of the problem by simultaneous action in three directions: repatriation to Israel (10 per cent of all the refugees, according to Newsweek; 25 per cent according to Le Monde); emigration to Western countries, including Latin America and the US; and resettlement in Arab countries with US and UN aid. Ben-Gurion was reported to have taken the position that Israel would be willing to take back "perhaps 50,000 or so," but only as part of an overall settlement in which the Arab countries would recognize Israel's sovereignty, terminate the Suez Canal blockade and reach an agreement on the River Jordan. The US initiative was said to have been motivated primarily by mounting resentment in Congress at the Administration's yearly requests for appropriations for the upkeep of the refugees with no apparent relief in prospect. (Newsweek, June 26; Time, July 7; Monde, June 11; Ha'aretz, June 4)

State Department Denial. On June 2, a State Department spokesman said that no specific solution had been discussed. "In the brief informal meeting, President Kennedy raised with Mr. Ben-Gurion the subject of the tragic plight of the Arab refugees. He stressed the importance of Israel cooperating with such efforts as may be initiated by the Palestine Conciliation Commission" (PCC). Since the Commission's work had not yet taken precise form, the spokesman continued, and "since responsibility lies with the parties concerned as they may be assisted by the UN Commission, the question of an understanding between the President and the Prime Minister as to a specific solution did not arise." (Jer. Post, June 4)

A Tel Aviv paper wrote that political observers assumed that the State Department had been dissatisfied with Ben-Gurion's reference to the talk, and seemed to have feared that the Arabs would not cooperate with the PCC if they believed that an understanding had already been reached between Kennedy and Ben-Gurion. (Ha'aretz, June 7; on the US policy to activate the PCC, see the Kennedy letter, below, and p 228.)

Arabs Not Concerned. [The Arab press and radio stations gave relatively little attention to the meeting and emphasized that the US stand did not favour Israel.] Al-Hayât commented favourably on the US attitude as expressed in the State Department statement, and said that it had eased Arab apprehensions (Hayât, June 4). A Cairo weekly, quoting "reports received by the American Embassy in Cairo," said the meeting was held "in an official, that is, cold" atmosphere, and that President Kennedy had told Ben-Gurion that no solution could be imposed on the Arabs by force. (Ruz al-Yusuf, June 5, see also Akhbar, June 2)

PRESIDENT KENNEDY'S LETTER TO ARAB HEADS OF STATE

(May-August)

On June 2, following the Kennedy-Ben-Gurion meeting, it was reported that President Kennedy had sent letters of goodwill to the heads of state of Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the UAR. Later it was revealed that a letter had been sent also to the Imam of Yemen. It was immediately assumed that the letters were meant to reassure the Arabs with regard to the Kennedy-Ben-Gurion meeting (NYT, June 3, 5; see also Time, July 7; USIS, June 27).

[Later, towards the end of June, when the text of the letters leaked out in Beirut, it appeared that they were dated May 11, the date of the announcement of Ben-Gurion's visit to Canada, and eleven days before the official announcement of the forthcoming meeting.]

The text of the letter to King Hussein was obtained by The New York Times in Amman and published on June 26. Slightly varying texts in Arabic appeared in Al-Hayât (June 24), and in Al-Ahrâm (June 21, 1962) which reproduced the text of the letter to President Abdel Nasser and his reply. English translations of the Al-Ahrâm version appeared in the Egyptian Mail (Sept 22, 1962) and the BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, IV (Sept 24, 1962). A synopsis of the letter was published by USIS (June 27). Following is The New York Times version; the first part of the letter has been paraphrased.

In the opening paragraphs President Kennedy observed that in recent months the world had witnessed explosive situations, and though, since his inauguration, he had performed been largely occupied with international crises, his thoughts had often turned to the ME. He said that he was proud that the concepts of the American founding patriots and Lincoln, Wilson and F.D. Roosevelt had played such a great part in the emergence of vigorous and respected independent Arab states. The President continued that in recent weeks he had noted some speculation as to the new Administration's ME policy. Saying that as President he intended to uphold the above mentioned concepts, Kennedy continued as per the following text. (Headings inserted by editor; MER abbreviations.)

Readiness to Assist Nations Desirous of Maintaining Independence, Progress, Peace. "First, the US will to the best of its ability lend every appropriate assistance to all ME states that are determined to control their own destiny, to enhance the prosperity of their people and to allow their neighbours to pursue the same fundamental aims."

Readiness to Contribute to Solution of ME Disputes. "Secondly, the US remains ever ready to contribute both within and outside the US (sic: should read UN) to the search for solutions to disputes which dissipate the precious energies of the ME states and retard the economic prosperity which all free peoples rightly desire."

Assistance for Development Programmes. "Thirdly, with a view towards improving the welfare of the people of the ME the US is prepared to continue to support national development programs which are effectively designed to make available American commodities under the Food for Peace Program and to encourage educational exchanges and to facilitate political and economic progress."

Relative Tranquillity of ME. "While tensions unfortunately have sharpened in certain other areas of the world the ME during the past three years has been relatively tranquil. This has been due largely to the statesmanship on the part of the area's leaders who have given priority [to] constructive programs of economic development. Secretary [of State Dean] Rusk and I have been struck by the unanimity of views expressed to us by representatives of the various ME states, emphasizing that the present relative tranquillity should be preserved."

Solution of Arab-Israel Conflict Difficult but Possible; US Willing to Assist. "Underlying tensions do, however, remain, not the least of which is the unresolved Arab-Israel controversy. I know deep emotions are involved. No easy solution presents itself. The American Government and people believe that an honorable and humane settlement can be found and are willing to share in the labors and burdens which so difficult an achievement must entail if the parties concerned genuinely desire such participation."

The Arab Refugees and the Jordan Waters. "We are willing to help resolve the tragic Palestine refugee problem on the basis of the principle of repatriation and [or, according to all other sources] compensation for property, to assist them in finding an equitable answer to the question of the Jordan River water resources development and to be helpful in making progress on other aspects of the complex problem.

"I am pleased the UN General Assembly recently underscored the necessity to implement more [more does not appear in the other sources] rapidly its previous recommendations on the refugee problem. In this connection I wish to state unequivocally that this government's position is anchored and will continue to be anchored in the firm bedrock of support for General Assembly recommendations concerning the refugees... and imperial concern that those resolutions be implemented in a way most beneficial to the refugees."

Full Backing for Palestine Conciliation Committee. "The US as a member of the Palestine Conciliation Commission and as a nation keenly interested in the long-range advancement of the people of the Middle East takes seriously the task entrusted to the Commission and of [instead and of read by, according to other sources] the United Nations. We are determined to use our influence toward a just and peaceful solution.

"What precise steps the Commission may be able to take are of course not yet clear but I can assure you that there will be no lack of US interest in seeing that all parties directly concerned will cooperate fully with whatever program is indicated by the Commission so that the best interests and welfare of all the Arab refugees of Palestine may be protected and advanced."

Attitude of Friendship Towards the Arab People. [At this point the New York Times version apparently omitted a sentence. According to the UAR sources, this sentence read: "I also hope that the advantages of my views on the ME will be clear to you." According to Al-Hayat: "I sincerely hope that my views on the ME will be of benefit to you."] The text continued:

"Given the long history of friendly relationships between the Arab people and the American people and the interdependence of all men who wish to remain free, I want to be certain that you and other Arab leaders have no misunderstanding of our attitude toward the Arab people. It continues to be one of sincere friendship with mutual respect for the others' point of view, mutual and active concern for the betterment of mankind and mutual striving to eliminate the causes of international tensions. I am sure the future will bring ever friendlier and more productive relationships between our countries and the freedom-loving peoples." (NYT, June 26)

Before the last paragraph, there appeared in each letter a passage of special reference to the country concerned. (Hayat, June 24; for this passage in the letter to President Abdel Nasser, see the UAR sources mentioned above.)

ABDEL NASSER'S REPLY TO KENNEDY

President Abdel Nasser's reply to President Kennedy dated Aug 8, 1961, was made public in Al-Ahrām over a year after it was written, on Sept 21, 1962. Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrām, wrote that the publication was designed to enlighten the public in connection with accusation made by Akram al-Hurāni (the former UAR Vice-President and a leader of the Syrian Ba'ath party) and others to the effect that the UAR was conspiring with the US "to solve the Palestine question in Israel's favour." (Ahrām, Sept 21, 1962)

Abdel Nasser referred to the letters in a revolution anniversary speech, on July 22. He said that certain people had argued that no reply should be sent to President Kennedy as a reply would mean negotiations. [PM Qasim of Iraq publicly took this stand, see below.] But, he stated, it was a duty to convince any one asking for an opinion on the question "that we are right and that the creation of Israel was a blunder." Foreshadowing a theme which appeared later in his letter, Abdel Nasser said that "we have nothing to hide... in confidential documents as well as in our speeches... we use one and the same language..." (Eg. Gaz., July 23)

In his detailed letter (which was two and a half times as long as that of President Kennedy) the UAR leader gave his views on the Arab-Israel conflict and a critique of past US policies in the ME.

Palestine Crucial Issue Between UAR and US. Abdel Nasser declared that "the Palestine question and associated problems were not only a main issue affecting world peace in our age," but also "directly connected with the relations between our peoples." Various pronouncements by Kennedy on the Palestine issue before he became President had given Abdel Nasser the feeling "that many angles in the problem need clarification." The President's letter dealing with the subject gave Abdel Nasser an opportunity to state his attitude.

Israel An Aggressor and Ever-Present Danger. Abdel Nasser made the following points:

(1) The entire development in Palestine from the issuance of the Balfour declaration until the present was based on "usurpation."

(2) The US "did not place its might on the side of law and justice" nor did its policy serve American interests. US policy was dominated by internal political considerations such as the attempt by former President Harry S. Truman to gain Jewish votes in the presidential elections.

(3) Certain elements claimed that Israel had gained rights in Palestine by military victory. Such victory was however only a fable created by propaganda. The Israel forces did not occupy land in battle but only during the truce; the Arabs had trusted the justice of the UN to recover this land but they were punished for this trust.

(4) Israel was a continuous threat to the Arabs. Israel was bound to seek expansion because of the large-scale immigration; hence her strong alliance with imperialism. "On the other hand, imperialism has been using Israel as a tool to divide the Arab nation geographically and as a base to threaten any movement which would seek liberation from its domination."

Statements Not for Home Consumption. Abdel Nasser assured President Kennedy that "our attitude towards Israel is not a complex bundle of emotions" but a reflection of past aggression, present dangers and an ambiguous future. Also, he wrote, his statements were not meant for home consumption. He recalled what President Dwight D. Eisenhower had told him in New York on Sept. 26, 1960, "that some Arab politicians were publicly making harsh statements regarding Palestine and then contacting the American Government to alleviate their harshness by saying that their statements were meant for local Arab consumption." This was not the case with him.

US ME Policies Criticized. Abdel Nasser continued that Egypt had often tried to extend her hand to the American nation, but many times her hand had been left hanging in the air. He listed a series of grievances going back to President Wilson's refusal to meet the Egyptian delegation at the Paris Peace Conference after World War I. He said that Arab-US relations, which had been dealt a big blow by the US attitude to the Palestine question, had further deteriorated during 1954-5 over the question of ME defence. During the same period, in Feb 1955, Israel launched the raid on Gaza which became "the turning point in determining the trend of events" and Israel's agents committed acts of sabotage in Egypt. Egypt therefore resolved to arm herself and as the US rejected her bid for arms, she sought them from the Soviet Union. Abdel Nasser wrote: "I assure you that I will continue to keep faith with (jafā) the government of the Soviet Union" for this help.

Subsequently the UAR was subjected to psychological warfare, and the US withdrew its offer to finance the Aswan High Dam and did this in a form which "embodied many things which the Arab people of Egypt could not accept."

Egypt appreciated the US attempt to find a peaceful solution to "the problem which appeared after the nationalization of the Suez Canal Company" as well as US support in her struggle against the invasion of her territory by the three powers in Oct 1956. At the same time, when the Suez crisis was over, the US attempted to isolate Egypt by means such as the Eisenhower doctrine. Thereafter the Baghdad Pact tried to undermine Syria but in the end the Baghdad Pact collapsed and with it the US Arab policy. Yet the government did not ask itself what were the reasons for this failure. Abdel Nasser asked "why did the US, which was founded on freedom and on revolution, turn against freedom and revolution?" There was some improvement in relations, but it was punctuated by shocks like the boycott of the "Arab ship Cleopatra". (See MER 1960, p 41 ff)

There were some occasional bright moments, Abdel Nasser continued. In addition to the US attitude during the Suez crisis he mentioned US economic aid and assistance in salvaging the Nubian monuments.

Concluding, the UAR leader said his aim had been to make it clear that the "Arab East question" were closely inter-connected, that the "right of the Palestine refugees is connected with the right of the Palestinian homeland" and that the other Arab countries could not dissociate themselves "from the aggression which befell one of them," as they were threatened by the same fate.

US Asked To Eliminate Internal Politics From Her ME Policy. Abdel Nasser told Kennedy that the US policy on the ME was "influenced by un-American factors in many instances." He therefore said that "the time has come for the US to open its eyes and view the development of events in our region on the basis of a purely American outlook not affected by internal American political considerations or by calculations on election votes." Abdel Nasser warned Kennedy that "it would be a grave mistake" to take the expressions in this letter as "dictated by local Arab political considerations. I meant this letter for you, not for what some of those who claim experience here call local consumption or psychological mobilization." (Ahram, Sept 21, 1962; Eg. Mail, Sept 22, 1962; R. Cairo, Sept 21 [24] 1962)

OTHER REACTIONS TO KENNEDY LETTERS APPREHENSIONS SUBSIDE

Saudi Arabia. The first reports on the Kennedy letters came from Saudi Arabia. On May 23, King Saud was reported to have summoned the Arab ambassadors and informed them that he had received a letter from President Kennedy. The Saudi Arabian government requested that the Arab League Council be convened to deal with the letter. (R. Cairo, May 23-IMB, May 23; Hayat, May 25)

A Lebanese paper remarked that Saudi Arabian offi-als had attached special significance to the fact that Kennedy had written to King Saud. They had tried to give the impression that the King was the only important Arab personality who had received such a letter and that the King was actively engaged in solving the Arab-Israel dispute in line with the rights of the Palestinian Arabs. (Nahar, June 25)

Arab League Directives? There were conflicting reports as to whether the Arab Defence Council which met in Cairo from June 10-18 (pp 107-8) had adopted recommendations on the replies to be given to the Kennedy letters. On June 20 Cairo Radio said the conference had resolved that each country should answer the letter separately and independently, but two days later the same source said that King Saud was preparing a reply in line with the directives elaborated by the Council (R. Cairo, June 20, 22-IMB, June 20, 22). The League's "Palestine Experts Committee," apparently proposed some guidelines. (Ahram, May 31; see also p 111 a)

Philippe Taqha, the Lebanese PM, reportedly told a Lebanese parliamentary committee that the Arab Defence Council had resolved on the following directives for replies to the Kennedy letter: a) the very existence of Israel was a violation of the principles of justice, for the state was based on religion and race, both imperialistic principles; b) the Arabs were ready to shoulder the responsibility for Palestine and considered foreign interference in the ME as the main cause of the difficulties and disagreements; c) the Arab countries desired stability and security in the ME and they deemed President Kennedy's initiative as timely, for the US Government had declared as its purpose the worldwide introduction of the principles of justice. (BBG in Arabic, June 22-IMB, June 23)

On June 25, President Shehab sent his reply. (Hayat, June 25)

PM Qasim Opposes Reply. PM Qasim in a public speech late in June referring to the Kennedy letter, said that the Arab countries would solve their problems themselves and would not allow foreign countries to interfere in the affairs of the ME. He believed that the very decision to conduct discussions about the fate of Palestine was an abandonment of its future. He said that undoubtedly each Arab state had the right either to reply or not to reply to Kennedy's letter, but the interests of the Arabs did not necessitate a reply. (R. Baghdad, June 25-IMB, June 26)

King Hussein's Reply. The text of King Hussein's reply was not made public. It was reported that the King had asserted that it was the right of the Arab refugees to return to their homeland, and that peace and stability would prevail in the ME only after a just solution was found to the Palestine problem. Hussein had urged the President to try to apply the principle of self-determination to the refugees. (NYT, Aug 24, 25)

Arabs See Change in US Attitude: "More Neutral." [As recorded above, the Arab information media gave relatively little attention to the Kennedy-Ben-Gurion meeting on May 30, and emphasized that the US stand did not favour Israel. In June, and later on, while the Cairo radio station still continued to charge the US with a pro-Israel policy (e.g., R. Cairo, June 3 [5]), more opinions appeared to the effect that the Arab-US relations were improving.] A Jordanian paper spoke of the evident rapprochement between the Kennedy administration and the Arab world, Abdel Nasser in particular, which allegedly disquieted Ben-Gurion. There were reports that American policy towards the Middle East would be "more neutral" than hitherto and observers were even said to believe that the US would allow arms shipments to the UAR. (Manar, June 6)

In Aug reports in New York papers said that the Arabs had been favourably impressed by President Kennedy's letters and believed that in principle he did not reject the Arab stand. The Americans had proposed nothing concrete, and neither Israel nor the Arabs had agreed to anything. But the intangible element, called in the diplomatic language "the initial atmosphere," was thought to be not discouraging. (Ha'aretz, Aug 18)

Kennedy Seen "Abandoning Idea of Personal Mediation"; Failure of 1958 Mediation Mission Recalled. Earlier a Cairo paper reported from an "informed source" that Kennedy had completely abandoned the idea of personally mediating between the Arabs and Israel to find a solution for the Palestine problem. Instead, the UN SG would send a personal envoy to the ME [a reference to the PCC Special Representative]. (Ruz al-Yusuf, July 31)

At the same time it was revealed in a report in The New York Times that in 1958 Robert Anderson, then Defense Under-Secretary, was sent by President Eisenhower on a secret mission to Israel and Cairo to seek a formula for peace. According to the Tel Aviv paper Ma'ariv, Anderson spent several days incognito in Jerusalem, under strict guard, and held talks with PM Ben-Gurion. He then flew to Cairo in a special plane, via Athens, and returned several days later to report to Ben-Gurion that Abdel Nasser had refused to budge. (Quoted in Jer. Post, Aug 1)

Israel Said to Agree to More US Aid to Arabs. In June a State Department source was quoted as saying that Israel had agreed to American efforts to strengthen her ties with the Arab countries. The source added that courting the Arabs would not result in cooler relations with Israel. (Ha'aretz, June 29)

In Nov it was reported from Jerusalem that government circles hinted that Israel was not opposed to Egypt's receiving technical and economic aid which certain powers wished to extend to her. Israel believed that by raising the standard of living, a contribution to the stability of the area would be made. It was assumed that this attitude was communicated to Mr. Phillips Talbot, US Assistant Secretary of State, when he toured the area several weeks before. (Ha'aretz, Nov 16)

US POLICY STATEMENTS

(June-October)

On June 14, Phillips Talbot, Assistant Secretary of State, testified before the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee on the foreign assistance programme for the Near East and South Asia that US economic and military aid was "indispensable" and "vital" to US security. He noted that "such compelling needs as more education, greater agricultural and industrial productivity, and wider public participation in the responsibilities of government" were general throughout the area. He added: "In most countries these needs now have political as well as economic implications... Through fractional but often decisive US assistance to their own efforts, we helped countries in the area to progress in directions consonant with US goals... the creation of stability wherein freedom, peace and progress based upon respect for the dignity and worth of the individual may be achieved... Our economic as well as our military aid has also demonstrably strengthened nations of the area against the persistent, heavy pressure of Soviet and Chinese Communist expansionism." (For source, see below.)

"Relative Stability in the ME." Talbot noted that there had been relative stability in the ME during the past year, there had been fewer border incidents and relations between the Arab countries had improved. These "conditions of relative peace" had "not however obscured our recognition of the underlying problems which stand in the way of an Arab-Israeli peace nor lessened our determination to be helpful in achieving progress on these problems." Talbot said "neither the Arabs nor the Israelis have yet shown the degree of willingness to negotiate or compromise which might allow some progress."

The Arab Refugees. Talbot continued that "as a nation we retain deep humanitarian interest in the problem of refugees, a most important element... in the whole Arab-Israeli question." He noted that endeavours—consistent with the desires of the Congress—had been made by UNRWA to correct ration roll abuses and to promote a constructive expansion of the vocational training programme.

Talbot continued: "We have not, however, abandoned our efforts to achieve progress on the overall Arab-Israeli problem... As a member of the PCC, the US takes most seriously its responsibilities to provide by next fall a report which will make constructive contribution to consideration of the refugee problem."

The Arab Boycott and Freedom of Navigation. Talbot continued: "We continue to maintain our support for the principle of freedom of transit through the Suez Canal and our opposition to the Arab boycott of Israel... We have registered again with the governments involved US views with regard to Arab boycott practices and other discriminatory measures involving US citizens and companies. We believe a better comprehension of the US viewpoint has developed. On the other hand, we are convinced that to press this issue through retaliatory steps would intensify the very restrictions we seek to remove..."

Support for UN Bodies. Talbot continued: "Meanwhile, we are convinced of the need for continuing full support of the instrumentalities of the UN, including UNTSO, UNEF and UNRWA, which now play an important role in preservation of area stability."

Quiet Diplomacy. "The measures described above," Talbot concluded, "are indicative of our determination to contribute to the alleviation of some of the ill-effects of the Arab-Israeli dispute, though in the broader sense we are convinced of the need for stressing the methods of quiet diplomacy in dealing with a complex issue where deep emotions characterize attitudes on both sides." (USIS, June 15)

Senator Humphrey Sees Improved Atmosphere; Against Imposed Solution. "As a result of my talks with the leaders of the Arab nations and Israel, I am more optimistic about the chance for peace in the Middle East than I was after my trip to this area in 1957," Senator Hubert Humphrey, Deputy Majority Leader of the US Senate, declared on Oct 29 at a press conference in Jerusalem, Israel. He said that in his meeting with the leaders of Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan he had encountered no rancour, but rather noticed a deep concern about the problems of development in their own countries. He also said it would be a mistake for the US to attempt to force a solution to the problems of the area. (Jer. Post, Oct 30)

THE COMMUNIST COUNTRIES AND THE ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT

SYNOPSIS

The attitude of the Communist countries to the Arab-Israeli conflict continued unchanged from 1960. They backed the Arab case in practically every instance, particularly at the UN (see pp 18-9, 34-5). Soviet arms continued to flow into the UAR and Iraq.

The views of the USSR and the Arabs largely coincided; both depicted Israel as an aggressive tool of Western imperialism in the ME, scheming to usurp the Arab lands, and serving neo-colonialism in Africa. Soviet comments laid much stress on what was described as West German support for Israel's plots and expansionism. (At the same time no Communist support was expressed for the declared Arab aim of liquidating Israel.)

Following are excerpts from Moscow broadcasts in Arabic. (See also: Israel, Foreign Relations (The Communist Bloc).)

MOSCOW BROADCASTS

"Israel Does Not Want Peace." At the close of 1960 a Moscow Radio commentary stated what was to be the basic tenet of the official Soviet view throughout the following year: "The fact is that peace has never prevailed between Israel and the Arab States. Who is guilty of this?... do the Arabs threaten Israel? No, on the contrary! It is the Arab countries which have been subjected more than once to Israeli aggression... At the present moment Israel is harbouring plans to usurp Arab territory. Israel does not want peace with the Arabs, refuses to abandon its usurpation plans, and obstinately continues to carry out... its military preparations against the Arabs." (R. Moscow in Arabic, Dec 31, 1960 [SU, Jan 2, 1961])

US Finances Israel Armaments from Oil Profits. In March Moscow Radio commented on a US Export-Import Bank loan to Israel in the following terms: "Everyone of you knows quite well the reason for this American generosity to the country which is regarded by the US as the fortress of the Western world in the Near East... Israel needs US dollars to buy modern weapons. You know full well against whom the Israelis want to use these weapons... where do the Americans obtain these funds for aiding Israel?... this money cannot be obtained except from one source: the sales of Arab oil. In a word, the income from exploiting Arab natural resources is being spent to buy weapons which may be used against the Arabs." (R. Moscow in Arabic, March 18 [SU 21])

"Imaginary Arab Attacks"—Pretext for Israel Arms Supplies. In connection with PM Ben-Gurion's visit to North America, Britain and France in May-June which coincided with French and Italian press reports of Israel's purchases of tanks and heavy artillery, Moscow Radio declared that "the Israeli rulers had loudly complained about imaginary Arab attacks" and that as a result, the West had been "prompted... to increase the financial and military aid to Israel." (R. Moscow in Arabic, June 19 [SU 21])

Joint Israel-NATO Espionage Alleged. A Moscow Radio commentary on a recent spy trial in Cairo said that the direction of Israeli intelligence activities from Western Germany was proven beyond doubt. The leading accused was a West German citizen. This was a further illustration of West Germany's attitude towards the Arabs in their conflict with Israel. West Germany had paid vast sums in compensation to Israel and Israel had used them to develop her arms industry. (R. Moscow in Arabic, July 14 [SU 17])

A news item on Moscow Radio quoted a Beirut press report that a NATO espionage centre had been set up in Israel under the direction of an Israeli officer for the purpose of gathering information about ME countries. (R. Moscow, Sept 5 [SU 7])

"The spies operating in Egypt and the other Arab countries," declared Moscow Radio in Nov, "have two masters, NATO... and Israel": coordination of Israel and NATO intelligence activities had recently been extended. (R. Moscow in Arabic, Nov 9 [SU, 10, 11])

Israel "Threatens Arabs with New Power." A statement by a Lebanese Member of Parliament, that a NATO nuclear naval base was to be constructed in Israel, was described as "a warning to the whole of Arab public opinion." There was ground for anxiety that Israel would "continue to pursue an anti-Arab foreign policy, with the encouragement of the Western Powers." Israel, the broadcast continued, "has not yet given up its extremist scheme of grabbing new Arab land. Government officials in Israel talk openly about this, including the Premier, Ben-Gurion, who threatens the Arabs with his new power." (R. Moscow in Arabic, Nov 11 [SU 14])

ARAB ANTI-ISRAELI ACTIVITIES IN NON-ARAB AFRICA

ARAB VIEWS AND PROPAGANDA

Abdel Nasser: Israel, a Tool of New Imperialism, Has Failed in Africa. UAR Main Aim in Africa to Frustrate Israeli Designs. In an address to the UAR National Assembly on Jan 23, Abdel Nasser declared that Israel's infiltration of Africa—which was synonymous with imperialist infiltration—would fail because the UAR was there to guard the continent's eastern gates. He said that the Casablanca resolutions had shown that the Africans now clearly understood Israel's hidden intentions. (Nasser's Speeches, pp 5, 7)

On Feb 21 Abdel Nasser said in a speech in Damascus that western imperialism had opened Africa's doors to Israel and was trying to close the countries under its rule to the Arabs. It was the duty of the UAR to warn the African peoples of the new imperialism—the Zionist imperialism—which wished to place them within the imperialist spheres of influence. (Nasser's Speeches, p 21)

In his revolution anniversary speech of July 23, Abdel Nasser said that the UAR had "worked for the sake of African solidarity... because imperialism has enabled Israel to infiltrate into Africa..." He reiterated that the "Africans were deceived for some time," but were now fully aware that Israel was a "tool in the hands of the new imperialism." (Nasser's Speeches, p 139)

[These themes in Abdel Nasser's speeches were repeated by the UAR information media throughout the year.]

Propaganda in Cairo Broadcasts to Africa. [Anti-Israel propaganda was a major topic and often the main one in Cairo's broadcasts to Africa. Israel was described as a tool of imperialism in general and in Africa in particular.]

A talk in Swahili emphasized the need for African countries to remain united against the spread of Israeli influence, while another was devoted to alleged Israeli maltreatment of Arabs and Christians (R. Cairo in Swahili, Jan 30 [Feb 1], Feb 1 [3]). Israel's record of votes on African affairs at the UN was attacked as pro-imperialist (R. Cairo, April 5 [7]). In talks on neo-colonialism in Africa, Israel was stigmatized as a stooge of Western imperialism, and the establishment of Israel was compared to the European colonization of Africa, which had driven Africans from their homes. Israel's reputed imperialist role in Africa was shown by such examples as the alleged supply of 10,000 Israeli-made submachine guns to the Portuguese forces by Western Germany for use in Angola, alleged Israeli help for the French in Algeria, and alleged Israeli ties with South Africa. (R. Cairo in Swahili, April 11 [13], June 21 [30])

To Arabic broadcasts, African leaders who visited Israel were termed agents of imperialism, as in the case of Maurice Yameogo, President of Upper Volta. There was no question of Presidents Touré, Nkrumah, Keita and other "free African leaders" visiting Israel, since they knew better to be an imperialist tool, Cairo Radio said. Thus such visits were no proof of the failure of the UAR's attempts to isolate Israel from Africa, as claimed by Israel Radio. (V of A, July 15 [17])

UAR to Disseminate "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion." Al-Ahram reported in Jan that the UAR information department was translating the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion" into Arabic, French, and English for dissemination in Africa, in order to "unmask Zionism." "Parts of the Talmud" were also being translated. The Talmud said, this report alleged, that whoever kills a non-Jew would be assured of Paradise; it also permitted the Jews to rob gentiles of their property and to violate their women. (Ahram, Jan 20; on the "Protocols" and "quotations" from the Talmud, see also pp 185-6.)

Showing the Refugee Camps. [African visitors to the UAR were often shown the refugee camps in the Gaza strip and Syria] so that they would understand the "Zionist imperialist crime committed against the inhabitants of Arab Palestine" (Ahram, Feb 16). In April the delegates at the African Broadcasting Conference held in Cairo were taken on a tour of the refugee camps in Gaza (R. Cairo, April 29-IMB, April 30). In May the heads of the African political offices in Cairo were to undertake such a trip after a special meeting on Palestine. (Ahram, May 10)

Israeli Intrigues and Plots Alleged; Issue of Forged Qur'ân. A report prepared by the UAR Foreign Ministry on Israeli activities in the new African states found that Israel and France had jointly plotted to infiltrate into these states, especially the former French ones, commercially, economically, and politically. (R. Cairo, Jan 3-IMB, Jan 3)

Cairo sources alleged that Israel was sending teachers of Islam and Arabic to African countries with a Muslim population, and in Sierra Leone she had built a mosque as a gift. The Waqf Ministry had decided to send gramophone records to all places where Israel had sent "forged copies of the Qur'an" (Gumhuriyah, Jan 5; MENA, Jan 5 [9]). [There were no African or any other non-Arab reports on any such Israeli activities. Arab allegations that Israel had disseminated forged copies of the Qur'an in Africa had already appeared in 1960.] An Iraqi paper dealt with the "forged Qur'an" issue at length (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 27) while in Sudan, the Shaykh al-Ulamah warned against this "evil trick," which threatened "the holiest of holies" (R. Umdurman, Feb 9 [11]). Jordan circulated information of the issue among the Arab states (R. Amman, April 6-IMB, April 9) and a UAR minister took 5,000 copies of the Qur'an to Mecca for distribution among the pilgrims, in consequence of the reports of the "forged Qur'an" (Akhbar, April 23). [None of the sources available ever reported that a "forged Qur'an" had been produced in evidence.]

A Cairo weekly claimed to have learned from an Israeli paper that 24 "young Israel beauties" had gone to Africa with the aim to marry "any African leader whatsoever" or "to accept their hospitality." (Musawwar, Dec 8)

Arab Self-Criticism. The press continued to publish Arab self-criticism on failure in Africa.

In March a Cairo weekly criticized the lack of coordination in Arab efforts against Israeli penetration of Africa. As an example, the paper cited four cases of separate Arab committees and institutions having dealt with the matter and having reached certain decisions without any coordination. (Akhbar al-Yaum, March 4)

In June two editorials in Al-Hayat described Israel's close relations with Africa. Tel Aviv had become a Mecca for African leaders, and the Africans had high praise for Israel's assistance to their countries. The Arab League meanwhile was passing resolution after resolution to combat Israeli penetration into Africa. (Hayat, June 7, 20)

ARAB ACTIVITIES

Note: This section includes only items which have not been recorded elsewhere in this volume. Much of the bilateral relations between the Arab and African countries were concerned with the Arab-Israeli conflict. (See bilateral relations between Arab and African countries, Israel and African countries.) "Thwarting Israel's infiltration into Africa" featured also in most Arab League conferences and other inter-Arab meetings and was the subject of almost all activities of the League in Africa. See: Inter-Arab Relations; especially The Arab League Council; The "Palestine Question" (Conference of Heads of Palestine Machineries); Inter-Arab Conferences (i.e. Information Committee).

A delegation of the Arab chambers of commerce, which toured African countries in July-August, was also mostly concerned with combating Israel in Africa (p 102 b).

The Casablanca Conference. In the field of Arab anti-Israeli activities in Africa, the beginning of 1961 was dominated by the Casablanca Conference resolutions which severely condemned Israel. Most of the Arab press and especially that of the UAR hailed the resolutions as a great victory over Israel and a blow to her prestige and influence in Africa (see pp 51-2).

Arab League and Other General Arab Activities. The Arab ministries of education were reported to be consulting on the coordination of cultural activities in Africa against Israel's increasing activity on the continent. (Hayat, Feb 22)

Jordan's decision to send a royal delegation on an African tour [in March-April] was described as an important step in combating Israel's efforts on the continent. (Falastin, Feb 21; Hayat, Feb 28)

A tour of Africa by a UAR economic delegation was also said to be mainly directed against Israeli activity there. (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 27)

An Afro-Arab conference, whose aim would be the discussion of measures to thwart Israeli "penetration of Africa," was planned for the beginning of the summer of 1961 (Ahram, March 26). [No such conference took place during 1961.]

The Arab League envisaged the establishment of an Afro-Asian institute to frustrate Israeli cultural expansion. (Jihad, April 4; Hayat, April 7)

The League Economic Council, at its meeting in Feb., devoted a special discussion to Israel's economic "penetration" of Africa. (Falastin, April 12)

Two representatives of the Arab Higher Committee (on which see p 111) visited Nigeria, Mali, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Guinea, Ghana, Chad, and Sudan. Their intention was to inform on the Palestine problem and the Arab refugees. (West African Pilot, Enugu, July 5)

The Arab League prepared plans for the establishment of an Arab trading firm, with the principal objective of combating Israeli goods in African and Asian markets. (Ahram, Nov 21)

The League Permanent Committee for Communications, at its meeting in Rabat in Dec., discussed taking over Israeli interests in shipping firms in West Africa, following the alleged success of the League in preventing agreements between Israel and Ghana and Sierra Leone for setting up joint shipping companies. (Akhir Sa'ah, Dec 13)

A draft resolution calling for direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab states was sponsored at the 16th session of the UN General Assembly by 12 African states, among others. In consequence, the Central Boycott Office of the Arab League asked for stronger coordination and cooperation between the Arab governments, so as to foil Israeli "penetration" of Africa. (Jihad, Dec 30)

Arab Refugees in Africa. In April a group of 28 "hungry-looking" Arab refugees from Palestine arrived in Monrovia by car on their way from Ghana to Cairo. They enjoyed the charity of the Monrovia, and their leader told of how they were "booted out of Jerusalem by the Jews." (Liberian Age, April 7)

THE ARAB BOYCOTT AGAINST ISRAEL

SYNOPSIS

(For a background note, see MER 1960, pp 186-7)

Information on boycott activities was available almost exclusively from Arab sources; Israeli sources seldom mentioned Arab boycott measures.

The Arab boycott against Israel continued during the year in its set pattern, and there were no outstanding issues or incidents.

Foreign firms and ships continued to be blacklisted, and the names of those who promised to abide by the boycott regulations were removed from the list (only a few cases of blacklisting have been recorded here, as samples). In the cultural sphere Cairo extended the boycott to a US theatre company because Israel too was on its itinerary. In Lebanon the government ordered the name of Israel to be erased from books and maps, even in scientific libraries.

Arab opinion of the effectiveness of the boycott was mixed in face of the obvious economic prosperity in Israel and the marked growth in her foreign trade, the tourist industry, and in foreign investments.

While boycott officials claimed that the boycott was generally effective, others charged the Arab countries, Arab emigrants and the boycott officials themselves with actually hindering the achievement of its aims. The Lebanese government especially was accused of procrastinating in implementing the boycott. There were many Arab reports—some of them said to be inspired by personal motives—that Israeli goods were being sold in the Arab countries themselves.

Similarly, while on the one hand boycott office officials reported the effectiveness of the Arab boycott measures in Africa and indicated that Israel was practically ousted from the African markets, others complained of the entrenched position of the Israelis there and of the ineffectiveness of the boycott.

Several threats of boycott were not carried out, e.g. against BOAC and the Hilton hotel chain (Hilton had a hotel in Cairo and was preparing to build one in Tel Aviv). Jordan continued to permit tourists, pilgrims, and diplomats to cross the border, in spite of a resolution by the boycott officers forbidding this.

The US Congress adopted an anti-discriminatory amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act of fiscal year 1962, which replaced the "Douglas Amendment" of the 1961 Act, and stated that in administering this act the principles of the freedoms of trade, information, travel, navigation in international waterways, and others, should be upheld.

16TH CONFERENCE OF ARAB BOYCOTT OFFICERS

[After several postponements] the conference met in the Old City of Jerusalem on June 5. The meetings were held in secret and lasted three weeks. Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia and the UAR were represented; the Yemeni representative was expected. Dr Abd al-Karim al-A'zidi, the General Commissioner of the Central Boycott Office, presided. (Manar, June 4; Eg. Gaz., June 28)

A major topic on the agenda was how to combat Israel's trade with African countries (Jihad, June 13). Amman Radio reported the following items on the agenda: (a) the domination by international Zionism of a number of foreign educational institutions; (b) question of goods owned by persons in Israel and transported through Arab airspace or in planes landing in Arab airports [?]; (c) blacklisting of foreign firms; (d) raw materials likely to help the Israel war effort. (R. Amman, June 7-IMB, June 8)

The conference submitted recommendations and resolutions for strengthening the boycott of Israel to the Arab League Council for action by the Arab states (Eg. Gaz., June 28). The next meeting was to take place in Khartoum in Jan 1962; a Jordanian suggestion to make [the Old City of] Jerusalem the permanent seat of the Central Boycott Office or venue of the conference was rejected. (Akhbar Sa'ah, July 12)

A communiqué issued on June 24, at the conclusion of the conference, said that it had discussed 75 topics under three headings: (a) tightening the boycott by laying down a new basis for it; (b) amending certain boycott measures to suit developments; (c) scrutinizing of documents presented by blacklisted companies. The conference resolved: (1) to remove from the black list 12 firms which had severed connections with Israel; (2) to blacklist 27 firms for dealing with Israel; (3) to complete investigation of nine other firms (R. Amman, June 24-IMB, June 25; ANA, June 24 [27]). Among the "important resolutions" adopted were: to boycott universities and other foreign institutions of higher education which were under Zionist influence; and to act against the Leyland Bus Co., which had established an assembly plant in Israel (Akhbar, June 28). The Arab League Council approved the recommendations of the conference. (Anwar, Dec 1)

FREEDOM OF NAVIGATION IN SUEZ CANAL, SHIPPING BOYCOTT; UAR MEASURES

Blacklisting of Ships and Shipping Firms. Fourteen shipping companies—American, British, Spanish, Italian, and Danish—were added to the black list, it was reported in May. Names of ships blacklisted appeared in the following sources, among others: (R. Cairo, March 11-IMB, March 12; Akhbar, May 26; Jaridah, May 30)

UAR sources reported on shipping lines and ships which had promised to stop trading with Israel in order to be taken off the black list. (e.g. R. Cairo, Feb 24-IMB, Feb 24; Masa, June 28, Nov 2)

UAR Seizes Israel-Bound Cargo. The UAR authorities announced several times that they had seized cargoes passing through the Suez Canal bound for Israel. There were, for example, a box weighing 40 kilograms, and two tons of horsehair (the latter was requisition Bo. 523). (R. Cairo, March 16 [18]; Ahram, April 5, June 1; MENA, Dec 7 [9]; R. Baghdad, April 17-IMB, April 18)

In May, Maj.-Gen. Isâm al-Masri, the head of the UAR boycott office [Office of War Mobilization], gave details of the seizure in the past of what he said were disguised weapons destined for Israel, such as 28 tanks disguised as tractors. The boycott regulations for ships in Arab territorial waters were implemented by offices in Alexandria, Port Said, and Suez. Since their establishment they had impounded goods bound for Israel worth ££2m. The case of the impounded cargo went to the Prize Court, "which derived its authority from international law." If the court approved the seizure, the goods were bonded in the name of the Palestinian refugees, or sold by auction. If the tribunal found the seizure unwarranted, the goods were returned to the owners against certain charges. (Ahram, April 5)

Israel-Bound Mail Seized and Rerouted. Seventy bags of mail for Israel, seized in Port Said (in Oct) from a British liner bound for London from Sydney, were to be shipped back to Australia, a spokesman for the Arab Boycott Office announced. In Israel it was expected that a diplomatic protest would be made in Canberra if Egypt did not give Australia a satisfactory explanation of the seizure of the mail. This was the first time the Egyptian authorities had raided a passenger liner travelling through the Suez Canal to seize mail bound for Israel. The mail was to have been off-loaded at Genoa, not Port Said, in order to avoid dispute with the Arab League. (Jer. Post, Oct 17, 18)

In April the Cairo authorities impounded seven packages destined for Israel from a Russian plane. This mail was to be sent to Tel Aviv via Tirana (BBC in Arabic, April 18-19B, April 19). In Dec there was an additional case of impounding of mail destined for Israel at Cairo airport. (Ha'aretz, Dec 5)

UAR Sees Israel Countermeasures. In April a Cairo source claimed Israel intended to increase pressure to open the Suez Canal for Israel shipping by means of a stratagem: ships destined to pass the Canal were loaded by "Zionist agents" with goods of no commercial value, so that the UAR would impound them and thus enable Israel to raise the matter in the Security Council. (Rus al-Yusuf, April 24)

International Protests. The Foreign Minister of Denmark, Jens Otto Krag, was reported to have declared on a visit to Cairo that his country believed the Suez Canal was to be free for all shipping. (Ha'aretz, quoting AFP, Feb 26)

A Cairo paper reported that the international congress of stevedores in Geneva (?) had resolved to boycott Arab ships so as to force the Arabs to stop boycotting ships trading with Israel; however, the Arab Boycott Office in Geneva and the Egyptian mission had explained to the delegates the reasons for the boycott. "Congress members were convinced, and gave up their previous stand." (Akhbar Sa'ah, Oct 18)

Scandal in Alexandria. It was discovered that in the Alexandria bonded warehouses two firms had violated the boycott regulations by transferring ££48,000 over a two-year period to a Zionist who aided immigration to and invested his money in Israel. This (named) person owned warehouse companies in Geneva which had made a deal with the Alexandria companies. (Akhbar, Dec 10)

BOYCOTT OF AIRLINES

Airlines Subjected to Boycott. The permanent legal committee [of the UAR] approved a boycott regulation providing that airplanes passing through Arab countries' airspace may be requested to land, and subjected to search. The Arab governments would have the right to confiscate baggage or cargo belonging to individuals and institutions in Israel. The law stated that the prescribed procedure did not contravene the provisions of international aviation agreements. (For details of the law see Ahram, March 6.)

BOAC Warned. The Arab League Boycott Office warned the British Overseas Airways Corporation that unless it abandoned its scheduled stopover in Tel Aviv on its planned London-Tehran flight, it would be blacklisted (Masa, March 12). [Already in Oct 1959 BOAC had inaugurated regular flights London-Tel Aviv-Tehran-Far East, and no boycott measures against the line became known.]

Middle East Airline Company Sued? [The Middle East Airline Co. was a joint British-Lebanese enterprise with a Lebanese as president.] In July it was reported that in response to a request by the Lebanese boycott office the Minister of Economy had sued the company before a military court for violating the boycott regulations. One of the company's aircraft had transported Israeli goods from Rome to London, and when the goods were unloaded people at London Airport had said: "Peace has been concluded between Israel and the Arabs" (Kul Shay, July 29). In Aug it was reported that the company would become purely Lebanese, without any foreign capital. (Akhbar al-Ushu', Aug 18)

OIL

In March it was reported that the Arab League secretariat had decided that the boycott offices should apply the boycott rules to foreign oil companies which disregarded the boycott procedure. Previously, boycott rules had not applied to oil companies. (Anwar, March 8)

During the same period the Iraqi Minister of Oil wrote to his Venezuelan counterpart asking about reports that Venezuela was about to sell Israel a quantity of crude oil. He told the Venezuelan Minister that as a friend of the Arabs he must not accord Israel any assistance in any field; he warned that "the Arab states will spare no efforts and sacrifices to prevent oil from reaching Israel." On March 13 Iraq announced that Venezuela had officially informed it that it would permit the export of iron and oil to Israel (R. Baghdad, March 13 [15]). [According to official Israeli trade statistics, Israel imported from Venezuela neither iron, iron ore nor oil.]

(On the question of oil, see also under Iran, p 190.)

TRAVEL AND TOURISM

Tourists and Diplomats. Jordan opposed a decision, said to have been adopted unanimously by the boycott offices, to close the borders between the Arab states and Israel to foreign diplomats. The boycott offices had proved that certain diplomats travelling between Israel and the Arab states engaged in spying for Israel (Ha-nadith, Feb 24). The Chief of the Central Boycott Office said in March that Jordan had not complied with the resolutions and allowed pilgrims, diplomats, and members of UNTSO to move from the "conquered part of Jerusalem" to the Old City. The Syrian Region of the UAR strictly observed the rule (Masa, March 12). (Throughout the year, as previously, there was considerable legal traffic—of tourists, pilgrims, diplomats, and others—across the Israel-Jordan border at Jerusalem. Lebanon, on the other hand, closed the border with Israel to diplomatic personnel and others, in Jan. See: Arab-Israel Border Relations.)

Iraq was to bar the entry into Iraq of tourists suspected of having relations with Israel (Akhbar, June 29). The Lebanese authorities informed the embassy of a certain Western power that Lebanon would not allow entry of foreigners who had previously been in Israel. The step was caused by an incident with tourists from that country who were turned down at the frontier because they had Israeli visas in their passports. (Zaman, Beirut, Aug 1)

In Nov a Lebanese paper published a photocopy of an item in the Tel Aviv paper Davar stating that Egypt had instructed its visa officers and frontier police to recognize passports carrying an Israeli visa. (Manar, Jordan, Nov 22)

To Divert Tourism from Israel. The UAR authorities were to discuss a report that Israel was attracting tourists by spreading false information, especially about the holy places. The report suggested means of depriving Israel of her income from tourism and of attracting these tourists to Arab countries (Akhbar al-Yaum, Aug 19). The Central Boycott Office asked the Arab states to increase propaganda in Europe in order to counteract Israel's appeal to tourists and to prevent it from becoming the foremost tourist country in the Middle East. (Jihad, Nov 18)

[159,624 tourists visited Israel in 1961, compared with 117,600 in the previous year.]

CULTURAL BOYCOTT

Books Banned. In Jordan the censor banned 65 books which were "distributed by Zionists in Germany in order to influence public opinion in favour of Israel." (Jihad, April 20)

Periodicals. In Jordan an order was issued to impound any issue of Time magazine containing "propaganda for Israel." (Difa, Dec 6)

In Lebanon an investigation was opened to establish the responsibility for the distribution in the country of an issue of Jours de France containing pages of "Israeli fashions and propaganda." (Siyasah, Dec 31)

Theatre. Plans to present in Cairo the American Theatre Guild Company led by Helen Hayes were dropped because UAR authorities objected to the fact that Israel was on the troupe's itinerary. The scheduled performances were hailed as the first major American cultural attraction to be offered in Egypt in several years, and the authorities in Cairo first welcomed the visit enthusiastically. The company, which was travelling under State Department auspices, was to visit Beirut instead. The New York Times commented: "The childish bad manners of the Cairo ban on Miss Hayes and her devoted fellow players makes [Abdel] Nasser's 'culture' a laughingstock." (NYT, March 20)

Films. Twenty films "containing Israeli propaganda" were blacklisted in Baghdad in the second half of 1960 (R. Amman, March 5-IMB, March 5). MENA reported the intention of urging the Arab boycott officers' conference to arrange for films to be made under Arab League supervision, "to counter Israeli propaganda." It was likely that the conference would discuss blacklisting studios which produced films harmful to Arab interests (R. Cairo, Jan 21 [24]). [There was no report as to whether the conference (in June—see above) discussed this issue.] The Central Boycott Office intended to investigate the matter of Jack Warner, owner of the Warner film studios, who was also the chairman of a society aiding Israel (Hadaf, Beirut, May 16). Jordan approved a Lebanese suggestion to exchange lists of films whose showing would be prohibited (Manar, Oct 13). Film importers in Lebanon asked that the ban on films starring blacklisted artists, including Elizabeth Taylor and Jerry Lewis, be lifted. (Anwar, Oct 18)

Television. The Lebanese authorities were reportedly expecting a television station in Israel to begin operation shortly and were making a technical survey to prepare the jamming of the Israel television broadcasts, but it was feared that the jamming might interfere with UAR broadcasts (Hawadith, Aug 23). [There was no television station in Israel, but a growing number of television sets, which received broadcasts from neighbouring Arab television stations only.]

Records. Cases were reported where records were confiscated because they allegedly contained Israeli songs or because the musician was a "Zionist." (Jaridah, June 2; Akhbar, June 4)

Erasing Name of Israel from Books, Maps. Kamil Junhlat, the Lebanese Minister of Education, asked all schools to delete, from all books used by the students, everything which was connected with Israel; this was to include books in scientific libraries. The pages which contained the offending information were to be torn out of the books and kept in closed archives. (R. Amman, March 1-IMB, March 2)

The libraries of the American University of Beirut and the British Council of Beirut were also subjected to this order. The director of the latter complained: "We have been careful in selecting our books to avoid giving offence. But if your library includes an encyclopedia, it obviously contains references to Israel. We have made representations direct to the Ministry of Education that the British Council library is a centre of research and not here for the propagation of views." (Daily Telegraph, April 8)

In Dec the security service searched libraries and bookstores for books and maps containing references to the existence of Israel. It reportedly discovered that such books and maps had been introduced into Lebanon by Zionist organizations. (Siyasah, Dec 10; see also Hawadith, Feb 10)

LEBANON

Views on Harms and Benefits of Boycott to Lebanon. At the beginning of the year the case of the SS Mars continued to disturb Lebanon. There was much criticism of the conduct of the boycott, particularly in that it was harming the Lebanese economy. (See MER 1960, p 188.)

Thereupon, the Minister of Economy stated that the boycott would confer benefits on the Lebanese economy: "We say that we forbid Lebanese merchants to deal with a firm which produces certain kind of goods because that firm cooperates with Israel. If all the producers of that particular commodity cooperated with Israel, all Lebanese financiers would unite to produce that commodity in Lebanon. New enterprises would spring up in Lebanon, and the Lebanese economy would gain solidity in every field." (Anwar, Jan 20)

Issue of "Star of David" on Merchandise. Security personnel impounded French-made spectacles bearing the "Zionist emblem" [the Star of David] from two stores, one of them co-owned by Deputy Adnan al-Hakim, the [extremist pan-Arab and pro-UAR] leader of the Najjādh. Hakim stated that the raid on his store was a hostile act against himself. The authorities had not tried to prevent the importing of the spectacles, but publicized their presence in his store, although similar spectacles were sold in many stores in Lebanon. Sulayman al-Ali, the Minister of Economy, and Nadim Hallaq, the head of the boycott office, denied any knowledge of the matter. (Nahar, April 6)

In Nov it was reported that after receiving information that reputable sweet shops sold sweet boxes decorated with the Star of David, security officers had detained the shopkeepers and had impounded a great number of Israeli sweets. (Nahar, Nov 29)

Blacklisting; Government Said Procrastinating in Boycott Implementation. In the second half of 1960, 162 firms were put on the black list of the Lebanese boycott office; 26 firms were removed from the list. Thirty-five ships were blacklisted, whereas nine were removed from the list. Sixteen firms were prohibited. The office was studying the case of 326 firms and 189 other boycott matters. (Jarideh, Jan 12)

In Dec it was reported that ten firms under investigation for dealings with Israel, including one Japanese and some American firms, were operating in Lebanon under assumed names, after they had been prohibited from importing goods into Lebanon and other Arab countries. (Siyasah, Dec 31)

It was reported that the government procrastinated in approving the recommendations of the boycott office for blacklisting; at the end of the year 130 recommendations were awaiting action. (Anwar, Aug 6; Hayat, Sept 7; Siyasah, Dec 31; see also below: Questions of Boycott's Effectiveness.)

Competition in Fruit Marketing. There were several reports that the marketing of Lebanese fruit abroad suffered because of Israeli competition. Citrus importers in Europe tended to buy Israeli fruit and to boycott Lebanese produce, it was reported in Lebanon in Feb. The Director of the Lebanese Fruit Office said Lebanon would approach the countries concerned on an official level, as well as contact the importers, to put an end to that situation "by all possible means." (Anwar, Feb 4)

At the same time the director of the Fruit Office was reported to have disclosed that Israeli citrus fruit was being introduced to Arab countries, mostly to the Syrian Region, via Turkey. He added that the Foreign Ministry had sent a representative to Damascus to discuss the matter (Amal, Feb 4). Some days later the Fruit Office denied this as well as the report that the Damascus authorities were impeding the sale of Lebanese fruit. (Hayat, Feb 11)

In Dec it was reported that farmers and exporters complained about the stiff competition from Italy and Israel, which the Lebanese produce encountered. It was said to have been proved by Lebanese investigations that Israel was dumping large quantities of citrus fruit in order to eliminate the Lebanese fruit from the markets. The pressure of "Zionist financiers" was also seen as a serious impediment. (Anwar, Dec 14)

Foreign Banks and Companies in Lebanon Reported Tied to Israel and Aided by Former Lebanese Boycott Head. Reports appeared several times about alleged contacts with Israel of (unnamed foreign) banks operating in Lebanon. Deputy Muhaim Slim was reported to have alleged in the Chamber that Lebanon had informed the Arab League of her refusal to put into effect the boycott regulations against such banks. A report by one of Lebanon's security services was said to have established the following facts: Foreign firms in Lebanon, which were reputed to market 60% of all imported goods in the country, were dodging taxes and engaging in other illegal practices; it was proved that several of them had Israel capital in them. Some of them had been blacklisted, but continued to market their goods by illegal methods. Among the latter was a Japanese firm, which distributed 85% of all Japanese goods sold in Lebanon. A spokesman of the Ministry of Finance said the boycott law would be implemented against these firms, "in pursuance of the interests of Lebanon." (Jarideh, Aug 11)

According to a memorandum from the "Third Boycott Congress in Kuwait," it was reported, the names of foreign firms in Lebanon which cooperated with Israel had been selected for removal from the black list with the aid of Shams ad-Din Najim, then director of the boycott office in Beirut. When this was brought to the attention of the then PM, Rasid Karkam, at the 14th meeting of the boycott office in Beirut [1959], he transferred Shams ad-Din to another government job. The latter then began cooperating with blacklisted foreign firms in order to create difficulties for the boycott office. (Siyasah, April 9)

Lebanese Firm Said Israeli-Owned. In April it was reported that the Lebanese boycott office had officially informed the Central Office in Damascus that the Bafqa Chocolate and Sweets Company would be sued before a military tribunal after it had been proved that the Israel firm of Elite owned 51% of its shares. It transpired that the managers of Bafqa were contacting highly placed circles in order to quash the accusation (Siyasah, April 6). The Bafqa company, however, announced that it was a purely Lebanese firm. (Hadaf, April 1; see also Falastin, March 28, Haq'e'iq, Aug 3.)

Lebanese Consul Accused. The Honorary Consul of Lebanon in Toronto was accused, in a letter sent by the President of the Friends of the Middle East in Canada, of giving material and moral assistance to Zionism. The President asked that the Consul be relieved of his post, as he was "the worst enemy of the Arabs in Canada" (Anwar, Nov 19). The Lebanese Foreign Ministry said in a statement that it had instructed the embassy in Canada to investigate the matter. The Ministry added that it would have preferred receiving the letter before its publication in the press. It was stressed that the Ministry occasionally received similar letters; the writers were motivated by private or political interests (Hayat, Nov 21). The Arab League also instructed its representative in Canada to report on the matter. (Akhbar al-Yawm, Dec 2)

ADEN AND THE PERSIAN GULF

Aden Colony and Protectorates. A boycott committee, headed by Abdallah as-Salafi, was active in Aden. In Nov it opened an office in Sbaykh Uthman (BBCM, Feb 1; R. Cairo, Nov 14 [16]). Cairo sources repeatedly claimed, sometimes in the name of the Aden committee, that Israeli goods were marketed in quantity in Aden and in Southern Arabia in general. The alleged Israeli goods were said to bear forged trade marks or none at all, and the inhabitants were urged to be vigilant in this respect. Some people, however, were said to display open sympathy for Israel, among them the Chairman of the Aden Chamber of Commerce. Israeli trade in Aden was said to amount to half a million shillings a year. (R. Cairo, March 19 [21], April 6 [8], Dec 12 [14]; Haq'e'iq, April 7; Ruz al-Yusuf, Aug 14; Akhbar Sa'ah, Dec 6)

The Aden boycott committee contacted some Hadhramis with the object of opening a branch in the Hadhramaut. The Hadhramaut paper At-Taf'ah was the first to support the idea. (R. Cairo, Feb 27 [March 1])

The Cairo "Voice of the Arabs" said that an Imam

in a mosque in the Mu'alla district gave a speech praising the boycott. "We hope that all other ulama' in Aden will undertake their duties in this respect," the commentator added. The station also broadcast an appeal from the Aden boycott committee to the people of Djibouti not to deal with Israel. (R. Cairo, Feb 11 [14])

Persian Gulf Shaykhdoms. A boycott office had begun operations in Qatar, it was reported in April. (Al-Yawm, Beirut, April 19)

In Feb. Abd al-Karim al-A'idi, Chief of the Central Boycott Office, accompanied the League SG on a tour of the Gulf Shaykhdoms and had talks in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Qatar on the establishment of boycott offices there. (R. Cairo, Feb 5, 8-IMB, Feb 6, 9; R. Amman, Feb 20-IMB, Feb 21). The Abu Dhabi and Sharjah shaykhdoms were reported to have decided to implement the boycott following the visit. (Falastin, Feb 21; R. Baghdad, April 3 [6])

The Kuwaiti Director-General of the ports and customs, who was also in charge of the boycott, stated in Jordan—where he met with the Chief of the Central Boycott Office—that Kuwait would play an important role in the boycott implementation. (Falastin, Oct 2)

AFRICA AND ASIA

(See also The Arab League and Africa, pp 102-3; and the sections on the Arab countries' and Israel's relations with African and Asian countries.)

Arab Estimations of Situation. Isâm Hilmi al-Masri, director of the UAR boycott office, stated that after Israel had felt the increased economic pressure exerted upon her by the Arab states, and in view of the anticipated termination of German reparations, she turned to the markets of Asian and African countries. Because these countries lacked hard currency and technical know-how, Israel succeeded initially. However, Israel was driven out of these countries by the appearance of Arab products made of better raw materials, as well as by Arab diplomatic successes such as the Afro-Asian conferences which adopted anti-Israel resolutions. (Heqa'iq, June 1)

On the other hand, F. Albina, a Jordanian merchant, who together with a group of merchants from other Arab countries made a goodwill tour of African states, reported that Israeli exports and commercial agents were to be found "everywhere" in Africa, and that the Arab boycott had apparently failed dismally. (Jer. Post, Aug 18)

(The value of Israel's exports to sub-Saharan African countries, excluding South Africa, grew from $3.2m. in 1960 to $5.4m. in 1961. See: The ME Foreign Trade.)

Kâmil ash-Sharif, Deputy Secretary-General of the Islamic Congress in Jerusalem, complained that Israel had made progress in Nigeria through her economic assistance programme, through visits of Israelis, and through the circulation of Israeli books, magazines, and pamphlets. Sharif wrote that many Nigerians had asked him the "unanswerable" question: "You ask us to cooperate with us [you] and to refuse to cooperate with Israel. But have you helped yourselves and have you closed the routes by which Israel is reaching us?" Sharif remarked that the question of the Gulf of Adaba was of utmost importance. (Middle East Forum, Jan)

Lebanese Emigrants in Africa Said Cooperating With Israel. A draft bill was reportedly prepared in Lebanon for the punishment of Lebanese emigrants who maintained ties with Israeli enterprises. Many Arab emigrants in Africa and America maintained close ties with Jewish enterprises which, in turn, had ties with Israel. (Nahar, Jan 27)

Later it was reported that Lebanese emigrants who cooperated with Israel would be arrested when they returned to Lebanon and would be tried by a military tribunal. The names of 12 emigrants who cooperated with Israel in Africa had been received from the Lebanese ambassador in Guinea. (Al-Yawm, Beirut, April 30)

EUROPEAN COUNTRIES AND THE US

Germany. The Arab League suggested to its members to establish an Arab exhibition in West Germany to counter the Israel mobile exhibition shown there. (Difa, Feb 13)

Italy. The Arab ambassadors in Rome resolved to co-ordinate their activities to counter Israel's economic relations with Italy, to enforce the boycott, and to promote Arab-Italian trade. (Falastin, March 2)

Netherlands. Dutch government officials in Amsterdam criticized the UAR threat to blacklist Dutch shipping. Debating the question in Parliament, a government spokesman condemned Dutch exporters who yielded to Arab pressure in order to do business with the UAR. Members of Parliament had expressed anxiety over the UAR demands and called on Foreign Minister Joseph Luns to ignore the Arab warnings and to extend credit facilities to Dutch firms trading with Israel. (NE Report, March 1)

Spain. The Lebanese Ambassador in Madrid was said to have reported that Spain had become a market for Israeli goods and for exploitation by Jewish capital; Israel's success was the result of competitive prices of her products and the ineffectiveness of the Arab boycott. (Answer, July 12)

The United Kingdom. The declared policy of the British government was to reject the Arab boycott of Israel, and the British investments in Israel were the best practical refutation of the boycott, the British commercial attaché in Israel stated in June. (Ha'aretz, June 18)

The United States. (For US policy on Freedom of Navigation and the Arab Boycott see: The US and the Arab-Israel Conflict.)

A US cigarette company, the Brown and Williamson Tobacco Co. of Louisville, Kentucky, which four years previously had stopped supplying Israel with the brands it manufactured and distributed, decided to end its boycott of Israel following the pressure exerted on it by various American organizations, most recently by the Italian-American Democratic Organizations of New York State. (Jer. Post, Aug 7, 8, Oct 15; Ha'aretz, Oct 15)

It was reported from Amman that Jordan had forbidden all transactions with the Emerson Radio and Phonograph Corporation of the US and its affiliates throughout the world because of alleged business deals with Israel. (Jer. Post, Dec 31)

The Secretariat of the Arab League asked member states to boycott the US firm which had participated in the erection of the first atomic reactor in Israel. (Akhar, July 3)

Hilton Rejects Threat. Alfred Lilienthal, secretary of the American-Arab Association for Commerce and Industry, wrote to Conrad Hilton of the Hilton Hotels chain and warned him in the name of the Central Boycott Office:

"If you build a hotel in Israel, it means the loss of your holdings in Cairo, and the end of any plans you might have in Tunis, Baghdad, Jerusalem or any Arab country. In addition, the Saudi Royal family, Egyptian businessmen, Arab and American companies who service the Arab states will not stop at your hotels in America or any part of the world." To this Hilton replied: "As Americans we consider Arabs and Jews our friends... There was no threat from Israel when we built our Cairo hotel. Does your committee also propose to boycott the United States Government because it maintains diplomatic relations with Israel?" (Daily Telegraph, Dec 30). [The construction of the Hilton hotel in Tel Aviv was started on May 1, 1962; no boycott measures against the Hilton hotel in Cairo—or elsewhere—were reported.]

QUESTIONS OF BOYCOTT'S EFFECTIVENESS

NOTE: Additional items related to the question of the boycott's effectiveness will be found under other headings, and especially: Lebanon, Africa and Asia, Aden and the Persian Gulf.

Boycott as Legitimate Weapon. Maj-Gen Isâm al-Masri, director of the UAR boycott office, claimed that the US recognized the principle of economic boycott and employed it against companies trading with China or with Soviet bloc countries. (Ahram, April 5)

Reported Consequences of Boycott. In April Cairo Radio reported that as a result of the Arab boycott 300 companies had stopped trading with Israel; 270 ships and tankers had ceased calling at Israeli ports; 150 commercial enterprises in Israel were closed in 1960, and the country had suffered a loss of $70m. in addition to $20m. which Israel spent in establishing an office to fight the boycott. (V of A, April 21-IMB, April 23)

A Lebanese paper claimed that an Israeli secret report said that the Arab boycott would bring Israel to the verge of economic catastrophe by the end of 1963. In addition to $20m. openly earmarked to fight the Arab boycott, Israel would spend $200m. of secret funds for this purpose. (Kul Shay, Aug 1, 2)

Eilat Port Seen Frustrating Boycott. Israel's Red Sea port of Eilat was reducing the impact of the Arab boycott, a member of the Lebanese parliamentary committee on foreign affairs stated: because of Eilat, Israel's exports had risen from $60m. to $320m. A Foreign Ministry spokesman stated that after the International Conference on the Law of the Sea at Geneva would adopt a decision [on the Arab demand to extend the limit of territorial waters in the Gulf of Aqaba to twelve miles; see MER 1960, p 179] the Arab world would have to consider political and military measures about Eilat. He was of the opinion that Israel's exports had increased because the big powers aided her. (Anwar, Jan 25)

Complaints of Obstruction and Ineffectiveness. In Jan the Baghdad paper As-Siyasi Al-Jadid referred to reports that attempts were being made somewhere in the Arab countries to obstruct the boycott. (Quoted in Iraq Times, Jan 27)

In Feb another Baghdad paper, complaining about ineffectiveness of the boycott, said this was the result of lax enforcement. The boycott administration was showing signs of negligence. Israeli products were being dumped in the markets of the Arab countries; land and air routes between Israel and the Arab states were open to Israeli goods. Israeli coins were capturing the rows of money changers in the market. Ships and firms on the black list disappeared from it after a short time, throwing suspicion on the seriousness of the boycott. The present administration of the boycott helped the prosperity of Israel. Boycott activity should be drastic and widespread in order for the Arabs to save face, considering that the boycott was, for the time being, the only battlefield between the Arabs and Israel. (Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 29)

After the breakup of the UAR a [pro-UAR] Beirut daily reported that many activities of the boycott offices had stopped completely as a result of the lack of communications with the main office in Damascus. (Anwar, Oct 10)

Arabs Said to Trade With Israel. In June, a Cairo paper claimed that in Aden merchants had steady relations with Israeli agents and bought goods marked "Made in Jerusalem." In Beirut, the names of people who smuggled sheep into Israel were on everybody's mouth. In other places on Arab soil there were Israeli agents, and many merchants who sold enemy goods after substituting the trade marks. (Haq'iq, Cairo, June 15; see also under: Lebanon, above)

Between 1958 and 1960 Israel was said to have been smuggling into Lebanon and other Arab countries electrical appliances and other goods which she had not been able to sell abroad. When this was discovered, Israel sold its products to European firms which re-exported them to Arab countries as European-made. (Nahar, July 12)

(For additional items on alleged Israeli penetration of Arab markets, see: Lebanon; Africa and Asia.)

Corrupt Practices of Office Heads Alleged. In Feb a [pro-UAR] Lebanese daily reported a scandal in the boycott offices, and accused some of the office directors of betraying the aim of the boycott. According to the newspaper, several heads of the boycott offices were profiteering from the boycott by working on behalf of some Arab firms against others. A letter written by one regional office director, in which he falsely accused "a respected Arab enterprise" of cooperating with Israel, "accidentally" reached a rival enterprise, which promptly printed the letter and disseminated thousands of copies. A military investigation proved the charges false; that however, was unimportant, for the aim obviously was that the letter reach the rival enterprise. A report by another office director accused a highly respected personage of working on behalf of Israel. The Director-General of the Central Boycott Office in Damascus, Abd al-Karim al-A'idi, for whom the paper had high praise, had decided to investigate several regional directors in this connection. (Anwar, Feb 8)

An American Assessment. Fortune magazine reported in July 1961 that the Arabs had blacklisted over 300 firms from all over the world, more than twice as many as four years ago. The number of US firms on the list had risen from about 20 in 1957 to nearly four times that figure. The magazine remarked that "the lengthening black list is actually an indication that the boycott is nothing like the tightening noose around Israel that Arab propagandists claim it to be. In fact, the Israeli economy is steadily improving, despite Arab efforts to strangle it." (Fortune, July)

Complaints of Lebanese Procrastinations. At the beginning of the year the case of the SS Mars (see MER 1960, p 188) continued to agitate Lebanon.

A new Lebanese draft bill on the organization of the Boycott of Israel Office was to have been submitted to the Council of Ministers before being proposed to the Arab League (MENA, March 17 [20]). The draft, however, was "frozen in the Cabinet." (Anwar, Sept 5)

In Dec the [pro-UAR] weekly Kul Shay' reported that a political crisis was about to occur in the Arab League because of Lebanon's attitude on the boycott. The Lebanese boycott office had failed to act on some 130 boycott decisions executed by all other Arab countries, for only in Lebanon did boycott decisions require the approval of the government; the government, however, was procrastinating, and Israel was exploiting the situation. As a result, the boycott offices had decided to place the issue on the political level, and had requested the Arab League to convene an emergency session to deal with it. (Kul Shay', Dec 9; see also under: Lebanon, above)

ARAB-ISRAEL BORDER RELATIONS

NOTE: See MER 1960, p 189, for notes on sources and background information.

SYNOPSIS

BORDER RELATIONS IN GENERAL

1961 was a relatively quiet year on the Arab-Israeli border. The Syrian border remained the most unruly. Recurrent armed encounters, though on a small scale, were sparked mostly by fire from Syrian positions at Israelis cultivating in the demilitarized zones, and by interference with Israeli fishing in the Sea of Galilee. The Lebanese border remained the most quiet; Lebanon, however, restricted even further legal traffic over the border. Jordan was still the only Arab country to permit large-scale personal traffic over the border. Jordan complained to the Security Council over a violation of the Armistice Agreement by Israel through bringing heavy arms into Jerusalem for a military parade. The greatest number of armed infiltrators into Israel were intercepted in the vicinity of the Gaza strip and Sinai. Except for an aerial encounter, however, no clashes took place between the regular forces of Israel and the UAR.

Casualties reported in the incidents recorded below were as follows: three Israelis, one of them a border policeman, were killed—all in the vicinity of the Syrian border; five Israelis were wounded in this area; three Israeli policemen were wounded on the Jordanian border and two civilians were wounded by infiltrators from Jordan. Twenty-four armed infiltrators were killed on Israeli territory. These included 18 in the vicinity of the Gaza strip and Sinai—three of whom were identified as intelligence agents—as well as three intelligence agents from Syria, two infiltrators from Jordan, and one from Lebanon. A number of infiltrators were wounded and captured. One Jordanian soldier was killed on Israeli territory.

THE ISRAEL-SYRIAN BORDER

Synopsis. Although no armed clash occurred between Israel and Syria on the scale of the Tawafiq incident in 1960 (MER 1960, p 197), tension remained high. There were frequent shooting incidents when Syrian positions opened fire on Israelis cultivating fields in the demilitarized zones, which the Syrians regarded as aggression. Such incidents often led to an exchange of fire between units of the armed forces of the two countries; a spate of such incidents in June ended only after the intervention of the UNTSO Chief of Staff with the Syrian and Israeli governments. Vehicles in the Israeli border area repeatedly hit mines which, Israel alleged, had been laid by Syrians. Syrian interference with Israeli fishing in the north-eastern part of the Sea of Galilee continued as in former years and also led to shooting incidents. Persons identified by the Israeli authorities as Syrian intelligence agents were intercepted in Israel. Syria charged Israel with violating Syrian airspace.

At the end of the year, Cairo charged that from the break-up of the UAR (Sept 28) the Syrian government had adopted a weak stand on border issues. Available reports, however, indicated that Syrian intransigence on the border had continued unchanged.

Border Incidents (January-June). NOTE: The majority of the incidents recorded below were reported by Israeli sources only, as far as could be established.

On Jan 9 the Syrians penetrated into what was termed the [northern] "Israel sovereign demilitarized zone" near She'ar Yashuv, and attempted to cultivate lands there, in full view of UNTSO observers at Tel Hanzir. They were covered by Syrian soldiers from the Tel Aziziyat stronghold. Israel lodged a complaint with UNTSO (Ma'ariv, Jan 9). A similar attempt by Syrians in the southern DZ was prevented by an Israeli patrol. (Ha'aretz, Feb 19)

On Feb 5, an Israeli tractor driver escaped injury when he was fired on by Syrian positions at Tawafiq [southern DZ]. Israel lodged a complaint with the MAC. (Ha'aretz, Feb 6)

On Feb 12 Syrian positions near Bahariyat opened machine-gun fire on Shamir [Jordan valley] which continued for 15 minutes. Several buildings were hit (Ha'aretz, Feb 13). On Feb 24 an Israeli tractor hit a mine near Sha'ar Hagolan [Jordan Valley]. (Ha'aretz, Feb 26)

On March 8 Israeli sources reported that two tractors working near She'ar Yashuv came under heavy machine-gun fire from positions at Tel Aziziyat and Bahariyat. Israeli forces returned the fire, which lasted about four hours. One Israeli was slightly wounded (Kol Israel, March 8 [W 16]; Ha'aretz, March 9). UAR sources reported the incident as follows: two Israeli tractors, guarded by an infantry detachment and two armoured vehicles, had crossed the Syrian border at Tel Ubaydat, whereupon they were intercepted by farmers. The Israelis opened fire, which the Syrian positions returned; there were no Syrian casualties. (R. Cairo, March 8 [W 16])

On May 30 an Israeli border policeman was killed by fire opened up by Syrians across the border and aimed at the Mishmar Hayarden [Jordan valley] police station. UN observers investigated the incident. (IGPO/WNB, May 31-June 6)

On June 6 Israel complained to the MAC that the Syrians had cut off the water from a spring irrigating the fields of Shamir. (Kol Israel, June 6 [W 15]; Ha'aretz, June 9)

Heightened Tension (June 19-26). On June 20 the Israeli military spokesman announced that Syrian positions at Tel Arziyot had opened machine-gun fire on June 19 and 20 on Israeli workers and tractor drivers engaged in cultivation near She'ar Yashuv. Three attacks took place on June 19; in response, the second and heaviest, Israeli forces silenced the Syrian fire. On the same day, guards of the national water carrier near Kibbutz Huqoq [north of the Sea of Galilee] were attacked by a group of armed Syrians. A shepherd who was with the guards was killed and a watchman was wounded (Ha'aretz, June 20, 21, 22). On the following evening (June 20) Syrian positions opened fire on a tractor working in Israeli territory near She'ar Yashuv. Israeli forces returned the fire until the Syrians requested a cease-fire through the UNTSO. Israel lodged complaints with the MAC on both incidents. (IGPO/WNB, June 14-20).

On June 21 Syrian positions at Tel Hilal and Jalabina, east of the Hula region, again fired on three tractor drivers in the DZ and hit a car. The UNTSO investigated. (Ha'aretz, June 22)

The UAR version of the three days' incidents was that on June 19, 20 and 21 an Israeli tractor entered the "Arab demilitarized zone", "thus committing aggression." It was accordingly fired on until it withdrew. (R. Damascus, June 21 [W 29])

On the night of June 21-22 Syrian army positions opened up four times with automatic fire across the border between Dardara and Bnot Ya'aqov Bridge in the central DZ, according to Israeli sources. Damascus, however, claimed that the Israelis had tried to attack the Dardara position, but had been fired on and driven off. The Israeli military spokesman denied that an attack had been attempted. (IGPO/WNB, June 21-28; R. Damascus, Kol Israel, June 22 [W 29])

On June 22 Syrian positions opened fire on farmers of Dan [near the northern DZ], who together with UN observers were trying to put out a fire next to the UN observations post at Tel el Qadi. On the same day fire was directed by positions at Dorqiat towards Mishmar Hayarden. The firing continued at intervals throughout the night. The Israeli side did not return the fire. (IGPO/WNB, June 21-28)

On the night of June 23 fire from a Syrian military position was directed at Gadot, Ashmura and at the police station of Mishmar Hayarden [central DZ]. On June 25 Syrian positions at Tel Hilal and Jalabina opened fire on Israeli villages. Buildings at Ashmura were hit but there were no casualties.

The Syrians lodged a complaint with the MAC on Israeli armed penetration into Syrian territory near Misha-mar Haymed. This was denied by the Israel military spokesman (Hayat, Ha'aretz, June 23). Continuous consultations were said to be taking place between Damascus and Cairo (Hayat, June 25); Israel was reported to be concentrating troops on the Syrian border. (Hayat, June 29)

On June 23 Israel sent a letter to the Security Council advising that the situation on the north-eastern frontier was "liable to cause a serious threat to peace in the area." The letter stressed that these (Syrian) actions, which had occurred over a number of days and along 30 kilometres of frontier, must be regarded as resulting from a deliberate Syrian policy "which was out to intensify active hostility towards Israel" (S/4843). Before sending the letter, Israel Foreign Ministry officials had discussed the situation with Maj-Gen von Horn, UNTSO Chief-of-Staff. It was assumed that Israel was not satisfied with the outcome of the talks, hence the letter to the SC (Ha'aretz, June 23). Ha'aretz wrote that the

Syrians were trying to create tension in the area in order to sabotage Israel's water development schemes. (Ha'aretz, June 22)

UAR commentators ascribed the incidents to Israeli aggression, which, they said, was connected with internal difficulties in Israel or aimed at inducing the UN to enforce peace between Israel and the Arab states (Akhbar, Gummuriyah, June 21, 25; R. Cairo, June 23 [26]). Al-Hayât was of the opinion that Israel was out to sabotage the conference of the Arab Joint Defence Council then taking place, and to cover her intended diversion of the Jordan waters. (Hayat, June 27, 29)

On June 28 Maj-Gen von Horn, having discussed the situation with the Syrian authorities, met Golda Meir, the Israel Minister of Foreign Affairs (Ha'aretz, June 29). [Thereafter tension subsided into normalcy]; on June 28, for the first time since the shooting had begun, no incidents were reported. (Jer. Post, June 29)

Border Incidents (July-December). On July 4, 13 and 24, Syrian positions near the Bnot Ya'aqov bridge sniped at various targets across the border. (Jer. Post, July 5; Ha'aretz, July 14; Kol Israel, July 25 [W Aug 3])

In Sept a tractor driver from Gadot was severely wounded when his tractor hit a Syrian mine, said to have been recently laid by Syrians. (Ha'aretz, Sept 3)

In Sept, after coordination with Syria through UNTSO, Israeli workers cleared the drainage ditch to the west of Tawafiq in the southern DZ (on which see MER 1960, pp 191 (map) 197). (Ha'aretz, Sept 21)

On Oct 30 and Nov 1 an Israeli tractor working near Tel Katzir [southern DZ] was fired at from Syrian positions, according to both Arab and Israeli sources. (IGPO/WNB, Oct 25-31, Nov 1-7; R. Damascus, Oct 30 [Nov 1], Nov 1 [3]; Hayat, Oct 31, Nov 2)

On Nov 3 Israeli sources reported that Syrians had opened machine-gun fire on Dardara village (Ha'aretz, Nov 5). On Nov 15 an armoured vehicle of the Israel Border Police struck a mine near Mishmar Hayarden. No casualties were reported. (Ha'aretz, Nov 16)

On Nov 17 an Israeli army officer was wounded when the UN car in which he and a UN Observer were travelling struck a mine near the Syrian border. The mine was thought to have been laid the previous night. Investigations revealed the footprints of two men leading to a Syrian position. Half an hour later, Syrian soldiers opened rifle and machine-gun fire on a tractor driver at work in the Tel Katzir area; an exchange of fire lasting 30 minutes followed. Israel complained to the MAC (IGPO/WNB, Nov 15-21). On Dec 7 a tractor hit a mine on a road leading to Korzim village, which had suffered no Syrian attack since May. (Ha'aretz, Dec 8)

Incidents on Sea of Galilee [The whole of the Sea of Galilee is in Israel territory, including a demilitarized 10-metre wide strip on the north-eastern shore.]

On March 26 the MAC investigated an Israeli complaint that Syrians had stolen fishing nets near the north-eastern shores of the Sea of Galilee. (Ha'aretz, March 27)

The thefts continued during the following weeks. Israeli fishing vessels were also shot at by Syrian positions on the shore. On April 25, according to Israeli sources, an Israeli patrol boat came to the aid of the fishermen; an exchange of fire lasting for half an hour followed between the boat and the Syrian position on the shore. No Israeli casualties were reported. According to UAR sources, an Israeli force had attempted to land on the eastern shore of the lake but it was obstructed by Arab villagers. Thereupon the Israeli soldiers had opened fire, which was returned; two Israeli soldiers had been injured. (Ha'aretz, April 24, 26; R. Cairo, April 27-IMB, April 28)

In Sept fishing nets were again stolen by the Syrians. (Jer. Post, Sept 13)

Aerial Incidents—June-Sept. On June 23 [at the time of heightened tension on the Syrian border] an Arab International Airlines aircraft bound for Damascus was reported to have been molested by Israeli military aircraft outside the airspace of "occupied Palestine." (R. Damascus, June 23 [W 29])

On July 27 a First [Syrian] Army spokesman said that two Israeli aircraft had crossed into Syrian airspace in the direction of Damascus, where sirens were sounded; anti-aircraft guns had driven the aircraft off (ANA, July 27 [W Aug 3]). An Israel military spokesman denied that Israeli aircraft had violated Syrian airspace. (Ha'aretz, July 30)

An Israel military spokesman announced that on the night of Sept 27 several "enemy aircraft" had penetrated Israel airspace for aerial photography; they were driven off by Israeli fighter planes after a brief exchange of fire. It was reported that the enemy aircraft had exploded flares over different places to enable photographs to be taken. [It appears that these aircraft were based in Egypt and Syria.] (Ha'aretz, Sept 29)

UAR Intelligence Agents Intercepted. On Jan 5 two infiltrators armed with a submachine gun and hand grenades were killed in a clash with an Israeli patrol in central Galilee, while a third managed to escape. According to Israeli sources, the men were Syrian intelligence agents who had penetrated into Israel through Lebanese territory, and it was suspected that they had been active in the area for some time. (Jer. Post, Jan 8; Ma'ariv, Jan 17)

In Nov an Arab infiltrator was killed near Kfar Giladi. It was revealed that the man had worked for the Syrian intelligence and penetrated into Israel several times. He had been caught in 1956 but had managed to escape. (Ha'aretz, Nov 6)

On April 12 two Israelis, who had defected to Syria in 1960, were caught re-crossing into Israel. They said they had been held in prison, but were vague as to their sudden release. (Ha'aretz, April 14)

Various Incidents. On May 25 an Israeli Arab was killed by Syrian soldiers while trying to enter Syria. (Ha'aretz, May 28)

In July the Syrians informed the MAC that they were holding an Israeli who had escaped from prison in Israel, where he had been serving a life sentence for murder. In May Israel asked for his return. The Syrians offered to exchange him for six Syrian seamen detained in Israel since April (when they were taken with a Lebanese vessel in Israel territorial waters.) Israel rejected this offer on the grounds that the fishermen were still awaiting trial. (Ha'aretz, July 3, 12)

Cairo Accuses Syria of Weak Stand on Border Questions. In Dec, after the break-up of the UAR, a Cairo paper attacked the Syrian government, claiming that since its separation from Egypt, Syria had been busy with separatist activity and discontinued resisting Israeli attempts to reclaim agricultural lands in the DZ. The paper also said that Maj-Gen von Horn, who was in Damascus, had entered into discussions with the Syrian authorities for the purpose of removing the army from fortified positions, near the Sea of Galilee which had been occupied during the Egyptian-Syrian union. (Masa', Dec. 13)

THE ISRAEL-UAR (EGYPTIAN) BORDER

Synopsis. The frontier was quiet throughout the year. The UN Emergency Force remained stationed along the border on UAR territory—in the Gaza strip and Sinai, and at the Straits of Tiran. There were, however, a number of reported violations of airspace by both sides: in one case an air battle ensued over the border area. A number of armed encounters took place inside Israel territory between Israeli patrols and UAR intelligence squads and other armed infiltrators, who suffered a considerable number of fatalities: Israeli villages sustained much damage from thefts by infiltrators. Some Israeli citizens illegally crossed the armistice line into the Gaza strip; none were reported to have been returned by the UAR authorities, except in secret for intelligence purposes. There was no legal traffic across the border, apart from UNTSO officers.

Armed Infiltrators Killed in Israel Territory. Israeli sources reported the following casualties inflicted by Israeli patrols on armed infiltrators in Israel territory.

In the vicinity of the Gaza strip: On Jan 31—2 Bedouin killed, 1 wounded; on Feb 17—1 killed; in April—1 killed; on May 16—1 killed, 2 captured; on May 19—1 killed; on July 11—2 killed.

Opposite Sinai: On Jan 25—1 killed, in a clash with a band of armed Bedouin; on July 22—2 killed; on Aug 26—1 killed; on Dec 17—3 killed, 1 captured. (Additional loss of life was suffered by intelligence squads—for which see below.) (Ha'aretz, Jan 26, Feb 2, 19, July 13, Dec 18; Kol Israel, May 1 [W 4], 17, 21 [W 25], July 13 [W 20], 24 [W 27], Aug 28 [W Sept 7])

Egyptian Intelligence Squads Intercepted. (See MER 1960, p 193, for background note.) On Sept 28 two members of a squad of armed Arabs were killed in a clash with an Israeli border patrol in the Negev; a third escaped into the Gaza strip. Ammunition and documents were found on the bodies, and it was reported that the object of the incursion had been to return to Israel a former Israeli citizen as an agent. (NYT, Sept 30; Kol Israel, Sept 29, 30 [W Oct 5])

On Oct 2 two infiltrators were intercepted in the Negev. One was killed and the other captured. They carried Carl-Gustav machine guns and field glasses. The prisoner admitted that both were sent to Israel for intelligence purposes; both had been residents of the Rafah refugees camp. (Ha'aretz, Oct 3)

On Oct 3 an Arab infiltrator from the Gaza strip surrendered to an Israeli patrol. An Israeli citizen, he had first crossed into the Gaza strip two months earlier and had since re-crossed into Israel on intelligence missions. He said he had tried to disengage from intelligence work; when not allowed to do so, he had crossed into Israel on his own accord to give himself up. (Ha'aretz, Oct 5)

Aerial Incidents. On March 7 the MAC passed a resolution condemning Israel over an Egyptian complaint alleging that Israeli aircraft had fired on flocks in the Quseima area, in Sinai (R. Cairo, March 7 [W 16]). [Israel had not participated in the MAC with Egypt since 1956.] The text of the resolution was forwarded by the UAR to the UN Secretary General on March 16 to be circulated among the members of the Security Council. (S/4770)

On April 28 an Israeli military spokesman announced that an Egyptian MIG 17 jet fighter had been shot down that day by an Israeli Super-Mystère jet fighter in a fight over the Halutza area in the Negev. The Egyptian pilot had been seen parachuting on the border line, and fragments of the plane had been seen a few hundred metres inside the Egyptian border. Another Egyptian fighter had escaped. The Israeli planes had suffered no damage. A day before, four Egyptian MIG fighters were reported to have been driven off Israeli airspace over Nitzana. A UAR military spokesman said that Israeli fighters had flown over the border at Auja [Nitzana, not far from Halutza] and had been intercepted by UAR aircraft. In the air battle one UAR aircraft was hit but the pilot returned safely. Later that day, however, he said that after Israeli aircraft had crossed over the armistice line an air battle had ensued between 12 Israeli and eight UAR aircraft. One Israeli aircraft was shot down, and the rest withdrew. This was denied by Israeli army sources. (Kol Israel, R. Cairo, April 28 [May 1]; NYT, April 29; Ha'aretz, April 30)

On July 26 the UAR lodged protests with the MAC against an alleged violation of Gaza strip airspace at different points by 14 Israeli aircraft on July 25. An Israeli military spokesman denied the allegation. (Hayat, Jer. Post, July 27)

On the night of Sept 27 "enemy aircraft" penetrated Israel's airspace at several points for aerial photography. They were intercepted and driven off by Israeli fighters after an exchange of fire. [It appears that these were UAR aircraft.] (Ha'aretz, Sept 29)

On Nov 2 two Israeli aircraft were reported to have penetrated Gaza airspace. (MENA, Nov 2 [W 16])

Incidents on the Sea. On Feb 1 eight Israeli fishermen caught by the Egyptians in Oct 1960 near the Gaza shore were reported sentenced to 2 years imprisonment; their two boats were confiscated. (Hayat, Ha'aretz, Feb 2) (See also MER 1960, p 194.)

Three fishermen from Gaza in a dingy bound for Lebanon were picked up by a Danish ship on the high seas and handed over to the Israel coastguard, who escorted them to the border of Lebanese territorial waters. (Hayat, June 20; Ha'aretz, June 21)

Infiltration into Israel for Criminal Purposes. Theft, etc. Infiltration into Israel for purposes of theft which did not involve casualties were reported from time to time, as well as prison sentences imposed for such offences. (e.g., Ha'aretz, Jan 4, 9, Feb 21, Nov 20; Ma'ariv, Jan 19; Kol Israel, Jan 8 [W 12])

Israeli villages in the Western Negev opposite the Gaza strip suffered considerable damage from thefts by infiltrators. It was reported in Oct that such damage sustained by Nahal Oz amounted to about £115,000 and by Kfar Azza to £120,000 annually. (Ha'aretz, Oct 10)

Crossings from Israel. Cases were occasionally reported of Israeli residents—both Arabs and Jews—illegally leaving Israel for Egypt by crossing the armistice line. (Iraq Times, Jan 31; R. Cairo, June 24-IMB, June 25; Akhbar Sa'ah, Sept 27, Dec 27; Ha'aretz, Oct 10, Nov 29, Dec 31; Al-Yaum, Beirut, Dec 28)

THE ISRAEL-JORDANIAN BORDER

Synopsis. In general, the border remained quiet during the year. Legal border crossings, by tourists as well as by Christian Israeli citizens at Christmas and Easter, continued on the established lines. So did illegal border crossings, whether accidental or for criminal purposes; as reported, the latter were into Israel only. Persons who crossed the line with no criminal intent were returned to their country after some lapse of time. A number of armed encounters with infiltrators took place inside Israel, as did two minor clashes between security personnel of the two sides. There were some casualties.

Jordan complained to the Security Council against Israel's decision to hold her Independence Day military parade in Jerusalem with the participation of heavy arms of a strength beyond that permitted by the Armistice Agreement. The Security Council endorsed a resolution by the MAC requesting Israel to comply with the Agreement in this respect and also enjoined the members of the MAC (i.e., both Jordan and Israel) to cooperate so as to ensure that the Agreement would be complied with. Israel thereupon declared that she would call off the parade only if Jordan fully complied with all provisions of the Armistice Agreement, including those dealing with access to the Jewish holy places in the Old City and to Mount Scopus. Israel representatives walked out of a MAC meeting after the chairman (an UNTSO officer) abstained on an Israel draft resolution for dealing with the issue on these lines. The parade took place as planned, with no incident, and the heavy arms participating were removed from Jerusalem immediately afterwards.

Other issues which arose during the year were Jordanian allegations of Israeli aggression and provocations on Mount Scopus, Israel allegations of the desecration of Jewish holy places in Jordan, and a Jordanian complaint that Israel had constructed on Jordanian territory salt pans for her potash works at Sedom, on the southern shore of the Dead Sea.

Issue of Israel's Independence Day Parade in Jerusalem (March-April). In mid-March Israel had informed Jordan and the UN that the Independence Day parade would take place in Jerusalem on April 20 and would include heavy equipment of a strength beyond that allowed by the Armistice Agreement, but that this equipment would remain in Jerusalem for a few hours only. Jordan thereupon lodged a complaint with the MAC against Israel, as she had done on similar occasions in the past. (Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, March 16)

On March 17 Israel brought to Jerusalem heavy equipment for "a few hours' rehearsal" whereupon Jordan complained to the MAC that Israel had been massing forbidden equipment in Jerusalem (Ha'aretz, March 21; Hayat, March 23). On March 20 the MAC resolved by the votes of Jordan and the MAC Chairman that Israel take definite steps to prevent the re-occurrence of such a breach of the Armistice Agreement. (S/PV 948)

On April 1 Jordan complained to the Security Council (SC) that Israel was implementing its plans for the military parade in Jerusalem in spite of the MAC decision. Jordan asked that the SC be convened as soon as possible to discuss the Israeli "acts of military provocations which threaten international peace and security" (S/4777). Israel political circles said this was routine practice for Jordan each time an Israeli military parade took place in Jerusalem. They thought that this time it was a gesture to convince Abdel Nasser of King Hussein's "toughness" in view of the rapprochement between them (for which see: Inter-Arab Relations) (Ha'aretz, April 2, 3). Amman Radio, on the other hand, said that the Israeli action had been timed to influence the new US administration. (R. Amman, April 5 [7])

In a letter to the chairman of the SC on April 2, Israel recalled a decision taken by the MAC in 1958 according to which heavy arms, under UN inspection, were allowed to take part in the parade provided they were not supplied with ammunition. The letter cited four cases in which Jordan had brought heavy arms to the Old City. Israel was ready, it said, to cooperate in any way to ease Jordan's apprehensions "however ill-founded they might be" (S/4778). It was reported that several Western powers, among them the US, were trying to persuade Israel not to include heavy arms in the parade. Israel, however, was determined to go ahead with the parade as scheduled. (Ha'aretz, April 4, 9)

The SC met on April 6. The Jordanian representative said that the Israeli military parade was meant to intimidate Jordan. The Israel representative denied this, saying that Jordan's complaint concerned a mere technicality. He assured the SC that the parade would be held under UN observation and that all the equipment would be removed from Jerusalem soon after the parade was over. He repeated the points raised in his letter to the Chairman and again stressed that the arms would not be provided with ammunition. He also suggested that discussion of this matter be referred again to the MAC. The representatives of the UAR and the USSR supported Jordan and demanded that the MAC decision be complied with. The discussion was then adjourned.

The Council resumed its discussions on April 10. The UAR representative presented on behalf of his government and of that of Ceylon a draft resolution endorsing the MAC decision of March 20 and urging Israel to comply with it (S/4784). The French representative said that the parade could under no circumstances be regarded as a provocation and that Israel was ready to furnish the MAC and Jordan with assurances as to the peaceful nature of the parade. The British representative argued that the SC should uphold the MAC decision, even if it accepted Israel's assurance that the equipment was only for ceremonial purposes and that she did not intend to endanger peace in Jerusalem. The same view was expressed by the Chinese representative. The Israel representative said that the SC decision on this issue would be "an inflation of something which no member of the Council has seriously suggested is really a threat to international peace," while serious violations by Jordan had in the past been ignored by the SC. (S/PV 948)

On April 11 the US representative proposed an amendment to the UAR-Ceylon draft resolution to the effect that the SC request members of the MAC "to cooperate so as to ensure that the General Armistice Agreement will be complied with" (S/4785). The US representative said that Israel's act was contrary to the Armistice Agreement even if in substance it need not constitute a threat to peace. The question was, he said, "what effect such violation had on the force of the Armistice Agreement." The same view was voiced by the representatives of Chile, Ecuador and China.

Jordan, the UAR, and Ceylon opposed the American amendment on the grounds that it put Jordan on the same footing with Israel as violator of the Armistice Agreement. However, the amended resolution was accepted with the votes of eight members [US, UK, France, China, Turkey, Chile, Ecuador, and Liberia]. The USSR, the UAR, and Ceylon abstained. (S/PV 949)

On the same day an Israel spokesman said that the military parade in Jerusalem would take place in spite of the SC resolution, as Israel considered it to be a ceremonial event only (Ha'aretz, April 12). On April 12 a FM spokesman said that Israel would cancel the parade only if Jordan would fully comply with the provisions of the Armistice Agreement, including those dealing with free access to the Jewish holy places in the Old City and to Mount Scopus. This attitude was also expressed in an interview given by FM Ben-Gurion to a New York Times correspondent. (Ha'aretz, April 13; Kal Israel, April 14 [17])

On April 13 Israel lodged a complaint with the MAC against the concentration of Jordanian forces in the Old City of Jerusalem. The MAC met on April 14, 17, 18 and 19. Israel presented five proposals designed to help in securing compliance with the terms of the Armistice Agreement and the SC resolution. These were rejected by the Jordanians and the chairman [an UNTSO officer]. Israel then presented a draft resolution proposing that the MAC members should cooperate in fully implementing all the provisions of the Armistice Agreement. The Jordanians voted against this draft, and the chairman abstained; at this point the Israel delegation walked out of the meeting. In Israel's absence the meeting adopted a Jordanian resolution condemning Israel for bringing heavy arms to Jerusalem (Ha'aretz, April 16, 17, 18, 19, 21). A statement by the Israel Foreign Ministry said that the Israel representatives had been compelled to take this "drastic step" [of walking out] because of the "non-cooperative attitude displayed throughout the meeting by the other MAC members." (Jer. Post, April 21)

On April 19 SG Hammarskjöld presented to the SC a report from Maj-Gen von Horn, UNTSO Chief of Staff, on the proceedings of the MAC meeting. The report said that it "soon appeared that what Israel wanted to consider was the question of cooperation arising out of the SC resolution," and that Jordan considered that the Israel representative was "filibustering" the meeting. The attitude of the MAC chairman, according to the report, was that the MAC should not state principles concerning the observance of international obligations, and this attitude had prompted Israel to leave the meeting. (S/4792 add f)

On April 20 the Israeli parade, including heavy weapons, took place in Jerusalem as scheduled. There were no incidents. The heavy weapons were removed from Jerusalem immediately after the parade. (Ha'aretz, April 21, 23)

On April 21 the MAC adopted, in the absence of Israel, a resolution that Israel had violated the Armistice Agreement. The UN SG informed the SC to this effect. (Ha'aretz, April 23)

The press and radio services of the Arab states vigorously supported Jordan throughout the affair, although the Cairo Al-Gumhuriyah implied that Jordan did not show enough determination. (e.g. Gumhuriyah, April 6, 16, 19; R. Baghdad, April 8 [1]; Zaman, Baghdad, April 14; Hayat, April 20)

In Sept it was reported that the Arab League had decided to draw up a plan to "guard against the menace" which the introduction of heavy arms to "occupied Jerusalem" constituted to Arab security. (Nasr, Damascus, Sept 17)

Jordan Alleges Israeli Provocations on Mount Scopus (July-Oct): On July 18, a Jordanian source reported that Jordan had asked her UN representative to inform the SG of Israeli aggression on Mount Scopus [see map, MER 1960, p 191]. The Jordanian Minister of Defence was reported to have met with Maj-Gen von Horn a fortnight earlier in an effort to stop the said [unspecified] provocations (Jihad, July 18). On Oct 5 it was again reported that Jordan was concerned with Israeli "aggression and provocations" against "Arab residents" of Mount Scopus [presumably a reference to Isawiyah village; see MER 1960, p 194] and would take "drastic steps" unless the UN succeeded in stopping these activities (Jihad, Oct 5). Official Israeli sources denied any knowledge of the alleged incidents, and said that the situation on Mount Scopus was, and had been, completely tranquil. (Ha'aretz, Oct 26)

Israel Alleges Desecration of Holy Places (Nov): On Nov 15 FM Golda Meir said in the Knesset that the Government had information regarding the desecration of Rachel's Tomb and the Mount of Olives [Jewish] cemetery in Jordanian territory [both in the vicinity of Jerusalem]. Appeals to the UN had proved fruitless. The source of this evil, she pointed out, was Jordan's failure to honour Paragraph 8 of the Armistice Agreement providing for access to Jewish holy places in Jordan. (Jer. Post, Nov 16)

Jordanian Complaint of Armistice Agreement Violation by Israel in Dead Sea Area. On Dec 4 Jordan complained to the MAC that Israel had constructed salt pans on Jordanian soil to the South of the Dead Sea [where Israeli potash works exploiting the Dead Sea deposits were located]. On Dec 12 the MAC found that Israel had constructed salt pans 300-900 metres within Jordan, and that Israeli army units had crossed the Armistice Demarcation Line (DL) in this area. The resolution considered both these facts violations of the Armistice Agreement and called upon Israel "to stop immediately the use of and the work on the salt pans... across the DL on the Jordan side" and "to prevent the crossing of any Israeli military forces or civilians" into the area. The resolution was circulated by Jordan among SC members on July 20, 1962, together with a letter explaining that Israel had not complied with it. (S/5144)

The Israeli case was put in a letter to the SC on Aug 1, 1962. It explained that the salt pans had been constructed in 1936 as part of a larger area of solar evaporation pans, under a concession from the Palestine government, for the extraction of mineral salts from the Dead Sea. They were restored in 1953-4, after the Jordanian delegation to the MAC had been officially informed in writing before commencement of work there. There was no Jordanian response to the communication, which also proposed to carry out a joint demarcation of the armistice line in this area. In Dec 1954 Jordan lodged a complaint with the MAC but withdrew it after informal discussions. Although the salt pans in question had been in continuous operation since then, no objection was raised by Jordan until 1961.

The Israeli letter also explained that the armistice demarcation line in the area coincided with the former boundary between Palestine and Transjordan, but that the line was never demarcated—neither during mandatory times nor after—and that in Feb 1962 Israel had again informed Jordan that she was prepared to co-operate in a joint demarcation of the boundary to avoid further differences in this region (S/5152). [No further developments were reported during 1962.]

Infiltration into Israel for Criminal Purposes; Armed Clashes. Some cases of infiltration from Jordan into Israel for criminal purposes—theft, smuggling, or kidnapping—were reported during the year. A number of armed clashes with infiltrators inside Israel as well as between security personnel of both sides also occurred. (Ma'ariv, Jan 9; Manar, Jordan, Feb 28; Kol Israel, May 1 [W 4], July 11 [W 20], Dec 7 [W 14]; Jer. Post, Nov 23, 27, Dec 7)

Following are incidents reported which involved casualties.

On Feb 11 an Israeli patrol intercepted two armed Jordanian soldiers inside Israeli territory near Kibbutz Eyal [N. of Qalqiya]; at the same time the patrol came under fire from across the border. In the exchange of fire which ensued, a Jordanian soldier was killed (Ha'aretz, Feb 12). A Jordanian military spokesman said the soldier killed had crossed the border inadvertently. (Jer. Times, Feb 14; R. Amman, Feb 12-13; Feb 13)

On July 28 two Israeli border policemen were wounded when they encountered armed infiltrators near Tayiba (S. of Tulkarm); the infiltrators escaped. On Aug 18, in the same area, an infiltrator from Jordan armed with a submachine gun was killed in an exchange of fire with an Israeli patrol. (Kol Israel, July 29, Aug 19 [W Aug 3, 24])

On Aug 22 two Israeli farmers in the Lakhish region were severely wounded and robbed by infiltrators armed with (a) Carl-Gustav submachine gun(s); tracks led to the Jordanian border. (Ha'aretz, Aug 24; Kol Israel, Aug 23, 24 [W Sept 7])

On Oct 13 an Arab infiltrator was killed, and another wounded, in a clash with an Israeli patrol in the Beit Shean area [Jordan valley]. (Kol Israel, Oct 14 [W 19]; Ha'aretz, Oct 15)

On Nov 22, according to Israeli sources, a policeman from Eilat was wounded by Jordanian fire from across the border and kidnapped by Jordanians inside Israel territory. The latter fact was established in an investigation by UN observers. The policeman was returned to Israel on Dec 14. (Ha'aretz, Nov 23; R. Amman, Nov 23, Kol Israel, Nov 23 [W Nov 30]; Jer. Post, Dec 17).

Other Illegal Border Crossings. In a number of cases Israelis and tourists visiting Israel accidentally crossed the border into Jordan. They were returned by the Jordanian authorities after periods ranging from one day (in a case of small boys) to several weeks. (Jer. Post, Jan 15, 16, Feb 19, Dec 29; Ha'aretz, Feb 6, 10, 14, 26, 27, March 3, May 9, Sept 17, Oct 15)

Similarly Israel returned to Jordan seven Bedouin boys who had been picked up in Israel territory. (Jer. Post, Dec 17)

A number of Israeli Arabs and three Jews who had illegally crossed into Jordan, and were either caught on their return or were returned by the Jordanian authorities, were detained for questioning; others were sentenced to prison terms by Israeli courts. In court they often cited family quarrels as their reason for crossing the border. (Ha'aretz, Jan 19, 30, May 28, Oct 9, Nov 13, 20; Jer. Post, Jan 26, April 17, Sept 1)

An Israeli Jew who crossed the border into Jordan was killed by a Jordanian patrol after having failed to observe a command to halt, according to a Jordanian notification to the MAC (Ha'aretz, Sept 10). Jordanian sources reported the crossing of two more Israeli Jews into Jordan for personal or alleged political reasons. One of them was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. (R. Amman, Nov 23 [30]; Difa, Dec 18)

The Nablu [Jordan] district commissioner sentenced "several people" who had infiltrated into Jordan from

"occupied Palestine" to terms of imprisonment. (Falastin, Dec 1)

On Sept 14 Dr. Robert Lindsay, an American Baptist missionary residing in Israel, and an Arab youth were severely injured by a mine explosion in no man's land in the Jerusalem sector, and captured by the Jordanians. The boy had grown up in a Baptist youth village in Israel and crossed legally into Jordan at Christmas 1960 for a visit. There he met his father, who refused to let him return. Dr. Lindsay had crossed the border with the aim of smuggling the boy back. He was later returned to Israel. (ANA, Sept 14 [W 21]; NYT, Sept 15; Ha'aretz, Sept 17, 19, Oct 6)

Legal Border Crossings. [As in former years, Israel and Jordan permitted certain categories of persons to cross the armistice line at the Mandelbaum Gate in Jerusalem. These were mainly tourists crossing from Jordan into Israel (Jordan did not normally permit crossings from Israel), Christian residents and tourists from Israel at Christmas and Easter for a brief sojourn in Jordan, and weekly family reunions in no man's land. (See also MER 1960, p. 195.)]

On Jan 6 some 1,800 pilgrims crossed into Jordan for the Orthodox Christmas. The Jordanian authorities refused to permit the passage of a Russian Orthodox group. (Ha'aretz, Jan 4; Jer. Post, Jan 8)

On Jan 18 about 700 Armenians from Israel crossed into Jordan to celebrate the Armenian Christmas. Some 20 Armenians whose crossing had already been approved were turned back by the Jordanians without an explanation. (Jer. Post, Jan 19)

Jordan permitted some 150 Christian non-residents from Israel to cross the line for Easter. Unlike former years, traffic was to be in one direction only, as Jordan refused to allow a return to Israel. (Ha'aretz, March 30)

The weekly family reunions in no man's land continued every Monday. (Jer. Post, Dec 10)

On Dec 24 nearly 3,000 pilgrims crossed into Jordan for a 36-hour stay at Christmas. A Jordanian spokesman said that about 250 applications had been rejected on security grounds. (Jer. Post, Dec 24, 25, 26)

Feb-June: Jordan Complaints of Airspace Infringements. Jordan lodged several complaints with the MAC alleging flight of Israeli aircraft over Jordanian villages near Jerusalem. (Jer. Times, Feb 19; Jihad, Feb 23, March 9; Manar, March 1, June 6; Falastin, March 2, 8, May 10, June 23)

THE ISRAEL-LEBANESE BORDER

Synopsis. The border remained quiet; no single shooting incident in the border area was reported. Routine incidents included illegal border crossings in both directions: these took place by accident, for personal reasons, for grazing flocks, and for criminal purposes—mostly theft (in Israel only) and smuggling. Violations of territorial waters also occurred, inadvertently, by force majeure, or for fishing—the latter only by Lebanese. Persons who crossed the borders or violated territorial waters with no criminal purpose were usually returned to their country after some lapse of time. Legal border crossings which were mostly confined to members of the diplomatic and consular corps and UN personnel were further restricted by Lebanon, allegedly because diplomats had been found to engage in narcotic traffic. (In 1960 Lebanon had already stopped the traditional periodical reunions of Arab families on the border.) There was a case of cooperation between the two countries to safeguard life and property in Lebanese territory endangered by Israeli blasting operations on the border.

Jan: Lebanon Closes Border to Diplomats. On Jan 15 the Lebanese PM Sa'ib Slim announced that "for security reasons" the border between Lebanon and "occupied Palestine" had been closed as of midnight Jan 14 to members of the diplomatic and consular corps, the UN and "certain men of religion" (MENA, Jan 15 [17]). Earlier it was reported that UN personnel would be allowed passage by special permit only and would be subject to search. It was explained that diplomatic bags were being used to convey military information to Israel and to smuggle narcotics. (Nahar, Jan 13; R. Cairo, Jan 22 [24]).

Two months later "official sources" were quoted as saying that smuggling, especially that of narcotics, had decreased as a result of this measure (Anwar, April 1). [The order stayed in force, although Lebanon granted occasional permits to members of the diplomatic corps and their families (see e.g. Nahar, June 7)].

Cooperation in the Border Area. The Jewish National Fund and Lebanese authorities concluded an agreement through the MAC for the safeguarding of life and property during the execution of a land development project in the Israel border area. The project, which involved a blasting operation near the Metulla-Beirut road, was to be concluded within a fortnight. The Lebanese authorities diverted traffic and took other precautions, while the J.N.F. undertook to pay for any damage caused by the blasting operations. (Jer. Post, Aug 11)

Incidents in Territorial Waters. [By formal agreement, Israel and Lebanon were immediately to return boats and their crews which had entered the other country's territorial waters by force majeure.] Lebanese fishing and cargo boats were repeatedly intercepted in Israeli territorial waters (Jer. Post, Feb 20; Ha'aretz, April 14). In March the Lebanese Defence Ministry issued a warning to such vessels not to approach "enemy territorial waters," on pain of trial by military court. Crews would not be held liable only if they could prove that they had been driven to "enemy ports" by force majeure. (Hayat, March 17)

In Sept, two Israelis whose sailing boat had been blown into Lebanese territorial waters were released and their vessel returned after four days. (Ha'aretz, Sept 13, 14, 15)

Alleged Smuggling of Jews from Lebanon to Israel. There were repeated reports on the arrests in Lebanon of persons—Jews and others—allegedly engaged in the smuggling of Jews from Lebanon and from other Arab countries via Lebanon into Israel. (Siyasah, April 9, July 7; Ha'aretz, April 21; Hawadith, May 16; Anwar, Dec 22)

Illegal Border Crossings; Thefts, Smuggling. Illegal crossings of Israeli Arabs and Jews into Lebanon for personal reasons and often also their return by the Lebanese authorities were reported by sources of both countries. (Ha'aretz, Jan 9, 12, 20, Feb 24, Nov 19, 20, Dec 5, 6; Jaridah, March 25; Anwar, Oct 25)

Lebanese papers reported in great detail alleged interrogations by the security authorities of two Israelis who were said to have crossed into Lebanon because of dissatisfaction with life in Israel (Siyasah, Aug 15, 24, 26, Sept 13; Anwar, Sept 13). The Lebanese authorities, however, denied any knowledge of these alleged infiltrators. (Amal, Sept 21)

Flocks from Lebanon with or without their shepherds were repeatedly chased away from or caught on Israel territory; sometimes their return to Lebanon by the Israeli authorities was reported. (Ha'aretz, Jan 9, March 27, April 2)

Israeli sources reported thefts and attempted thefts of livestock from villages in Galilee, with the tracks leading to the Lebanese border. In Nov one infiltrator was killed in an attempt to break into a village. (Ha'aretz, May 8, Oct 20, Nov 7; Kol Israel, Nov 1, 6 [W 16])

Arab sources reported on the arrest and trial of persons charged with smuggling goods to and from Israel. Lebanese papers also alleged that Lebanese smugglers had brought in heroin from Israel. [No official Lebanese announcement to this effect was found.] (V of A, Jan 25-IMB, Jan 26; Nahar, Sept 8; Siyasah, Sept 14; Hayat, Nov 14, Dec 3)

UTILIZATION OF JORDAN WATERS—POLITICAL ASPECTS

SYNOPSIS

During 1961, both Israel and Jordan continued work on their projects for the utilization of the Jordan river waters, both of which fitted into the Johnston plan (MER 1960, pp 805-6). Jordan actually started to divert the Yarmuk, a Jordan tributary, as part of her Eastern Ghor project. Israel thus lost a source of water she had utilized to irrigate the Jordan and Beyt Shean valleys, but she had already partially completed a pipeline to carry water from the Sea of Galilee to the affected areas, and there was no public Israeli reaction. Meanwhile work continued in Israel on her National Water Carrier, designed to convey part of the Jordan waters to the south from a point on the Sea of Galilee well inside Israeli territory; pumping was planned to begin in 1964.

In May a Jordanian spokesman again brought up the 1955 "Arab plan" to divert the Jordan headwaters from Lebanon and Syria into the Yarmuk, which he now called the "Greater Yarmuk Project." But nothing more was publicly heard of this plan.

During the first half of the year the Arab League continued to discuss the issue. While in 1960 it had considered both military action and preventive diversion to deny the waters to Israel, and a technical committee had been appointed to work out a joint diversion plan, in 1961 the League concentrated on a military solution. One reason given was that Israel had warned in 1960 that any Arab attempt to divert the Jordan headwaters would constitute a threat to peace, and military action was therefore unavoidable in any case. The Arabs, however, did not appear to be ready for a military encounter with Israel.

The Arab League's Defence Council which convened in June, after having been inactive for several years, merely adopted, according to unofficial reports, a resolution restating the "right to self-defence" in the event of an Israeli diversion, and the intention to counter with collective military action any use of force by Israel to prevent Arab diversion. There were no reports of any concrete measures in preparation for such eventualities.

For the next three months the issue lay dormant, overshadowed by the Kuwait crisis. After the breakup of the UAR, however, it became a theme in Cairo propaganda attacks on Syria. The Damascus government was accused of betraying Arab interests by allowing Israel to draw the waters (though no new development had taken place). Cairo Radio demanded that the Israeli works be shelled by Syrian artillery. Syria replied by promising to use force if Israel attempted to divert the Jordan.

Jordan supported Syria in the propaganda campaign and asked for the re-establishment of their joint Yarmuk waters committee. This was done in Jan 1962.

Lebanon made no significant move on the Hasbani diversion project, which had been much in the news in 1960.

An individual note in the inter-Arab discussion was provided by PM Qassim of Iraq, who said that an Israeli diversion would not matter, as the Palestinians would recapture the country in any case.

The US continued to aid in carrying out the Eastern Ghor project and there were other indications that she viewed favourably the implementation of projects within the framework of the Johnston plan.

ARAB REACTIONS TO ISRAEL PROGRESS ON PROJECT

(January)

Arab Threats and Frustrations. The announcement on Jan 3 that the Israel Development Budget for 1961/62 allocated IL43 million for the National Water Carrier prompted Arab reactions. MENA's political commentator said that just as the UAR's vigilance had prevented Israel from carrying out her original project to divert the Jordan in the northern demilitarized zone, so it would prevent her from implementing the new plan to pump the waters from the Sea of Galilee. (MENA, R. Cairo, Jan 4—IMB, Jan 5. See also Ahram, Jan 5)

Amman Radio, on the other hand, criticized the Arab League and the UAR for inactivity. "Woe to us Arabs!" the commentator exclaimed. "Israel implements her aggressive projects while we intrigue against each other." (R. Amman, Jan 5—IMB, Jan 6)

Falastin said that the project would fill the Negev with Jewish immigrants and thus reinforce Israel's fighting strength; this was even more serious than the rumours about an Israeli atomic bomb. (Falastin, Jan 5)

Al-Hayât, Beirut, commented that both Israel and the Arab League were intensely active: Israel in implementing her projects, and the League in studying and preparing projects and counter-projects. "Experience has accustomed us to the results: Israel has accomplished a new fait accompli while the League is still studying!" (Hayât, Jan 6)

THE ISSUE IN THE ARAB LEAGUE

(January-June)

Baghdad Conference Resolves on Solution by Force; Shelves Joint Diversion Projects. The Jordan water issue was a major topic at the Arab Foreign Ministers' Conference in Baghdad (Jan 30—Feb 4). (Ahram, Zaman, Feb 3-5. See also p 104 b.) The final communiqué stated that the ministers had agreed on the course to be taken to prevent Israel diverting the river. (Zaman, Feb 5)

Salim Habâqi, Al-Hayât special correspondent at the conference, reported that the ministers had been arguing in a "vicious circle": whether to prevent by force any Israeli attempt to divert the river, or to deny Israel the use of the waters by Arab diversions, as both possibilities involved the certainty of Israeli retaliatory action.

The delegates finally passed secret resolutions confirming a 1960 League resolution to use military force to prevent Israel diverting the Jordan [which, however, also spoke of the exploitation of the Jordan waters for the benefit of the Arabs. See MER 1960, p 208], asking Iraq and the UAR to convene, by the end of Feb, the Consultative Military Committee of the League's Defence Council to study ways and means of implementing this decision [the Council had been inactive ever since 1955]; and asking the Arab Foreign Ministers to warn the UN Secretariat of the consequences of Israel's activities. (Hayât, Feb 3-5)

Justifying military measures instead of diverting Jordan tributaries, Habâqi reported the representative of the Arab Higher Committee inquiring: "What will happen when Palestine will be retaken from the Jews? We would have to divert back the tributaries so that the Palestinians could benefit from the river."

Another reason was given by informants to a New York Times correspondent in Baghdad; as Israel had warned that any Arab move to divert the Jordan, headwaters would be regarded as "a threat to peace" [see MER 1960, p 209], and an Israeli attack was to be expected in such a case, "it would be more realistic to use force at the point of conflict—wherever the Israelis decided to tap the Jordan for their pipeline." [This "point of conflict" was, however, located on the north-western shore of the Sea of Galilee (see MER 1960, p 205, map), well inside Israel territory, a fact known to the Arabs—see above: Arab Reactions to Israel Progress.] (NYT, Feb 6)

"Highly reliable sources" reportedly explained, however, that the Arab states were not yet ready to face a military conflict; the conference had asked the Permanent Military Commission to prepare a "unified, well-studied and highly coordinated plan which would be acceptable to all Arab countries." (Siyasah, Feb 18)

The New York Times correspondent reported that as the decision to recommend the use of force had been freely leaked to American and British correspondents, it was thought that "some ministers wished to stir alarm in the West" to bring international pressure to bear on Israel. (NYT, Feb 6)

UAR-Jordan Disagreement. According to the Cairo press, the conference rejected, on UAR insistence, a Jordanian demand to invite a Jordanian water engineer to inform the conference of Jordan's activities and needs, and practical measures to prevent Israel diverting the Jordan waters. The UAR delegate argued that the conference was dealing with policy, and could not go into details, especially when "it is known that Jordan is actually implementing part of the Johnston plan and thus obstructing Arab counter-plans to divert Jordan tributaries." (Ahram, Feb 3, 5, 7; Gumhuriyah, Feb 4; Akhbar, Feb 3-5, see also Hawadith, Feb 3)

The League Military Consultative Committee met in Cairo from April 22 to 26 to work out a unified Arab plan and adopted secret recommendations which were submitted to the Arab Defence Council. (Ahram, April 27)

Arab Defence Council Reaffirms Use of Force. The Arab Defence Council, meeting in Cairo between June 10-18 (pp 107-8), agreed on the use of force to prevent Israel diverting the Jordan waters (Jihad, Falastin, Manar, June 13-15). The conference had also resolved on a joint scheme to divert the sources of the river in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan, with all the Arab countries paying the cost, another source said. (Falastin, June 15)

An Al-Hayat correspondent reported from Cairo that the conference had agreed that (a) any attempt to divert the flow of the Jordan or draw waters from the Sea of Galilee would be considered an act of aggression, entitling the Arab States to exercise the right of self-defence; (b) if Israel employed force to divert the water or to prevent the diversion of the tributaries in Syria, Lebanon or Jordan, the Arabs would counter with their collective power; (c) the diversion of the river would be an imperialist act as it would enable Israel to settle three million persons in the Negev. (Hayat, June 15)

The official communiqué stated only that the conference had studied various subjects and unanimously passed resolutions safeguarding the common Arab interest. (Ahram, June 19)

[There were no further reports during the year on Arab League activities regarding the Jordan water question.]

LEBANON

(February-April)

No Independent Lebanese Diversion Project. On Feb 15 the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Lebanese Chamber of Deputies discussed the diversion of the Jordan. Several deputies suggested referring the issue to the International Court of Justice, while others called for the diversion of the tributaries originating in Lebanon. The Foreign Minister, concluding the discussion, said that an overall Arab plan to divert the Jordan tributaries was under consideration and that Lebanon could not take unilateral action. (Hayat, Feb 16; R. Amman, Feb 16-17; IMB, Feb 17)

JORDAN DIVERTS YARMUK RIVER

(August-December)

Plan to Divert Jordan Head Waters Into Yarmuk? In May Dr Hāzim Nusaybah, SG of the Jordanian Development Council, stated that Jordan was exploring the possibility of financing the "Greater Yarmuk Project" from foreign sources. It would cost twenty times as much as the present [East Ghor] project, and it would enable 52,000 hectares of the Jordanian Jordan Valley to be irrigated. (See MER 1960, p 206: The Jordanian Project.)

This project, Nusaybah continued, was based on co-operation with the Syrian Region of the UAR. Dams to be constructed on the Yarmuk at Makarin and Wadi Khalid would store the waters of the Yarmuk, as well as those of the Hasbani and Banias (two of the three sources of the Jordan), which would be diverted by a canal passing through Wadi Ar-Raqqa into the Yarmuk.

One advantage of this project, Nusaybah said, was that it would deny the Yarmuk waters [but of course most of the Jordan waters as well] to Israel, who intended to divert them to the Negev. (See map, MER 1960, p 205.)

The whole three-stage Ghor project, which would cost JD49m., would constitute one of the three stages of the greater project, Nusaybah said. [This "Greater Yarmuk Project" corresponded to the "Arah Plan" of 1955, designed to deny Israel the Jordan waters (see MER 1960, p 206: UAR Plans Unilateral Diversion; p 205, map) and contradicted the Johnston plan's provisions. Up to the end of 1961 no practical steps had been taken to implement it.]

In a report on the East Ghor project, its director, Nikolai Simansky, urged the Jordanian government to reactivate the joint Jordanian-Syrian Yarmuk committee. (Falastin, May 2)

First Stage of Yarmuk Project Completed. On Aug 5 the East Ghor Canal Authority announced that on that day the waters of the Yarmuk river had flowed for the first time through the first 23-km. section of the Eastern Ghor Canal to irrigate some 30,000 dunams of farmland, and that it had already distributed 148 plots to farmers in the area (Falastin, Aug 6). [The Yarmuk is the major Jordan river tributary; for details see MER 1960, pp 204 ff.]

JORDAN'S EAST GHOR PROJECT

Israel's Water Supply Affected. Measurements of the Yarmuk river in Israel following the Jordanian diversion showed a drop of 5,000 cubic metres per hour, about a fifth of the flow, affecting the farmers in the Jordan and Beyt Shean valley areas of Israel, who drew most of their irrigation water from the Yarmuk. The Director of Tahal, the Israel Water Planning Authority, declared that the partly completed Sea of Galilee-Beyt Shean pipeline would provide an alternative to the Yarmuk waters, but the water would be more expensive. The complete diversion by Jordan of the Yarmuk waters, a step expected for late 1962, would cost Israel some 30 million cubic metres per annum, the quantity now utilized for irrigation south of the Sea of Galilee. Moreover, the waters in this region would be rendered unfit for irrigation, since their mineral content would rise to up to 700 milligram per litre (about 450 milligram was considered the limit for irrigation). (Jer. Post, Aug 22, 25, Oct 5) [No official Israel reaction to the Jordanian diversion was reported.]

Reactivation of Syrian-Jordanian Yarmuk Committee. After the break-up of the UAR, Jordan made it known that she wished to reactivate the Syrian-Jordanian committee for joint utilization of the Yarmuk river. [The committee was formed in 1953 to supervise the implementation of an agreement between the two countries of June 4, 1953, for the joint utilization of the Yarmuk waters for irrigation and hydro-electric power. It was based on a plan to construct a dam at Makarin (see map) to store the winter flow. In 1954/55 the committee helped to prepare the unified Arab plan submitted to Eric Johnston. During 1956 it occupied itself mostly with the Eastern Ghor project. In 1957, when political relations between the two countries deteriorated, the committee was dissolved on Jordan's initiative—the official reason being that after the implementation of Jordan's Eastern Ghor project, no benefit would be derived from the committee's activity.]

A Syrian delegation attended the official inauguration of the Ghor project on Oct 16 and held talks with the Jordanian authorities on possible future cooperation (Jihad, Oct 17; Nasr, Oct 20). The committee was re-established at the beginning of 1962 at the level of Directors-General and was expected to start work immediately. (Nahar, Beirut, Jan 9, 1962)

THE JORDAN WATERS IN THE INTER-ARAB CONFLICT

(October–December)

Issue in Cairo Propaganda Against Damascus. [Following the dissolution of the UAR, Cairo utilized the Jordan water issue in its attacks on the new Syrian government.]

When Israel announced the partial completion of the Jordan valley pipeline, Cairo radio commented that it was the break-up of Egyptian-Syrian unity that "bad given Israel the courage to resume work on the project." [The pipeline in question was, however, only a local project unconnected with Israel's National Water Carrier and had been partially completed well before the break-up of the UAR.] The Damascus regime, Cairo radio said, was weak, reactionary and imperialist-ridden and consequently unable to resist Israel. (Voice of the Arabs, Oct 23–IMB, Oct 24)

A [pro-Egyptian] Lebanese paper alleged that Israel was "changing the features of the northern demilitarized zone" by constructing a road and diverting the course of the Jordan, without opposition from the Syrian government, while during the union "the smallest attempts of this kind were met with decisive measures." (Siyasah, Oct 25)

Cairo: Plot Prevents Syrian Shelling of Israeli Works. Cairo Radio followed up this report with a four-day concentrated attack on the Kuzbari government in Syria. Ahmad Sa'id, commentator of the Voice of the Arabs, called on the "heroes of the Syrian army" to revolt, to save the rights of the Palestine Arabs and stop Israel's "aggressive action in diverting the Jordan" (Voice of the Arabs, Oct 26 [28]; see also R. Cairo, Oct 24–27 [25–29]). In another comment, Ahmad Sa'id claimed that the diversion work was going on within the range of heavy Syrian artillery, which could "destroy the attempts of Israel in one hour." [The site of the pumping station of Israel's National Water Carrier was in fact within the range of medium artillery positioned on Syrian territory. See MER 1960, p 205, map.] This artillery, which used to shell the Zionists and their settlements, remained silent, Sa'id said, because of a plot: Israel and the imperialists had made Kuzbari the President of the Syrian Republic. "The arrest of hundreds of faithful Syrian officers of the Syrian front" was in preparation for Israel's diversion work under the gunsights of the Syrian artillery. (R. Cairo, Oct 26 [28])

UAR and pro-UAR papers claimed that Gen. von Horn, the UNTSO Chief of Staff, had officially informed the Arab League Secretariat of the completion of Israel's diversion plans and of the imminent inauguration ceremony (Siyasah, Nov 29; Ahram, Nov 30). This was denied by a UNTSO spokesman as totally baseless. (Ha-yot, Dec 6)

Damascus: No New Works by Israel; Army Chief Says Syrian Army Will Fight. On Oct 29 Damascus Radio described the Cairo claims as "cheap lies." No new developments had taken place in the demilitarized zone and consequently "there was no need to open fire." The "liberated" Syrian army was alert to any "Jewish aggression" and would not hesitate to open fire. The commentator warned Cairo Radio to desist from such attacks; otherwise "we are ready to publish secret documents proving that the Egyptian High Command had always evaded giving orders to open fire on the Jews." (R. Damascus, Oct 29–IMB, Oct 30)

On Nov 5 Maj.-Gen. Abd al-Karim Zahr ad-Din, the Syrian Army Chief of Staff, told the press that the Syrian Army "would open fire at once" against any Israeli attempt to divert the Jordan river, as Syria's foremost national aspiration was to do away with Israel, and Israel's life and existence were linked with the realization of the water project. (R. Damascus, Nov 6–IMB Nov 7; see also Jundi, Nov 5)

Jordan Supports Syria. On Nov 8 Amman Radio accused Cairo of "fabricating news regarding alleged Israeli attempts to divert the Jordan." Though Israel's "aggressive plans" had been known for a long time, no action was taken to frustrate them so long as Egypt "dominated Syria," but "now that the Egyptians have been kicked out" Cairo was reproaching the Syrian army for inactivity in a non-existent case. (R. Amman, Nov 8, 11–IMB, Nov 9, 13)

On Nov 12 it was announced in Amman that the

Jordanian government had sent a note to the Syrian government pledging full military support should Israel attempt to divert the Jordan. (Jihad, Nov 13)

PM Qassim: Diversion Unimportant, "Palestine" will be Reoccupied. On Nov 20 PM Qassim of Iraq, in a special statement, warned the Arabs not to be distracted from their objectives by reports of Israeli attempts to divert the Jordan; this would not matter, because the Palestinians would return to reoccupy all their lands, he said. (Thawrah, Nov 21)

ATTITUDE OF POWERS

US Support for Implementation of Projects Under Johnston Plan. President Kennedy's letter to President Abdel Nasser in May 1961 (pp 197-8) included, according to an unofficial text, the following passage: "We are also willing to help find an equitable and a reasonable solution for the problem resulting from the project to promote the sources of the river Jordan" (R. Cairo, Sept 21, [24] 1962)

[There were several indications that the US regarded with favour the implementation of projects that fitted into the Johnston water allocation plan for which see MER 1960, p 206.]

The Eastern Ghor project was being financed by the US. On Jan 26, it was reported, the US and Jordan signed an agreement providing for US aid to the tune of JD 1,104,857 for the second stage of the Ghor project, which was under construction during the year [apparently in the framework of the $6.6 million grant for economic and technical assistance for the financial year 1961/62—see p 75]. In addition, the US allocated to the second stage $1 million from the proceeds of the sale of US surplus foods under PL 480 (Jer. Times, Jan 5; R. Amman, Jan 26—IMB, Jan 27). USOM engineers were advising on the project. (Jer. Times, Oct 16)

In Nov Akram Hurani, one time Vice-President of the UAR, recalled that President Abdel Nasser had told his ministers that the US had requested the UAR to consent to the Jordan diversion. (Jaridah, Nov 28)

[There were no published official US references to Israel's well-publicized progress on the National Water Carrier or to the above Arab reactions.]

Britain Advocates Mediation. On June 19 Joseph Godber, UK Foreign Under-Secretary, replying in the House of Commons to a question by William Yates (Con) about "Israel's violation of the neutral zones and its abstraction of the Jordan waters," said that "there was no violation whatsoever insofar as this particular matter is concerned" and expressed his hope that "the UN could be used to get agreement between Israel and Jordan over the Jordan water disputes." (Hansard C, Vol. 527, Col. 924, June 19)

THE ARMS RACE

BACKGROUND AND SYNOPSIS

Background. Ever since the Arab-Israel war of 1948 both sides had engaged in an arms race. However, during the first few years neither side made any real progress, primarily because the Western powers, especially the UK, held a virtual monopoly on the arms supplies to the ME. Some relatively modern weapons such as the British Centurion heavy tank and British jet fighter-aircraft made their appearance first in the Arab countries, and the aircraft later and in smaller numbers also in Israel. However up to 1955 the armies of both the Arab countries and of Israel were basically engaged in a process of reorganization and modernization. No drastic change in strength took place.

In the autumn of 1955 all this changed. The Communist bloc began to supply Egypt with arms and the Arab-Israel arena became a major theatre of the cold war. (Actually Syria had been the first ME country to buy arms from the Communist bloc, but it was on a comparatively small scale.) Egypt obtained—at exceedingly low prices and on easy credit terms—modern Soviet arms: jet aircraft, medium and heavy tanks and other armour, all types of artillery, infantry weapons, destroyers and submarines, electronic equipment and other military requirements, in quantities which could not but have a revolutionary effect on the Arab-Israel arena.

Israel's effort to confront this challenge met with some success when she obtained jet aircraft, light tanks and anti-tank guided missiles from France, but she had to pay the full price for these arms. In the Sinai campaign the new weapons of both sides appeared; while in the 1948 war very little armour was employed, in 1956 both sides used hundreds of tanks. During the following years, Egypt and Syria relied exclusively on Soviet supplies and Yemen also started to buy Soviet arms. Iraq and Jordan continued to obtain arms mostly from Britain, and Saudi Arabia from the US. After the 1958 coup d'état Iraq also began to equip her forces with Soviet arms.

Egypt, later the UAR, however, remained the major contestant in the arms race on the Arab side. She always had had the largest Arab army, and when in 1955 the arms race acquired the new large-scale dimensions, Egypt became the Arab country which could best marshal the technical and other resources required by the great amount of complicated equipment.

Both Egypt and Israel also developed arms industries which manufactured mainly ammunition, light arms, and spare parts; they both also developed means of adapting acquired weapons to local conditions, and means of modifying them. The UAR also attempted to develop, with the aid of German experts, its own modern jet fighter and to manufacture armoured carriers. President Abdel Nasser declared that the dependence on foreign powers for arms supplies during the 1948 war had taught the UAR to regard the manufacture of arms, such as tanks and jet aircraft, as a prerequisite for the "final... liberation of Palestine." (See, e.g. MER 1960, p 173.)

Both countries also had departments of military scientific research.

Up to the end of 1960 the main objective of the arms race was to acquire the most modern weapons of the "conventional type." Thus while in 1948 both sides fought mostly with antiquated weapons, by 1961 the Arab and Israeli armies were equipped with or had ordered up-to-date conventional weapons in use by the forces of the big powers themselves. Syria, Iraq and Egypt acquired the Soviet T54 medium tank, while Israel who fought the Sinai campaign in 1956 with second-hand modified American "Sherman" tanks of WWII vintage now obtained British "Centurion" tanks.

In the air, the Arabs progressed from the Soviet subsonic Mig 15 fighter to ever more modern types—the Mig 17, still subsonic, the supersonic Mig 19, and by 1961 they had on order the Mig 21 with a speed close to mach 2. Israel reacted by acquiring the most modern French aircraft, progressing from the subsonic Ouragan and Mystère, to the transonic Super Mystère B 2, and in 1961 she had on order the Mirage III which belonged of the same class of jet-fighters as the Mig 21.

The UAR and Israel also acquired jet-bombers, the Soviet Ilyushin 28 and the French Vautour respectively, both subsonic. The UAR had on order also a heavy, long-range Soviet bomber, the Tupolev 16. At the same time the two sides sought to perfect their aircraft detection systems.

The UAR put great emphasis on sea power, and by 1961 had acquired a fleet of nine submarines, six destroyers and other craft. Israel's navy was the least powerful arm of her forces, with two destroyers and two submarines among other craft, all rather outdated, acquired from Britain.

Total manpower of the armed forces of the Arab countries in the ME was generally estimated at about half a million; the total manpower potential of the Israel Defence Forces was given as approximately 250,000. Israel's forces were built on reserve lines; she had a very small standing army. The Arab forces, on the other hand, were built on standing armies. Egypt's standing army was approximately 150,000 men, that of Iraq 85,000, Syria 70,000 and Jordan 35,000. Egypt could mobilize some additional 50,000 men in reserve formations and Syria—some 30,000. Jordan had some 30,000 men organized in national guard units whose task it was to defend localities on the Western Bank. The armies of Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Yemen were of secondary significance.

According to official figures, Israel's defence budget in 1960/1 amounted to $175m, while the defence budgets of Israel's Arab neighbours and Iraq totalled $541m, as follows: The UAR—$337m (of which $40m for the armament industry); Iraq—$135m; Jordan—$52m; Lebanon—$17m.

Synopsis. At the end of 1960 and during 1961 signs appeared which were interpreted both in the ME and outside it as evidence that the arms race was acquiring new and graver dimensions; namely, that it was becoming a race for atomic weapons and guided missiles.

Various rumours about the capability and intention of Israel and the UAR to produce atomic weapons had appeared previously but the matter broke into headlines in Dec 1960 when the US addressed a public request to Israel for clarification of reports that she was constructing a second nuclear reactor; and the US Central Intelligence Agency stated that Israel might be developing atomic weapons. Earlier, Israel had built a small atomic research reactor with US aid (at Nahal Rubin, see MER 1960, pp 287, 299; this volume, p 321 b) and the UAR was building such a reactor with Soviet aid (at Inshas, see MER 1960 p 85; this volume p 659 b).

The Israel PM confirmed that Israel was building the reactor with a capacity of 24,000 thermal kilowatts, but said that it was for peaceful use only and termed the report that Israel was producing an atomic bomb as a falsehood. The State Department declared itself satisfied with Israel's public assurances. The Arab reaction was ambivalent; they showed deep concern, but also endeavoured to minimize Israel's achievement. President Abdel Nasser hinted that Israel was spreading the reports as propaganda, yet emphasized that the UAR could not allow Israel to build an atomic bomb; the UAR would have to attack the "base of aggression" and if the powers supplied Israel with such a bomb, the UAR would obtain atomic weapons too. The issue was discussed at the Baghdad meeting of the Arab foreign ministers in Feb, and it again caught world attention when news appeared about rocket development in Israel and in the UAR.

Foreign observers were of the opinion that Israel's military interest was to keep atomic weapons out of the ME and that the Negev reactor was no part of a bomb programme; Israel might however be working towards an option to produce atomic weapons as a final deterrent in case the Arabs obtained the support of a great power in developing a fighting force capable of overwhelming Israel. Israel might also be interested in gaining the reputation of nuclear capability as a psychological deterrent. (L. Beaton and J. Maddox: The Spread of Nuclear Weapons)

In 1961, no guided missiles—whether ground-to-ground, ground- or sea-to-air or air-to-air—were known to be in the possession of an Arab country or Israel (with the exception of short-range anti-tank missiles, an infantry weapon of French make, in the hands of the Israel army.)

In July, Israel scientists sent aloft a meteorological non-guided rocket of relatively small capacity named Shavit II. While the rocket in itself was no weapon carrier, it was widely accepted as an indication that Israel was developing or had the scientific potential to develop guided missiles for military purposes. Qualified observers, however, tended to think that Israel had still a very long way to go to produce such missiles. The UAR belittled the Israel achievement, Iraq virtually ignored it, but concern was expressed in Lebanon and Jordan.

Immediately after the launching of Shavit II it was announced in the US that licences had been granted to export research rockets to the UAR. The UAR, various sources claimed, had wished to launch them on its revolution anniversary, July 23, to enhance its prestige—this was vehemently denied in the UAR—and because she knew of the imminent launching of an Israel rocket. In Israel, on the other hand, it was reported that the timing of the Shavit II shot and the publicity accompanying it had been designed to forestall the UAR (though the opponents of Mapai—the ruling party—also claimed that they might have been designed to help the latter in the election campaign).

During the same period it became known that an Israel bid to purchase anti-aircraft rockets in the US—the only Western country making them—had been rejected. The US was unwilling, as was later officially explained, to bear responsibility for setting off an even more dangerous form of the arms race. Israel's desire for such missiles was explained by her vulnerability to a UAR surprise attack in view of her small territory, high population concentration, few airfields and reserve nature of her army.

The serious effort of the UAR in the missile field became public knowledge in Nov when four rocket experts in West Germany were dismissed from their posts for working on rocket development for Egypt. Rocket parts had also been exported to Egypt. Cairo reports stated that a successful missile test under the supervision of the German experts had been conducted "during the past six months." Cairo gave no concrete details on what it called the "Arab rocket" but gave it extensive publicity and claimed that the rocket had caused panic in Israel. Israel sources tended to doubt that a successful test had indeed been conducted and thought that the publicity given the affair by Cairo was intended to recoup some of the prestige lost by President Abdel Nasser through the Israel missile shot and the break-up of the UAR.

Thus it appeared that Israel and the UAR had joined in a race for "unconventional" arms. However, the practical effects of this development for the present and the near future were psychological and political rather than military. There were no indications that for years to come either of the two countries could produce atomic warheads nor was it thought likely that the atomic powers would supply them with such. In the field of guided missiles observers tended to assume that both countries had still a long way to go, and even if they succeeded in producing operative guided ground-to-ground missiles, they would remain, without atomic warheads, only conventional weapons.

QUESTION OF ISRAEL'S NUCLEAR CAPACITY

Additional Arab Reactions. The issue of Israel's nuclear capacity arose in Dec 1960 when the US made it public that Israel was constructing a nuclear reactor in the Negev (see: MER 1960, pp 286-8). Throughout January-February, the Arab press continued to give prominence to the issue, commenting in the same vein as in December 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 286-8). Following are some representative arguments:

The whole issue was mere propaganda, aimed at frightening the Arabs and inducing them to make peace with Israel (Ahali, Baghdad, Jan 2; Bayan, Baghdad, Jan 16; Mustaqbal, Baghdad, Jan 22). Israel was incapable of manufacturing a bomb without the assistance of the Western powers (Gumhuriyah, Jan 3; Ahali, Jan 5); and specifically France (Falastin, Jan 1; Manar, Jan 4; Difa, Jan 15). The Arab states, and especially the UAR, Iraq, and Lebanon, were also capable of manufacturing an atomic bomb (Siyyash, Dec 23, 1960; Hayat, Dec 30, 1960). Israel would not be able to employ an atomic bomb, because of the danger of contamination in her own territory by nuclear fallout (Hayat, Jan 8; Sayyud, Beirut, Dec 23, 1960). Israel intended to use the reactor to promote her economy (Jaridah, Dec 23, 1960). The Arab states should coordinate their efforts to prevent Israeli nuclear superiority (Manar, Jan 13; Difa, Jan 15; Taqqadum, Baghdad, Jan 4). The Arab countries should initiate a "preventive war" against Israel. (Ayyam, Damascus, Jan 1, 18; Siyyash, Jan 22)

On Dec 31, 1960, Gen. Qassim, the Iraqi PM, told a group of officers: "Israel may possess this atom bomb but that state's extermination before obtaining this bomb is something inevitable, and even after obtaining it. The important matter in this connection is that we denounce the use of the atom bomb. We shall never use an atom bomb, and we shall not even think of possessing it. We shall use nuclear energy, as reflected in our prospects for peaceful purposes." (R. Baghdad, Jan 1 [3])

A resolution of the Baghdad Conference of Arab Foreign Ministers in Feb said that the conference had considered the League SG's report on French aid to Israel in the nuclear field, and the opinions on the subject of the Arab representatives at the UN, and had approved the plan which must be followed in this respect. (MENA, Feb 4 [6])

It was reported that the Arab representatives were to urge the UN to entrust the International Atomic Energy Agency with investigating the Israeli situation. (Akhbar al-Yaum, March 18)

Haykal: Issue Demands Arab Independent Response. Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, commented on "a rumour spread among a number of foreign diplomats in Cairo" that in view of Israel's reported possession of an atomic bomb, the UAR might, if only temporarily, abandon its policy of positive neutrality. Haykal said that this was unthinkable; that policy was fundamental and immutable. Haykal said that he could not answer the question of what would be if Israel "is proved to be trying to manufacture an atomic bomb." However, "I do know that asking the US to press Israel to abandon the manufacture of the atomic bomb... is at best unprecedented naïveté. Israel... is of American manufacture itself. In any case, the Arab position, and the strength of this position alone can force a reply to this question." (Ahram, Jan 27; R. Cairo, Jan 27 [28])

Evaluation of Israel's Policy and Capability: "Israel Working towards Atomic Option." Following is an evaluation of Israel's policy and capabilities by Western experts. There was evidence, in their opinion, that Israel was "working towards an option to produce these [atomic] weapons at some future date if it should think them necessary..." They thought that such evidence could be traced to the possibility—which for the present they considered unlikely—that a powerful Arab leader might obtain the support of a great power in developing a fighting force capable of overwhelming Israel; in such a case atomic weapons might emerge as a final deterrent.

Analyzing the scientific and technical problems involved as well as that of the provision of uranium and raw materials, the authors concluded that the reactor at Dimona "appears at present to be no part of a bomb programme and that it will be difficult to turn it over to weapon development without this fact becoming obvious." An Israeli bomb could be ruled out for many years, but never entirely. (Leonard Beaton and John Maddox: The Spread of Nuclear Weapons, Chatto and Windus, London, For The Institute for Strategic Studies, 1961)

ROCKETS IN ISRAEL

A Meteorological Rocket. On July 5, at dawn, Israel launched a meteorological rocket. According to information released it was a solid-fuel multi-stage non-guided rocket weighing about 250 kg. (550 lb.); it reached an altitude of more than 80 km (50 miles) and released a sodium cloud. The rocket was designed and built by scientists of the Ministry of Defence Research Department. It was stressed that the propellant had been prepared in Israel from an original formula, and chiefly from local materials. The rocket trajectory was traced and photographed by a number of observation posts. The rocket was named Shavit II. This was the first successful test of a meteorological rocket in Israel.

The launching was attended by PM Ben-Gurion, as well as the Foreign Minister, the Deputy Defence Minister and the Chief of Staff.

Meteorological rockets had been launched, it was reported, by the US, the USSR, France, Britain, Italy and Japan. Sweden and the GFR were understood to be preparing the launching of such rockets.

More advanced rockets equipped with measuring apparatus were expected to be launched at a later stage. (Israel Press, July 6; IGPO/WNB, No. 16, July)

Political and Military Implications. PM Ben-Gurion told the press that the Shavit II launching had no military aim and had purely scientific purposes. The rocket was launched for exploration purposes in connection with the International Geophysical Year. It was a great scientific achievement and an indication of Israel's potential. When asked whether modifications of such rockets could give them military value, Ben-Gurion replied that these were questions which he was not prepared to discuss. (Jer. Post, Ha'aretz, July 6)

Deputy Defence Minister Shimon Peres, however, was quoted to have told the press that Israel gave priority to its rockets' programme because of "grave defence problems," but, he said, "if other countries would change their belligerent policies we could change our priorities." He added that the rocket was cheaply built and did not use the best fuel available in the country; more rockets were to be produced but there were no immediate plans for mass production. (Times, July 7)

The Israel press unanimously welcomed the news both as an Israel scientific achievement and as an indication of Israel's capacity to build missiles for military purposes and expressed the hope that this might serve as a deterrent to Arab aggressive intentions.

Great enthusiasm was reported among the Israel public. A survey of public opinion, Ha'aretz said, showed a "feeling of power and pride." (Israeli Press, July 6)

As regards the timing of the launching and the attendant publicity, PM Ben-Gurion was reported to have told the Cabinet that they were intended to forestall the Egyptians who had planned on July 23, the revolution anniversary, to launch rockets bought in the US claiming them as their own. Mapai's coalition partners on the other hand intimated that the timing and the publicity might have been designed to help Mapai in the current election campaign. (Ma'ariv, July 10)

Some press comments maintained that Israel would have been wiser to allow the UAR to launch rockets first; then she would have obviated charges that she was starting a new arms race and she would have made it more difficult for those who were trying to justify the supply of rockets to the UAR. (See e.g. Al-Hamishmar, July 12)

Misgivings were also expressed that the publicity of the launching might drive the Arabs to new efforts in the arms race, which Israel would be obliged to counter at great expense. (Ma'ariv, July 9)

Foreign Observers' Scientific and Military Evaluation. The Times science correspondent commented that "technically it is quite a good effort on the part of the Israelis to have developed their own research rocket" though not much novelty was left in this field. Although the height reached was comparatively modest, this was not necessarily significant in the absence of other relevant information. The correspondent noted that only "a fine line" separated interest in research rockets from an entry to techniques of military character.

Another correspondent added that even if Israel possessed rockets of military value, that in itself would not alter the military situation. They would require nuclear warheads and there was no likelihood that Israel could produce these. (Times, July 6)

The Economist remarked that "for a small state with few resources, Israel's sally into space is a brilliant feat." But the rocket was small and "in its present form... almost certainly a harmless research instrument." Israeli scientists had not yet divulged skills needed to build military rockets. The paper thought that Israel was probably getting technical advice from France. (Economist, July 8)

The aviation correspondent of The Guardian also did not feel that Israel was close to producing any efficient military weapon based on rockets. (Guardian, July 6)

An official of the US National Aeronautic and Space Administration termed the launching "a wonderful job." He and other scientists said that if Israel intended to launch satellites it would require many years. US scientists launched sounding rockets in 1946 and only twelve years later their first satellite. (NYT, July 16)

Arabs Disparage Achievement, Express Concern. UAR comment disparaged the Israel rocket-launching while Lebanese and Jordanian comment expressed concern over the security implications.

The first Cairo Radio report, on July 5, said that Israel had launched "a small rocket" (IMB, July 6). A later radio commentary said Shavit II resembled American children's toys. Israel wished to develop anti-aircraft rockets because she was afraid of the UAR bombers. (IMB, July 9)

Authoritative UAR sources were quoted as stating that they had not been surprised by the launching which had only a propaganda value. (Masa', July 7)

Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, wrote that Shavit II was in fact a French rocket about which Israel had spread lies and which scared no one. (Ahram, July 12)

Bahjat al-Talhuni, the Jordanian PM, on the other hand, stated that he saw in the rocket "a new threat to the Arabs in the form of an alleged scientific achievement" and he appealed to the Arabs to protect themselves by solidarity. (R. Amman, July 6 [8])

FM Taqla of Lebanon called for Arab solidarity in face of the Israel danger (Hayat, July 8). Similarly, the Lebanese press deplored Arab disunity and lack of purpose in face of Israel's efforts and exhorted them to change their ways. (Hayat, Nahar, Kifah, Beirut-al-Masa', July 6)

The Iraqi press and radio, which were occupied with the Kuwait conflict, gave only the scantest attention to the issue. Baghdad Radio commented that it was no coincidence that the "state of the Zionist gangs" had launched the rocket when Iraq was preoccupied with repulsing "the British attack on her territory." (IMB, July 9)

Concern in West Over Shavit II, Effects on Arms Race. [While the rocket shot was appreciated in the West as an achievement of Israel science and technology, concern was expressed regarding its possible effects on the arms race in the ME.]

There was no official comment in Washington. A spokesman for the State Department said the department had no advance knowledge of the rocket shot. An unidentified State Department source was quoted as having said that the shot was "presumptuous" and that Israel should have devoted her energies to the pursuit of peace, rather than having embarked on an obvious drive for nuclear rockets. To him the launching indicated a tendency towards militarism.

American press reaction, The Jerusalem Post reported, focused on the military implications of the firing. (Reuters, INA as quoted by Jer. Post, July 7)

In London, The Times congratulated Israel on her "technical achievement" but said that "for psychological reasons, it would have been better if Israel's scientific research had remained grounded." "Mr. Ben-Gurion and his colleagues know very well," the editorial said, "that it is the military implications of the launching which will be studied by Israel's neighbours... It may be that the Israel authorities intend to make the Arabs' flesh creep... The rocket will be taken [by the Arabs] as fresh evidence that the cunning Israelis, perhaps with outside help, are up to mischief.

"The danger, of course is that tension in an already over-tense region is heightened as much by rumours of arms deliveries as by real deliveries. Most Arabs are convinced that Israel is building an atomic bomb, and that when this has been completed they will be compelled to solicit one of their own, presumably from Russia." (Times, July 6)

The Economist, on the other hand, wrote that "Israel has the right of any believably threatened country to argue that its best defence lies in a display of strength. Nor can scientists anywhere be expected to argue that the problem of local diplomacy should stand in the path of scientific research." However, the paper expressed concern lest a nuclear arms race develop in the ME; even if Israel only gave the impression of looking to France for aid in this field, the Arabs might seek assistance from Russia. (Economist, July 8)

Soviet Reactions. Similarly to the Soviet comment on the reports on Israel's second atomic reactor (see MER 1960 p 288) Moscow Radio in Arabic declared that the US, and especially the German Federal Republic, "who both use Israel as a strategic bridgehead for extending their influence over the Arab East, have supported all the scientific research going on in Israel for military purposes." The launching of the rocket had given a boost to war hysteria in the Middle East. (R. Moscow in Arabic, July 13 [SU 15])

A broadcast in Russian quoting Krasnaya Zvezda said that the launching was also intended to raise the morale of the Israeli people who had become disillusioned with the policy of the Ben-Gurion Government. (R. Moscow, July 26 [SU 28])

US Rejects Israeli Bid for Anti-Aircraft Missiles. In July Cyrus L. Sulzberger, The New York Times correspondent, reported from Jerusalem that Israel had been trying without success to buy American Hawk and Nike anti-aircraft missiles from the US. He said that Israel's policy now was "not to seek any formal treaties of alliance but to get permission to buy defensive" anti-aircraft missiles. This was a change from the policy Israel had followed prior to the Suez conflict when it sought from the US a mutual security pact, but failed. Israel counted heavily on implied French military support "and on more generalized American sympathies." But it felt that if Abdel Nasser should try to implement by surprise attack his pledge to squash Israel, "eventual aid from the US and France might be too late." In view of her small territory and her few airfields on the one hand and the modern Russian aircraft at the UAR's disposal on the other, Israel was especially vulnerable to a surprise air attack. Thus the foremost objective of Israel's foreign policy was to obtain guided anti-aircraft missiles and the US was the only Western country making such missiles. (NYT, July 30 as quoted in Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, July 31)

ROCKETS AND MISSILES IN THE UAR

US Agrees to Sell UAR Experimental Rockets. On July 6, the day after the firing of the Israel rocket, the US Space Administration confirmed that it had been approached by "Cairo scientists" in an effort to obtain rockets. The New York Times said that the approach was made "earlier this year" (in June, see below). The UAR may have wished to achieve a launching on July 23, the revolution anniversary; it presumably also knew of the Israeli preparations for launching the Shavit II and wished to rival this programme. The Space Administration had replied that it was unable to participate in a programme on such short notice; however, it would like to have Cairo join the international programme of rocket research. Washington must also be pleased, The New York Times added, that Cairo had turned to the US rather than to the USSR for its rockets. (NYT, July 7)

The State Department spokesman said on July 7 that export licences would be granted to enable the UAR to buy experimental rockets for meteorological purposes; "appropriate assurance" had been received from the UAR that the rockets would be used solely for peaceful purposes. The UAR approach had been made in June. Asked whether Israel would be able to purchase similar rockets from the US, the spokesman said Israel had never applied.

From a US Embassy source in Tel Aviv it was learned that the UAR had bought three rockets at $15,000 each. It was understood that they had been bought from a private firm which had been prepared to supply them on shorter notice than the Space Administration (Ahram, July 8; Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, July 9, 10). [It became known later that the rockets in question were of the "Viper" and "Javelin" types.]

On July 12 Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, the editor of Al-Ahram, said that "Israel backed by American propaganda" had distorted the whole picture. The facts were that the request for US missiles had been made by a scientific organization and not by the UAR government; the missile requested had a maximum altitude of only 8 km. and was devoid of any military value; it was also inconceivable that the UAR could have entertained the thought of launching US rockets on her revolution anniversary as this would have become known, and thus would have caused a moral catastrophe.

Furthermore, if the UAR depended on the US to counter Israel, this would be tantamount to capitulating to Israel, for if the US gave the UAR one missile, it would throw open its whole arsenal to Israel. (Ahram, July 12)

It would appear that in the end the UAR did not buy the American rockets. A Cairo source said in Nov that the agreement for the purchase had been cancelled. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Nov 20)

UAR Developing Guided Missiles with Aid of West German Experts. At the beginning of Nov it became known that four West German scientists had been dismissed from their posts in a German state-owned research institute for having worked on rocket development in the UAR.

Concerned in the matter was the Forschungsinstitut für Physik der Strahlentriebe (research institute for jet propulsion physics), in Stuttgart, which was financed by the Federal Republic and by the Länder. The dismissed were: Professor Eugen Sänger, Professor Paul Goercke, Engineer Wolfgang Pilz and Dr Heinz Krug.

Professor Sänger, at the time 53 years old, was the scientific director of the institute. He was described as a leading international expert on rocket motors. Under the Nazi regime, in 1936, he established a rocket research institute and during WWII he worked mainly on the development of jet fighter aircraft. After 1945 he continued scientific work for the French Ministry of Aviation and in 1954 he became the Director of the Stuttgart institute. According to German press reports. Prof.

Sänger had encountered professional difficulties in Germany and his work had been disparaged there. His wife, Dr. Irene Sänger-Bredt, served as deputy director of the institute.

In a letter to Sänger the Federal Minister of Transport stated that the government considered the professor's research work for the Egyptians as exceeding the extent of the subsidiary work he was permitted under his contract.

W. Pilz, who, it was reported, had settled permanently in Cairo, had earlier participated in the development of the French research rocket Veronique.

Dr Krug was the business manager of the Stuttgart institute; at the same time he was Director of his own firm, INTRA, also located in Stuttgart. This firm, Wehr und Wirtschaft reported, was "flourishing extraordinarily." [It became known later that INTRA was engaged in supplying experts and materials for missile development in the UAR.]

According to the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, a fifth person, Prof. Dadieu, who had also worked for the UAR, remained on the staff of the institute.

The reports available did not state at which time Sänger and his fellow scientists had started work for the UAR. Sänger said he had worked in Egypt only during his vacations and only on purely scientific subjects; he had disclosed no secret information. Members of the institute were, however, reported to have pointed out that he had been paid by the UAR government DM600,000 ($150,000), a rather high fee for purely scientific lectures and laboratory work. (Wehr und Wirtschaft, Nov; Süddeutsche Zeitung, Nov 6; Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, Nov 6, 7; Die Welt, Nov 10; Times, Nov 7)

A Cairo source said that all that Prof. Sänger and his colleagues had done in the UAR was to instruct some Egyptian scientists; all research on the Egyptian missiles was 100% Egyptian. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Nov 20)

In Dee, the Baden-Württemberg Minister of Economy, in answer to a parliamentary question, said that Sänger and his colleagues had been promised DM2m. ($500,000) in connection with the production of rockets for Egypt. He said he understood that about half the amount had already been paid. He confirmed that Sänger himself was to have received DM600,000. He added that a firm had been formed in West Germany to carry out the Egyptian order (probably a reference to INTRA) and rocket parts had been exported to Egypt. (Jer. Post, Dec 3)

Missile Test in the UAR? Immediately after the news broke over the dismissal of the German experts, it was reported from Cairo that "during the past six months" an Egyptian rocket had been successfully tested. The Times correspondent reported that Cairo officials refused to disclose details. (Times, Nov 8)

At the same time the Cairo Radio and press began talking of an "Arab rocket" (isrâkîh arabî) as an accomplished fact, without, however, reporting any concrete news. Quoting Israeli papers and the world press, these sources said that the rocket had struck terror in the heart of Israel, and, in the words of Al-Ahram, the whole world was talking about the Arab rocket. Cairo Radio said in its Hebrew comment that the UAR was not to blame for the arms race in the ME; Israel, under imperialist influence, had been the first to introduce missiles in the area. (R. Cairo, Nov 7, 8 [10]; IMB, Nov 7, 8, 9; Ahram, Gumhuriyah, Nov 7)

Lebanese [pro UAR] papers said that the missile tested was of the V-2 type which the Germans employed against Britain during WWI. The launching had been supervised by German experts. (Kul Shay, Nov 11; Al-Ushu' al-Arabi, quoted by Cairo television, Nov 16-IMB, Nov 17)

A Cairo source said that the rocket propellant had been produced in Egypt by Egyptians and from Egyptian materials. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Nov 20)

The Cairo press and radio claimed that Israel and French pressure on Bonn, exercised through NATO, had caused the dismissal of Prof. Sänger. (R. Cairo, Nov 8-IMB, Nov 9; Ahram, Nov 9)

Israeli scientific sources and the press doubted that a missile had successfully been launched in Egypt. It was thought that the publicity given by Cairo to the reports was aimed at boosting the prestige of President Abdel Nasser which had been declining because of the breakup of the UAR. (Ma'ariv, Nov 9; Ha'aretz, Haboker, Nov 10)

"Missile Race" Seen. The Times thought that the reported missile test was a response to the firing of Shavit II. "Reports that Egypt had been testing rockets of West German origin are not unexpected," the paper commented, "but are a grim reminder of the competition in arms going on all the time in the ME. When Israel fired her home-made rocket fifty miles into the ionosphere last July the Arabs could hardly be blamed for thinking that this was not a piece of disinterested research into the weather. It was, in fact, an example of Israel's research for a deterrent with which to offset her disadvantages in numbers. Egypt has predictably responded by trying to catch up." (Times, Nov 10)

THE US ATTITUDE DEFINED

The State Department's views on the question of rockets and missiles were made known in a letter from Assistant Secretary of State Brooks Hays to Senator Kenneth B. Keating (Rep.—N.Y.). The letter sought to explain why the US gave licences to export US experimental rockets to the UAR but rejected an Israeli application to purchase anti-aircraft missiles. Mr. Hays said that "in accordance with its policy of avoiding measures which might stimulate an arms race in the Near East, the US has refrained from supplying (military) missiles to any of the countries of that region." Hays said that "at present no nation in the Near East possesses missile-type weapons. It would indeed be inconsistent with our desire to see peace reinforced and progress achieved towards the settlement of the difficult Near Eastern problems were this country to bear first responsibility for setting off a new and more dangerous form of arms competition in that area. It would also be unfortunate were this country by actions of this kind to open opportunities for Soviet moves inevitably aimed at increasing tensions in the area and advancing the Communist cause. This would be neither in Israel's interest nor in our own." Justifying the sale of "Viper" and "Javelin" rockets to the UAR, Hays said, "they are of negligible military importance and similar types are manufactured in several countries." They were provided to the UAR for meteorological research purposes. (Jer. Post, Sept 8)

THE QUESTION OF DISARMAMENT

Background Note: In August 1949, following the signing of armistice agreements between Israel and her neighbours, the UN lifted the arms embargo (including an inspection system) which it had imposed on the area for the duration of the war.

While Israel suggested that some form of international arms control should be maintained, the Western Powers tended to consider the armistice agreements as sufficient. When an arms race developed in the ME, the UK, France, and the US restated their policies in the Tripartite Declaration of May 25, 1950: they stress, 'their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab countries and Israel, and specified considerations that would govern arms supplies to the ME. (See MER 1960, p 93.)

Israeli spokesmen at the UN repeatedly advocated a ME disarmament, first in the framework of a peace settlement (e.g., Ambassador Abba Eban on Dec 1, 1952), and, from 1957 on, independently and in advance of such a settlement, in the form of a convention endorsed by the UN and guaranteed in any appropriate way (M. Comay at the 829th meeting of the First Committee, Jan 25, 1957). This proposal was repeated several times. On Dec 16, 1959, a newly formed Israel government, headed by PM Ben-Gurion, included a disarmament proposal in its "Basic Principles" (programme), which was endorsed by the Knesset (the Parliament). It said that Israel would propose to all her Arab neighbours an agreement leading to full disarmament and the abolition of the armed forces in Israel and the Arab states, on condition that control of this agreement was assured and that the borders and sovereignty of these states were not affected. Israel's Foreign Minister, Mrs. Golda Meir, reiterated Israel's attitude at the 15th session of the UN General Assembly. (See Subject Index for MER 1960.)

The only reaction of the Arab countries to these proposals was to reject them outright, charging that they were mere propaganda, or else asserting that the Arabs could not possibly disarm in face of what they described as Israeli aggression. In fact, as the Arab countries refused to recognize even the existence of Israel, refused to have any dealings with her, claimed belligerent rights and asserted that they were preparing for Israel's liquidation, disarmament agreements were for them inconceivable.

Vice-President Johnson Hopes for Reduction of Armaments; ME Reactions. In a speech to a Zionist audience in New York on Feb 5, Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson stressed the need for disarmament in the ME: "For the people of the ME the margin of bare survival is too narrow to make tolerable the maintenance of costly burdens of arms. We hope the day will quickly come when these burdens can be reduced. This is essential not only to world peace but to the improvement of the lives of the people of the Middle East."

Replying to a press inquiry the following day, Secretary of State Dean Rusk said that this was "one of the fields where preliminary or premature public comment would not be helpful." (N.E. Report, Feb 15)

On March 20, Mrs. Meir, the Israel FM, referred to Johnson's statement in a speech in the Knesset, and said: "I want to affirm that, in moving towards that objective, Washington will find a loyal partner in the Government of Israel." (Jer. Post, March 21)

A Cairo commentator, reacting to Mrs. Meir's statement, cited instances of Israel's arming and asked whether this was part of a campaign for peace and the reduction in armaments. He asked who had told Golda Meir that the Arabs would agree to reduce their arms while "the gangster state is on our border?" As long as Israel remained what it was at present, force would be the only means to come to an understanding with it and the Arabs would sacrifice everything in order to acquire more modern and mightier weapons. (R. Cairo, March 21 [22])

Israel Reiterates Disarmament Proposals. On Oct 1, 1961, at the 16th session of the UN General Assembly, Mrs. Meir, the Israel FM said: "We propose, that, simultaneously with the search for a general agreement on disarmament, we should seek to reach agreement also on disarmament with mutual inspection and control for specific zones or situations of international tension... Israel is prepared to elaborate a programme to that end, and we call upon the Arab states to cooperate with us in this venture." She said Israel admitted that the preservation of the country's security constituted a heavy financial burden. However, she continued, "we will do everything within our power to be able to defend our country if attacked. But we once more ask our neighbours—where is all this leading? We seek no military victories, all we want is peace. We want the development of our country and a decent life for our people. Is not this what the Arab masses need as well?" (A/PV 1030)

Arab Spokesmen Reject Bid, Hold Israel's Existence Responsible for Arms Race. Mahmūd Fawzi, the UAR FM, called Israel "a spearhead of imperialism and neocolonialism," and continued: "None of this has, however, deterred the Israel spokesmen from repeating to the Assembly, one year after another, the same refrain of claimed Israeli innocence, immaculate record and deep love for peace... but it cannot possibly deceive the fair-minded or the well-informed." (A/PV 1634)

Ahmad Shukairy, the representative of Saudi Arabia, made the following remarks on "the proposal of disarmament which the lady has put forward to the Arab states. Let me say outright that coming from Israel the word 'disarmament' is a mockery of disarmament. It was the establishment of Israel in the ME that led to rearmament in the Arab states. Since that time, defence expenditures in the Arab states have risen from one to twenty... Without Israel there would have been in the region nothing except simple security forces; and with Israel out of the region there will be total and general disarmament in the area... without any need for the lady to make any proposal." (A/PV 1039)

[The representatives of Morocco, Iraq, Yemen, Sudan and Syria took part in the debate but did not refer to Mrs. Meir's speech.]

THE ARAB REFUGEES

SYNOPSIS

NOTE: [All US involvements in the refugee question outside the UN and the Palestine Conciliation Commission are dealt with under: The US and Arab-Israel Conflict (pp 193 ff).]

No major changes were noted in the Arab refugee problem during the year. The UN re-endorsed its 1948 resolution calling for repatriation or compensation. The Arab delegations also advocated the implementation of the resolution, but their spokesmen made it clear—at the UN and especially at home—that as far as they were concerned the true solution of the problem lay in the elimination of Israel. Israel saw in the Arab demand to return the refugees an aim to destroy her and she publicly resolved that no refugees would return.

For a time there was evidence of an American effort to move towards a settlement of the problem; however, nothing came of this initiative. In the end the US attitude proved material in maintaining the political status quo in face of attempts by both the Arab states and Israel to change it in their favour.

In April the 15th UN session resumed the debate on the refugees which it had failed to conclude in Nov 1960 (MER 1960, pp 212-3). The Arab delegations had then advocated two measures: (1) the appointment of a custodian for properties the refugees had left behind in Israel and (2) the enlargement of the Palestine Conciliation Commission (PCC) by adding representatives of the Eastern bloc and of uncommitted nations. When the session resumed, an Arab-backed draft resolution sponsored by Muslim countries was introduced; it included the second demand only though the first was to come up again at the 16th session. The "property rights" protection proposal which was supported by the USSR was strongly objected to by Israel on the grounds—among others—that the UN had no right to interfere in the internal affairs of any country. The US and several other countries also opposed it. Though it was approved by the Special Political Committee, it failed to be adopted by the plenary; the Arabs accused the US of behind-the-scenes tactics in securing its failure.

The resolution adopted by the plenary (1604 XV) requested the PCC to make efforts to secure the implementation of para 11 of GA resolution 194 (III) (see MER 1960, p 211) and report thereon not later than Oct 15, 1961. The revival of the PCC, an effort which had begun in 1959 after many years of the commission's dormancy, was wished for by both the Arabs and the US.

The specific date for the PCC report had originally been proposed by the US. In the months following the 15th session the US made it even clearer that it meant to probe the possibilities of a solution to the refugee problem and that it wished to do so through the PCC. During the presidential election campaign Kennedy had promised to make an effort to bring about an Arab-Israel settlement (MER 1960, pp 108-9), and after his inauguration some American initiative had been expected. The wish to ease congressional resentment against appropriating each year large sums for the upkeep of the refugees ($24.3 million for the year 1961) was thought also to have influenced the administration. Both the Arab countries and Israel watched the American moves with apprehension.

In May President Kennedy sent letters to six Arab heads of state which outlined the US position on ME questions and put emphasis on the refugee issue. He said that the US was determined to use its influence toward a just and peaceful solution of the Arab-Israel controversy. The US was willing to help resolve the refugee problem on the basis of repatriation or compensation and in a way most beneficial to the refugees. He made it clear that the US wished to work through the PCC.

Three weeks later the issue was discussed by President Kennedy and PM Ben-Gurion during an informal meeting in New York. The Israeli PM said the President had offered "a suggestion that may be a solution" to the problem; according to press reports—repatriation of a certain percentage and resettlement and emigration of the remainder. The State Department immediately denied that there had been any understanding on a specific solution. In July Secretary of State Dean Rusk expressly denied that the administration had suggested the repatriation of a specific number of refugees or, indeed, that the Department had any specific plan at all in mind.

In May the PCC (comprising France, Turkey and the US) decided to appoint a Special Representative "to explore with host governments and with Israel practical means of seeking progress on the... refugee problem" pursuant to resolution 1604 (XV), mentioned above. In June a high State Department official reaffirmed that the US was taking "most seriously" its responsibilities to provide in time the PCC report which, it hoped, would make a constructive contribution to the consideration of the problem. During the same period US press reports said the administration thought the political situation in the ME favourable to a new approach to the problem. In Aug the PCC appointed as its Special Representative Joseph E. Johnson, a US citizen; earlier it was reported that a Swiss diplomat had refused to undertake the mission as he saw no prospects for progress. A French statement made it clear that the mission was primarily a US enterprise.

Johnson toured the ME in Sept; the conclusions of his report appeared in the PCC's 15th Progress Report, in Oct. The report itself was published in Nov. Johnson found that no progress could be made on the refugee question apart from, or in advance of, an overall settlement. However, he stated that both sides had expressed a willingness—with reservations—to consider a "step-by-step process that might lead to progress of the refugee issue" without prejudice to their positions on related issues. Johnson suggested that the PCC appoint a special representative for another year. He also concluded that there would be Palestine refugees and their need for UN assistance for at least a decade, and that there was needed accelerated economic growth for the area as a whole in which the refugees should have a chance to share. Before publication Johnson had made changes in the report, including deletions of passages on the historical origins of the refugee problem; Israel reportedly expressed its displeasure at these changes.

In Nov, before the 16th UN session took up the issue, Israel clarified her stand when the Knesset resolved that "the Arab refugees should not be returned to Israel." At the same time the offer, made in 1949, to take back

100,000 refugees was officially withdrawn. PM Ben-Gurion said that the proposal to grant the refugees freedom of choice was designed to destroy Israel. The passing of the resolution at this time could be traced to Israel's apprehension that pressure would be exerted on her to accept refugees who, she felt, would jeopardize her very existence. This resulted from the US initiative in raising the refugee question which had been in the headlines for a good part of the year. Moreover, the refugee issue had been widely discussed during the Israel Knesset election campaign in the summer. An Arab reaction was that in any case the refugees would not consent to become Israel citizens; they would return as "a result of Israel's non-existence."

The 16th UN session dealt with the refugee issue in Dec, the item on the agenda being, as usual, the "Report of the Director of the UNRWA." The Director, Dr Davis, recapitulated his arguments of the previous year (MER 1960, pp 211-2), maintaining that the responsibility for solving the refugee problem did not rest with the Arab host governments. As there was no "equitable solution" in sight, UN assistance would have to continue. The UNRWA's budget estimate for 1962 was $39.2 million. Again, as in the previous year, the report was praised by Arab and criticized by Israel spokesmen.

During the debate in the Special Political Committee, the Arab delegations endeavoured, as their chief coordinator stated, to defeat any attempt to liquidate the "issue of a robbed homeland" under "cover of solving the refugee problem."

The Arabs again called for the enlargement of the PCC and for protecting the refugees' "property rights." These demands were presented in amendments by three Muslim countries to a US draft resolution. They were supported by the Communist countries among others and adopted by the committee.

Israel, on the other hand, backed a draft resolution sponsored by 16 countries, calling for direct negotiations between the Arab countries and Israel. Israel had called for direct negotiations all along while the Arab countries categorically refused to enter into any negotiations. The committee rejected the proposal.

The US opposed both the Israel-backed resolution and the Arab demands.

The plenary rejected the amendments and adopted the original US draft which requested the PCC to intensify its efforts for the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 (III) and to complete by Sept 1, 1962 the identification and evaluation of Arab refugees' properties in Palestine as of May 15, 1948.

There were no material changes in the status and situation of the refugees themselves. Since in the words of Dr Davis, the Director of UNRWA, the Arabs in general refused to recognize Israel as a "permanent component" of the ME, resettlement of the refugees in the Arab countries was not acceptable to them. In addition, Dr Davis and others maintained, there were also economic and social limitations to the absorption of the refugees in the host countries. With the exception of Jordan, the Arab host countries continued their policy of political non-assimilation and economic non-integration of the refugees, though, according to Dr Davis, they were treated generously.

Refugees continued to be a contributing factor to the political instability of their host countries. In Syria, after the break-up of the UAR, refugees engaged in pro-Nasser activities. In Lebanon, on the other hand, refugees participated in the abortive coup d'état of the pan-Syrian, anti-Nasser Nationalist Social Party.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE REFUGEE QUESTION

15TH ASSEMBLY RESUMED

Synopsis. The UN Special Political Committee, having failed to conclude the discussion of the Arab refugee item during the first part of the 15th UN Assembly in autumn 1960 (MER 1960, pp 212-3), resumed the debate in the second part of the session between April 11 and 18; the resolution adopted was put to vote in the plenary on April 21.

The debate was dominated by the Arab delegations' insistence on the inclusion of provisions for the protection of the refugees' "property rights" in Israel. This demand was strongly opposed by Israel and also by several other countries headed by the US. The Arab proposals were accepted by the committee but failed to be adopted by the plenary.

Preliminary Talks Collapse on "Property Rights" Issue; US Opposition to Arab Demand. For several weeks prior to the resumption of the debate numerous meetings had taken place between the delegations of the "host countries" (Jordan, Egypt, Syria and Lebanon) and the representatives of the US and UK, as the major contributors to UNRWA, in an attempt to work out a draft resolution acceptable to both sides, but no agreement was reached. The main difficulty had been the Arabs' insistence on including provisions for safeguarding the refugees' "property rights" in Israel, to which the Western countries had objected. When the debate was resumed the US representative said that his government's view had been that "the Committee did not need to adopt a resolution unless something in the [UNRWA Director's] report made it necessary, and in point of fact, no such action was needed"; nevertheless, in deference to Arab views, the US had been willing to support a draft resolution "if the terms were essentially non-controversial and did not go beyond the terms of previous resolutions." The Jordanian delegate stated that in the course of the conversations the Arab spokesmen "had accepted changes and deletions and had toned down certain expressions; they had always been ready to agree to a compromise, except where the property rights of the Palestine Arab refugees were concerned." (Hayat, April 2; NYT, April 15; A/SPC/SR.247, 249, April 12, 13)

"Muslim" Draft Resolution; US Amendments. (Note: For text of the resolution and amendments, see appendix, pp 242-3). The Arab-backed resolution, released on April 7, was sponsored by five Muslim States—Afghanistan, Indonesia, Malaya, Pakistan and Somalia—and was presented to the Special Political Committee at the opening of the resumed discussion of the refugee question on April 11 by the Indonesian representative. Key provisions proposed that the Assembly should (1) note with regret that the PCC had not yet reported progress on the task entrusted to it in the previous year's resolution concerning the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 (III) (MER 1960, p 211), and request the Commission to make efforts for the implementation of the paragraph and report thereon to the 16th session; and (2) recommend to the Assembly at its next session "the establishment of appropriate and effective machinery for safeguarding the property rights" of the refugees. (A/SPC/L. 61, April 7; A/SPC/SR. 246, April 11; see appendix)

US Amendments: Deleting Property Rights Reference. On April 12, the US representative, Francis Plimpton, told the committee that the US was presenting four amendments to the five-nation draft. Two were designed to delete the reference to "property rights," which, he argued, "would wrongly suggest that 'property rights' must be the central issue at the 16th session" and, furthermore, raised a matter which was the subject of bitter dispute between the parties concerned. Another amendment requested that the PCC report be submitted not later than Oct 15, 1961. (S/SPC/SR. 247, April 12; A/SPC/L. 62, April 12)

The representative of Pakistan announced on the same day that the sponsors did not accept the amendments to the property provisions, but were ready to accept the other changes proposed by the US. (A/SPC/SR. 248, April 12; see appendix)

US Stand Attacked by Arabs. Ahmad Shukairy, the representative of Saudi Arabia, declared that the US amendments "would demolish the very structure" of the five-power draft resolution, since the question of property rights was "the very heart" of the problem. He asserted that the refugees had owned 20 towns and 841 villages, some 288,000 acres of fruit-growing land, 6,000 acres of irrigable land, and 1,135,000 acres of cultivable land; they had produced 80% of Palestine's cereal crops, 98% of its olives and over 50% of its citrus. The revenue from Arab property, Shukairy further claimed, amounted to £47.5 million a year. The course of the debate, he said, had revealed a paradox: "The Soviet Union, although a Communist country, was prepared to respect private ownership as a system for other countries, thus setting an example of peaceful coexistence, whereas the US, a capitalist country, opposed property rights." His delegation, he concluded, would vote against the US amendments, "firstly because they came from the United States," and also because the deletion of any reference to the refugees' property rights was "a shameful betrayal" of the UN Charter. (A/SPC/SR. 247, 252, April 12, 17)

Abd al-Mun'im ar-Rifa'i, the delegate of Jordan, warned that the rejection of the property provisions would convince the refugees more than ever that they would have to find "other means" of securing their rights" (A/SPC/SR. 249, April 13). The UAR representative, Rafiq Asha, claimed that there was "nothing new or controversial" about the question of property rights. He declared that the US amendments were designed to serve the interests of Israel and warned that amendments might give rise to demonstrations and... violence... and the repercussions would not be limited to refugee camps alone but would spread far beyond their confines." (A/SPC/SR. 251, April 14)

The Lebanese representative also said that the question of property rights was not a new one, for the fifth Assembly had directed the Palestine Conciliation

Commission (PCC) to deal with it (A/SPC/SR. 249, April 13). [This claim was not made by the sponsors of the draft resolution.] The representative of Indonesia, in presenting the draft to the committee, stated that the property rights paragraphs constituted a "major departure from previous resolutions" (A/SPC/SR. 246, April 11). The Pakistan representative said that they "introduced an important element that had not been included in the earlier resolution on the subject." (A/SPC/SR. 248, April 12)

Iraq and Libya Introduce Sub-amendments. Addressing the committee on April 12 Adnan Pachachi, the Iraqi representative, termed the US attitude "a somewhat belated effort to salvage Israel's position," and announced that his delegation, together with that of Libya, had decided to submit sub-amendments.

The sub-amendments provided for the inclusion of the two controversial US amendments in the draft resolution while restoring the references to "property rights" which they aimed to suppress. (A/SPC/SR. 248, A/SPC/L. 63, April 12, see appendix pp 242-3)

At a later stage, at the suggestion of the Indian delegate, the Iraqi representative agreed, "in a spirit of compromise," to drop the provision for establishing "machinery" for safeguarding property rights and rest content with a recommendation to the 16th session to consider the welfare of the refugees, "including the means of safeguarding their property rights." (A/SPC/SR. 252, April 17)

Israel's Position: No "Property Rights"; PCC's Functions Not Limited to Paragraph 11. On April 14 Arthur Lourie, Israel's representative, said that it was obvious from the Arab delegates' speeches that "they were not concerned with the solution of the problem of the refugees but only with the dissolution of Israel." He observed that there had been no mention of the fact that half a million Jews had come to Israel from Arabic-speaking countries and that there had actually been an exchange of population between Israel and those countries. As to the property of the Jewish refugees, "no indication has as yet been received that the Arab countries in question were ready to pay compensation, let alone whether they would accept a UN administrator or custodian or machinery to deal with property in their territories."

Lourie stated that para 1 of the draft resolution was unacceptable because it dealt with the functions of the PCC, whereas the item on the agenda was the UNRWA report. Besides, "the attempt to pretend that the Commission's task was to 'implement' one paragraph of resolution 194 (III) torn out of its context, was not only an exercise in futility but a negation of the Commission's primary function [of seeking agreement between the parties], and undermined the basis of all cooperation with it." Property rights were subject to the domestic laws of every state, he said, and the UN had no competence to interfere with such legislation; otherwise "the UN would be involved in the claims of tens of millions of persons throughout the world." Lourie noted that the actual situation was that the lands in question had long since been integrated, in law and in practice, in Israel's reclamation and development schemes. Israel's offer to pay compensation for the property of Arab refugees, he stated, still held good, but it would be subject to "serious reconsideration" if the UN adopted a recommendation of the kind that the Arab countries were trying to obtain. (A/SPC/SR. 250, April 14)

US Surprise Move: Withdraws Amendments, Presents Separate Resolution. Towards the end of the debate, on April 17, the US delegation announced that it had "reluctantly concluded" that the Committee would have to be offered "a clear-cut choice between two resolutions"; it was therefore withdrawing its amendments to the five-nation draft resolution and submitting a draft resolution of its own. The new draft would have had the General Assembly, La., express the belief that the 16th session should give careful consideration to the future welfare of the refugees, "including the safeguarding of their rights set forth in resolution 194 (III), para 11, to repatriation or compensation for properties left behind." (A/SPC/SR. 252, A/SPC/L. 65, April 17)

It was generally assumed that this change of tactics had been decided upon by the US without its customary round of prior consultations with friendly governments. Some diplomats even believed that the move had been initiated by the US delegation at the UN without having consulted the State Department. (NYT, April 18; Haaretz, April 21)

Arabs and Israel Protest US Draft. Both the Israeli and the Arab representatives, voicing different arguments, immediately protested that the new US draft gave a "twisted" paraphrasing of para 11. The next day the US delegation presented a revised draft which omitted the last eight words: "to repatriation or compensation, for properties left behind." Nevertheless, the representative of Saudi Arabia insisted that the US proposal "was nothing more than an Israel proposal," while the Israel representative declared that his delegation was reserving its position on the US draft, "which gave a selective rendering of resolution 194" and wrongly suggested that the resolution conferred "rights" on the refugees. (A/SPC/SR. 253, A/SPC/L. 65, Rev. 1, April 18)

As the withdrawal of the US amendments invalidated the Iraqi-Libyan sub-amendments, the representative of Iraq proposed that the sponsors of the five-nation draft resolution revise it themselves in accordance with the relative sub-amendments. The sponsors accepted the proposal. (A/SPC/SR. 252, April 17; see appendix)

States Supporting "Property Rights" Proposal. Unqualified support for the Arab position was voiced by the USSR representative, Platon Morozov, who declared that his delegation was "deeply impressed" by Shukairy's speech and considered Israel's attitude towards the question of property rights "completely intolerable." The US representative commented that he welcomed the Soviet Union's adherence to the principle of private property, and would also welcome a contribution by the Soviet Union "which had not yet found it possible to contribute anything" to the welfare of the Arab refugees. The Soviet representative replied that, since the USSR delegation was not responsible for the failure to implement the UN resolution concerning the Arab refugees, the US representative's remarks were "wide of the mark." (A/SPC/SR. 248, April 12)

The "property rights" provisions were also upheld by the delegations of Nigeria, Spain, Argentina and Guinea (A/SPC/SR. 250, 252, 253, 254, April 14, 17, 18). The representatives of China, Iran and India, while generally declaring themselves in sympathy with the Arab viewpoint on "property rights," suggested modifications in the relative provisions to make them less unpalatable to other delegations. (A/SPC/SR. 249, 250, 252, April 13, 14, 17)

States Opposing "Property Rights" Proposal; Other Attitudes. The delegations of the UK and Colombia supported the US stand (A/SPC/SR. 248, April 12). Israel's arguments were echoed in the statements of the representatives of Sweden and Canada, who voiced objections to the five-nation draft resolution both because of its property provisions and because it referred to para 11 of resolution 194 (III) "out of context" (A/SPC/SR. 252, 253, April 17, 18), as well as in those of the representatives of Upper Volta, the Central African Republic and Uruguay, who said that progress on the refugee problem could only be achieved through direct negotiations between the Arab countries and Israel with a view to settling all the questions outstanding between them. (A/SPC/SR. 252, 253, April 17, 18)

Irish Proposal for Pilot Repatriation, Compensation. The representative of Ireland, elaborating on the proposal made by the Irish delegation in the refugee debate during the first part of the 15th UN session (MER 1960, p. 213), submitted suggestions for the wording of a resolution which he hoped the next UN session might adopt, under which the GA would "call upon the Government of Israel to declare its willingness to carry out at least a pilot repatriation scheme without any other condition than that these refugees should undertake to live at peace with their neighbours"; it would also provide for the compensation of refugees not returning to Israel, to be paid not only in respect of property left behind but also in respect of "disturbance and time spent unproductively in refugee camps"; finally it would call upon UN member-states, and particularly upon Israel, to be ready to contribute to the compensation fund. As for the five-nation draft resolution before the committee, the Irish representative announced that his delegation could not vote for it. (A/SPC/SR. 254, April 18)

SPC Approves Five-Nation Draft; Rejects US Draft. On April 18 the Special Political Committee began voting, taking up the "Muslim" draft resolution first. In the separate votes on the various parts of the draft the "property rights" provisions in the last preambular and second operative paragraphs were adopted by 46 votes to 20, with 20 abstentions, and 46 votes to 18, with 22 abstentions, respectively. The 46 affirmative votes were cast by the Arab countries, the sponsors, the Soviet bloc, the African countries excluding countries of the UAM (Union Africaine et Malgache), four Latin-American countries (Argentina, Cuba, Mexico and Venezuela), and by Cambodia, Ceylon, China, Cyprus, Greece, India, Iran, Nepal, Philippines, Spain, Turkey and Yugoslavia.

The first operative paragraph (as amended on a UK motion—see appendix, pp. 242-3) was approved by 55 votes to none, with 25 abstentions; and the resolution as a whole was adopted by 47 votes to 19, with 20 abstentions. (A/SPC/SR. 253, April 18)

The US draft, on the other hand, was rejected by the committee. The result of the roll-call vote was 30 in favour, 31 against, with 15 abstentions. It was opposed by the Arab and Muslim countries, the Soviet bloc, Ceylon, Cuba, Greece, Guinea, India, Mali, Spain, and Yugoslavia. Israel was among the abstainers. (A/SPC/SR. 254, April 18)

The Arab delegations applauded when the results of the vote were announced. It was the first time in years that the US was defeated in the UN over the refugee question. This was ascribed to lack of consultation with friendly delegations, prior to the introduction of the draft resolution, and to the absence of delegations usually supporting the US. Finally, several potential supporters were reported to have been confused by the US speed in modifying its draft resolution to make it less objectionable to the Arabs. (NYT, April 19)

Property Provisions Defeated in GA Plenary; Arabs Claim US Pressure. The five-nation draft resolution was put to vote in the plenary on April 21, three days after its adoption by the committee. The Arab delegates, in their statements prior to the vote, addressed themselves in particular to the position of the US, which—according to the Lebanese representative—"in the last three days... has employed all the means at its disposal to exert pressure at the UN and in the various capitals of the world." Israel's representative, on the other hand, declared that the course advocated by the five-nation draft "is a complete dead-end and my government will have nothing to do with it."

The Arab representatives opposed the requests made by some delegations for separate votes on various paragraphs of the draft resolution, so that the first test of force in the plenary related to this procedural issue which, according to GA rules, is decided by a simple majority. By 41 votes to 37, the GA decided to vote separately on the "property rights" paragraphs.

These paragraphs were then put to roll-call votes. The results of the vote on the fourth preambular para were 44 in favour, 35 against, and 12 abstentions; and the vote on the second operative para was 44 to 35, with 15 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, these paragraphs were not adopted.

[The difference in the results of the votes in the committee and in the plenary was accounted for by the fact that Argentina and the Philippines, which had supported the property provisions in the committee, did not support them this time (the former was absent and the latter abstained). On the other hand, several countries which had abstained in the committee—notably the Latin-American countries: Bolivia, Chile, Peru and Uruguay, the UAM members: Cameroun, Chad, Congo (B), Dahomey and Upper Volta, and Finland—switched to a negative vote in the plenary.]

The resolution as a whole, without the "property rights" paragraphs, was adopted by 37 votes to 17, with 38 abstentions. The 40-odd countries which had supported the property provisions and had previously voted as a group became disorganized in this last vote. Most of the Arab countries abstained, but Jordan voted against; Malaya voted against whereas the other four sponsors of the resolution voted affirmatively; the USSR, Ukraine and Bulgaria voted in favour while the other Communist countries abstained. Israel voted against (A/PV. 993, April 21); (for detailed voting record, see pp 18-9).

Israel Reported Perturbed, Arabs Critical of US. Israel sources ascribed the changes in the plenary vote as compared with the committee vote on the "property rights" paragraphs to intensive Israel lobbying in the intervening days. Even so, official Israeli quarters were reported to be perturbed by the unfriendly or neutral attitude of some of the Latin-American and African countries as expressed by their votes. (Jer. Post, April 22; Ha'aretz, April 24, May 2)

Veheement criticism by the Jordanian press of the US attitude during the UN debate reportedly induced the US Ambassador in Amman to state that the criticism rested on a "misunderstanding." The fact that the US had advocated the postponement of the refugee debate to the 16th UN session, he was reported to have said, did not mean that it did not support the refugees' "property rights." (Falastin, April 26)

THE PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION THE JOHNSON MISSION

(June-November)

Appointment of Johnson as Conciliation Commission's "Special Representative" to Tour ME. On Aug 24 it was announced that the PCC had appointed Dr Joseph E. Johnson to be its Special Representative to undertake a visit to the ME "to explore with host governments and with Israel practical means of seeking progress on the... refugee problem, pursuant to resolution 1604 (XV) of the UN" (which, among other things, requested the Commission "to make further efforts to secure the implementation of para 11 of GA resolution 194 (III) and report thereon not later than Oct 15, 1961"). Johnson, a US citizen, served at the time of the appointment as President of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. From 1942 to 1947 he had served in the State Department. (UN Press Release PAL/876, Aug 24)

The decision to appoint such a representative, the Commission later reported, had been taken on May 9. (UN document, A/4921, Oct 13)

US Initiative. When, at the end of June, first reports appeared on the impending mission, Israel sources said it was initiated by the US. (On the American policy to activate the PCC see also pp 193 ff.)

The Jerusalem Post said that the Special Representative would come "presumably in the name of the long-defunct Palestine Conciliation Commission, and quite possibly he will not be an American national. Nevertheless, he will come, in the wide sense, as an emissary of the State Department or possibly of President Kennedy himself." Noting the letters of President Kennedy to Arab heads of state which had been leaked to the press shortly before (see pp 197-8), the paper thought that President Kennedy's "peace offensive" seemed to gain momentum. (Jer. Post, June 19)

Initially, it was reported, the US had proposed that Augustus Lindt, the Swiss Ambassador to Washington and a former UN High Commissioner for Refugees, undertake the mission but he declined on the grounds that he could see no prospects for progress. (Jer. Post, Aug 25)

[A French statement made it clear that France had no part in initiating the mission.] A Quai d'Orsay spokesman said that the US had explained to the French government that the Johnson mission would be of an exploratory nature only. There was no question of Johnson trying to implement UN resolutions or acting as advocate of any particular thesis. Under the circumstances, the spokesman added, France, as a PCC member, saw no reason to raise any objections, though it did not entertain any illusions as to the results which might be expected of "this American initiative." (Jer. Post, Aug 29; Difa, Aug 30)

The Johnson Mission. Johnson left UN headquarters for the ME tour on Aug 31 and returned on Sept 20. He came to Beirut on Sept 1; went to Amman via Damascus on Sept 4; returned to Beirut on Sept 8; went to Cairo on Sept 9; entered Israel from the Gaza Strip on Sept 13; and on Sept 16 crossed to the Arab part of Jerusalem, whence he left for New York. He had talks, i.e., with the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of Lebanon, Jordan and Israel, King Hussein, the UAR Foreign Minister, the SG of the Arab League, and the Director of UNRWA. (Hayat, Sept 2, 9, 11; Falastin, Sept 5-10; Jer. Post, Sept 14-17; Johnson report, see reference below.)

Statements and Reports on Stands Taken at Johnson Talks. The Lebanese FM, Philippe Taqia, said that he had explained to Johnson that the refugee problem could only be solved within the framework of an overall solution of the Palestine problem. Similarly, the Arab League SG, Hassanah, said that he had told Johnson that the refugee problem was merely a part of the Palestine problem. (Falastin, Sept 10; Hayat, Sept 12; Times, Sept 11)

Bahjat al-Talhuni, the Jordanian PM, declared at a press conference that the Jordan government had told Johnson that no solution of the refugee problem was acceptable unless Israel withdrew from areas beyond the boundaries delimited by the UN partition resolution. This, he added, would in itself enable a major proportion of the refugees to return to their former homes; the question of granting the refugees a choice between return and compensation arose only in respect of those refugees who had formerly lived in the areas allocated to Israel under the partition resolution. (Falastin, Sept 19)

[In Israel, there was no official comment on the substance of the talks held with Johnson.] Ha'aretz thought it "probable" that the Israeli leaders had told Johnson that, while they were ready to contribute to the solution of the problem by the payment of compensation and through other means, they could not agree to the mass return of refugees to Israel or recognize that the refugees were entitled to a "free choice" between returning to Israel and remaining in the Arab countries. (Ha'aretz, Sept 15)

PCC's Report on the Johnson Mission. The PCC's 19th Progress Report was published on Oct 13. It said that Johnson, since his return to UN headquarters, had been holding further conversations with Arab and Israeli representatives. He had informed the commission that Arab and Israeli high officials "had expressed the view that it might be possible to take practical steps with regard to the refugee problem without prejudice to the positions of the governments on other aspects of the 'Palestine question.'" At the same time the report stated that "it clearly would not be possible at this stage to develop an acceptable set of detailed proposals," though the commission hoped, in the light of Johnson's report, to be able to make suggestions in the near future on "methods of procedure" that might lead to progress on the problem.

Regarding its other activities, the commission reported that its secretariat had prepared two working papers representing a "Historical survey of efforts of the PCC to secure the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 (11)." (The papers, bearing the sub-titles "The Question of Reintegration by Repatriation or Resettlement" and "The Question of Compensation," were dated Oct 2 and published as UN documents A/AC. 25/W. 81/Rev. 2 and A/AC. 25/W. 82/Rev. 1, respectively.) With respect to the identification and valuation programme of abandoned Arab properties in Israel, the report noted that the work of identification, involving approximately 450,000 separate parcels of land, was virtually completed, and that work was proceeding on the valuation of the individual properties. Lastly, the report gave details of the progress of release of Arab refugee bank accounts and deposits blocked in Israel (see p 240 a). (UN document A/4921, Oct 13)

Johnson's Report. Johnson's report was published by the PCC on Nov 24 (a few days before the start of the debate on the refugee question at the 16th UN session) as an addendum to its own Progress Report. After a survey of the origins of the refugee problem and the history of UN efforts to deal with it, Johnson noted in his "findings and conclusions" that there were many indications that no progress could be made on the refugee question apart from, or in advance of, an overall settlement. Nevertheless he thought that a continuation of the PCC's efforts was worth while in view of the fact that "both sides expressed a willingness—though with much reservation and scepticism—to consider a step-by-step process that might lead to progress on the refugee issue without prejudice to the positions of the respective governments on the other related issues." He suggested, therefore, that the PCC should appoint an individual to serve as its special representative for another year. That individual, Johnson added, should "understand from the start that odds will not be in his favour," but, to state the matter in the most negative way, "the signs that no progress is possible are not so conclusive as to justify a decision not to try."

Johnson also concluded that it would be unwise to plan UN policies "on any other assumption than that there will be Palestine refugees for at least a decade," and that there will be continuing need for generous UN assistance for them. His last conclusion was that an implementation of the letter alone of paragraph 11 of resolution 194 would be "meaningless" without the implementation of its "spirit." This would require accelerated economic growth for the area as a whole during the 'sixties, and "it would be only elementary justice that refugees have a chance to share in it." (UN document A/4921/Add. 1, Nov 24)

Changes Introduced in Published Version of Johnson's Report. The report included a footnote which said that he had transmitted advance copies of the report to the Arab and Israeli representatives, and that while he had not invited comment, he had informed them that he would be available for inquiries. Following "some suggestions" from Arab representatives, he said, he had decided "upon reflection" to make certain changes which were incorporated in the published version. He emphasized that "these are my own changes" and that, furthermore, there had not been any essential modification of the findings and conclusions. (UN document A/4921/Add. 1, Nov 24)

However, the 13 changes introduced in the original version of the report included, i.e., deletions of such statements as that the Arabs had rejected the Partition plan whereas the Jews had accepted it; that the Arab armies had invaded Israel in 1948; and that Israel had accepted and the Arabs rejected the Hammarskjöld proposals of 1959 regarding the refugee problem.

The Israel Foreign Ministry was said to have sent two letters to Johnson expressing its displeasure with the changes made in the report. At the same time, Israeli "diplomatic observers" were reported to feel that, despite the changes, the "general spirit" of the document might constitute a basis for further discussions. (Ha'aretz, Hayat, Nov 28; Jer. Post, Nov 29)

ANNUAL REPORT OF UNRWA DIRECTOR

The annual report of the Director of the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA), Dr

John Davis, for the period July 1, 1960—June 30, 1961, was published in Sept. (UN document A/4861)

Obstacles to Rehabilitation; Solution Does Not Rest with Arab Governments. Recapitulating the main themes of the previous year's report (MER 1960, pp 211-2), Davis wrote "that the rehabilitation of the refugees has proved to be a much more difficult and a much longer-term task than was at first envisaged." This, he added, was partly due to the fact that projects for the purpose of direct resettlement were in principle "unacceptable to the refugees... to the Arab people generally, and therefore to the Arab Governments"; and, in a large measure, it was also due to the economic and social limitations of absorbing the refugee population in "countries which themselves possessed limited natural resources." Thus there was "little mystery as to why these unfortunate people have continued to remain as refugees," and "it seems clearly unrealistic to assume that the major responsibility for solving the refugee problem should now rest with the host governments." Since, however, an "equitable solution" to the problem was not in prospect for the immediate future, Davis suggested that "for some time to come, there may well be no practical alternative" to continuing relief and educational services. (Report, pp 1, 2, 4)

Progress on Three-Year Programme. The report noted that UNRWA's three-year programme (July 1, 1960 to June 30, 1963) was moving ahead nearly on schedule. Under the programme, first presented to the 15th UN session, UNRWA intended to hold relief services at about the per capita level of 1960 while at the same time expanding vocational training to be able to turn out 2,000 graduates per year (as compared with 300 in 1960), increasing the annual number of university scholarships from 90 to 180, and improving the Agency's elementary and secondary education programme. During the period under review vocational and teacher training centres were completed at Wadi as-Sir and Ramallah, both in Jordan, while those at Siblun (Lebanon) and Damascus were nearing completion. (Report, pp 2, 11)

UNRWA's estimate of expenditure for the calendar year 1962 was $39.2 million, of which $28.2 million was to be allocated for basic relief services, $8.5 million for general education, $2.3 million for vocational and university education, and $166,000 for self-support projects (Report, p 27). (For statistics on UNRWA activities, see: Refugees' Status and Situation, below.)

Israel Criticizes, Arabs Praise Report. An Israel UN delegation spokesman stated that the UNRWA director's report was a political document far overstepping the jurisdiction of the Agency. He recalled the 1959 report on the refugee question by SG Dag Hammarskjöld which had stressed the prospect of "final absorption of the refugees through economic growth in the region," (MER 1960, p 210) and noted that Davis had made no mention of the report. (Jer. Post, Oct 5)

On the other hand Arab representatives, in their speeches during the UN refugee debate, commented approvingly on the views expressed in the UNRWA report and paid tribute to Dr Davis (see below).

Other Statements by Davis on Refugee Question. Speaking in Geneva on Jan 18 at a conference marking the conclusion of the World Refugee Year, Davis attacked as a "misconception" the idea that the Arab refugee problem could have been solved but for the "conniving of unprincipled Arab politicians." The Arab governments' attitude was based on a refusal to accept Israel as a "permanent component" of the ME. Their treatment of the refugees however was "sympathetic and generous." (NYT, Jan 19)

In a speech at the Middle East Institute in Washington on April 8, Davis declared that a solution of the refugee problem must be allowed to evolve from the region itself, and not be imposed from outside. Observers outside the ME tended to treat "altogether too lightly" the Arab people's refusal "to accept the permanence of Israel as now constituted" as well as the determination on the Israeli side to preserve Israel against any odds at all costs. (Mid. Mirror, April 15)

ISRAEL RESOLVES REFUGEES NOT TO RETURN

(October-November)

Ben-Gurion: "Free Choice for Refugees Designed to Destroy Israel." Replying in the Knesset to a motion by the Herut party requesting a debate on the Arab refugee question, FM David Ben-Gurion declared on Oct 11 that "Israel categorically rejects the insidious proposal of freedom of choice for the refugees, for she is convinced that this proposal is designed and calculated only to destroy Israel." Comparing the Arab refugees' lot with Israel's treatment of the Jews who had left the Arab countries, he said that the persistence of the Arab refugee problem was the result of the "violation of the UN Charter by the Arab rulers and their callous treatment of their own people," whereas Israel had not waited for the Arab rulers to return the property of the Jewish refugees and had immediately taken measures to absorb them. He concluded that if the Arab rulers would enter into direct talks with Israel for a peace settlement, Israel would give all possible assistance to the settlement of the refugees among their own people. (For source, see below.)

Party Attitudes; Mapam for Conditional Partial Return. When the debate was resumed on Nov 6, spokesmen of most parties—including Herut, Liberals, NRP, Achdut Ha'avoda and Agudat Israel—associated themselves with the government's line against the admission of the Arab refugees to Israel. The Mapam spokesman, while rejecting the idea of "freedom of choice" and declaring that the great majority of the refugees must be settled in the Arab countries, called upon the government to state its readiness to admit "an agreed number" of refugees should the Arab states consent to negotiate with Israel on a peace treaty. The Communist party spokesmen demanded that all the refugees who wished to return should be allowed to do so. (For source, see below.)

1949 Proposals for Return of 100 Thousand Withdrawn. Winding up the debate, FM Golda Meir stated that Israel was willing, even in the absence of an overall peace settlement, to negotiate with the Arabs on a solution of the refugee problem by their settlement in the Arab countries and on the question of mutual compensation. Israel's offer in 1949 to take back up to 100,000 refugees, she noted, had been ignored at the time and "it no longer stood." She pointed out, however, that Israel's position had never been that "not a single refugee" be returned. (For source, see below.)

Knesset Resolves Arab Refugees Should Not Be Returned to Israel. On Mapai's motion, the Knesset on Nov 6 adopted a resolution endorsing the statements of the

PM and FM and stating that "the Knesset resolves that the Arab refugees should not be returned to Israel territory, and that the sole solution to their problem is their settlement in the Arab countries." The vote was 68 to 7, with only Mapam and the Communists voting against. A Mapam resolution re-stating the views expressed by its spokesman during the debate was defeated by 60 votes to 7; some Liberals and NRP members abstained. Also defeated was a Communist party resolution, having obtained only two Communist votes. (Divrei Hakeset, Oct 9-11, pp 86-9, Nov 6-8, pp 257-80; Jer. Post, Nov 7)

Arab Comment: No Peaceful Return. Commenting on the Knesset resolution, the Cairo daily Al-Gumhuriyah wrote: "We will return not on Israel's decision but as a result of Israel's non-existence. We will return on the ruins of the Knesset... We do not consent to return to Palestine in order to become citizens of Israel." The Jordanian Falastin said that the Knesset decision proved once again that Palestine could be regained only by war; "every day that passes with Palestine in the hands of the Jews increases their strength and bolsters their position." The Lebanese Al-Hayat said that the new element in the Knesset decision was the proof it afforded that the defiance of UN resolutions regarding the refugees was not confined to Israel's ruling circles, but extended to the legislature as a whole. (Gumhuriyah, Falastin, Nov 8; Hayat, Nov 9)

"Times" Comment. The London Times commented that "Israel's policy of toughness, whether with rockets or refugees, brings no nearer the break in the ME deadlock which she needs more than anyone else." (Times, Nov 10)

16TH UN ASSEMBLY

(December)

Synopsis. Although the item inscribed on the agenda of the 16th UN session (as in the case of previous UN sessions) merely referred to the "Report of the Director of UNRWA," the debate actually again spilled over to encompass almost each and every aspect of the Arab-Israel conflict. This time new elements were injected by the appearance of the Johnson report and by the presentation of a draft resolution calling for a negotiated settlement of all Arab-Israeli issues.

The debate was held in the General Assembly's Special Political Committee between Dec 4 and 19, followed by a vote in the plenary on Dec 20. At its conclusion, both the Israeli-backed draft resolution on negotiations and the Arab-backed amendments regarding the "reconstitution" of the PCC and the safeguarding of the refugees' "property rights" were defeated, and a resolution proposed by the US was adopted without change. This resolution provided the basis for the continuation of Dr Johnson's mission through 1962 by requesting the PCC "to intensify its efforts for the implementation of paragraph 11 of resolution 194 (III)."

Arab Plans and Preparations prior to the Debate. The Arab League Secretariat was reported to have circulated a memorandum among its member-states in which it recommended that the Arab representatives should stress UN responsibility for the "Palestine tragedy" and its moral duty to continue international assistance for the refugees. The representatives were further directed to oppose any attempt to transfer UNRWA's responsibilities to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and act for the extension of UNRWA's mandate. (Akhir Sa'ah, Aug 16, Nov 8)

The Arab delegations at the UN formed a committee, headed by Akram Zu'aytar of Jordan, to coordinate Arab preparations for the debate. Referring to the planned Arab line of action, Zu'aytar declared to Al-Hayat that, while the item on the UN agenda would permit the discussion of the UNRWA and Johnson reports only, "it is our task to transform it into an issue of a robbed homeland... and to defeat any attempt to liquidate that issue under cover of solving the refugee problem." (Hayat, Oct 18, 26)

Some Arab circles voiced the criticism that the Arab delegations, although numerous and comprising many members, betrayed a lack of coordination and drive in the face of "the Zionist campaign" among non-committed delegations. This was attributed in part to the recent disputes among Arab governments, particularly following Syria's secession from the UAR. (Hayat, Oct 26, 27)

Arabs Request Hearing for "The Palestine Arab Delegation." In a letter dated Oct 9 the representatives of ten Arab member-states in the UN asked the chairman of the Special Political Committee that "the Palestine Arab Delegation" be heard by the committee during the discussion of the refugee question. The delegation was to be composed of Emile Ghuri, Izzat Tannus, Isa Nakhlah, Umar Azzini, Yusuf Ghanam, Ishaq Abd as-Salam al-Husseini and Musa Abu as-Sa'ud (A/SPC/58, Nov 23). The Arab Higher Committee bureau in Beirut described this delegation as "the official delegation of the Palestine Arabs" and termed Emile Ghuri its "chief." (Hayat, Oct 20)

Later, another delegation arrived from the Gaza Strip. It was composed of Munir ar-Rayis (Mayor of Gaza), Ibrahim Abu Sittah (Mayor of Khan Yunis) and Dr Mustafa Abd as-Shafi. After a number of meetings between them, the two delegations agreed to merge into a single delegation. Accordingly, on Nov 2 the Arab representatives notified the committee chairman of the addition of the three persons from the Gaza Strip to "the Palestine Arab Delegation." (A/SPC/58/Add. 1, Nov 23; Akhir Sa'ah, Nov 1; Hayat, Nov 7)

Committee Grants Hearing to "the Spokesman of the Group." The discussion of the UNRWA report began in the Special Political Committee on Dec 4. Following a brief address by Dr Davis in which he repeated the main conclusions of his report, the committee chairman stated that, unless objections were raised, he proposed "at the appropriate stage, in accordance with past practice, to invite the spokesman of the group in question" to make a statement.

There was no objection, except that the Israel representative hoped that the spokesman would limit himself to the item on the agenda, while the Saudi Arabian representative remarked that it would be "inhuman" to limit the spokesman's freedom of expression. (A/SPC/SR. 306, Dec 4)

According to Ha'aretz, the Israel delegation did not object to the chairman's decision because it meant, in effect, that the "refugee spokesmen" were granted the hearing as "individuals," and not in any representative capacity. It was also reported that the Arab delegations had intended to force a show-down over the issue, but gave up when it became clear that they could not muster a majority for their viewpoint. (Ha'aretz, Dec 5)

In the course of the debate, the committee heard statements by Ghūri, Tannūs and ar-Rayyā. (A/SPC/SR. 311, 318, 321, Dec 7, 15, 18)

The US Draft Resolution. On Dec 11 the US delegation introduced a draft resolution which repeated the three preambular paragraphs of resolution 1604 (XV) (see p 242) with the following technical changes: In the first para it added resolution 1604 (XV) to the resolutions recalled and in the second para it noted the latest report of the Director of UNRWA, covering the period July 1, 1960 to June 30, 1961. Operative para 1 read:

[The General Assembly] 1. Takes note of the efforts of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine pursuant to the request contained in General Assembly resolution 1456 (XIV) and 1604 (XV), to secure the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 (III); and

(a) requests the Commission to intensify its efforts for the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 (III) and urges the Arab host governments and Israel to cooperate with the Commission in this regard;

(b) further requests the Commission to intensify its work on the identification and evaluation of Arab refugees' immovable properties in Palestine as of 15 May 1948, and to make every effort to complete this work by 1 Sept 1962;

(c) requests the Secretary-General to make available to the Commission such additional staff and administrative facilities as may be required.

Operative para 2 urged governments to contribute or increase their contributions to UNRWA and para 3 expressed thanks to the Director and staff of the Agency, repeating the text of operative para 3 and 4 respectively of resolution 1604 (XV). (A/SPC/L. 79, Dec 11, and Rev. 1, Dec 18)

Three Muslim States Introduce Amendments on Reconstitution of PCC and Protection of Refugee Property. On Dec 14 Afghanistan, Pakistan, Indonesia and Ghana introduced amendments to the US draft resolution which were in line with some of the demands voiced by the Arab delegates in the course of the debate.

The following were added as para 3 and 4 of the operative part, and the last operative paragraph was to be renumbered. "3. decides that the Conciliation Commission shall be composed of five members and requests the President of the General Assembly to present, before the end of the present session for the approval of the General Assembly, a proposal concerning the new composition of the Commission;

4. requests the reconstituted Conciliation Commission to take measures for the protection of the rights, property and interests of the Palestine Arab refugees." (A/SPC/L. 81, Dec 14; A/SPC/SR. 322, Dec 18)

On Dec 15, however, Ghana's name was deleted from the list of sponsors, and the Ghanaian representative explained that his country's name had been inserted into the list "by misunderstanding." (A/SPC/L. 81/Corr. 1, Dec 15)

According to Arab sources the Arab delegations had considered the advisability of introducing a separate draft resolution calling explicitly for the appointment of an "international custodian" over refugee property in Israel—a demand repeatedly voiced by Arab speakers in the 15th Assembly (MER 1960, p 212-3) as well as during the present debate—but eventually decided against its introduction. Most of the Arab delegates judged that the chances of obtaining the required majority would improve if they contented themselves with amendments to the US draft only vaguely referring to the issue of refugee property. It was then that the Muslim delegations were "entrusted" with the task of sponsoring the amendments. Another factor was an alleged US promise to oppose the draft resolution on Arab-Israel negotiations in return for an Arab undertaking not to press the custodian issue. (Hayet, Dec 14, 19)

Sixteen-State Draft Resolution Calls for Direct Arab-Israel Negotiations to Settle Dispute. Simultaneously with the introduction of the US draft, another draft resolution, calling for direct negotiations between the Arab states and Israel, was presented by 15 countries in the Special Political Committee: The Central African Republic, Chile, Congo (B), Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Ivory Coast, Liberia, Malagasy Republic, Netherlands, Sierra Leone, Togo, Upper Volta and Uruguay. On Dec 18 Gabon and Niger joined the list of sponsors, and the following day Togo withdrew its sponsorship, with the result that the final draft was endorsed by 16 countries. Togo withdrew—its representative told the committee—"because 'the discussion had shown that the aim of reconciliation pursued by the sponsors... was in danger of being jeopardized.'" The draft resolution, after taking note of the Annual Report of the UNRWA Director, read:

"Recognizing that the establishment of peaceful relations between the Arab states and Israel would do much to facilitate a solution of the problem of the Arab refugees;

Recalling that, under the Charter, it is the fundamental duty of all States Members of the United Nations to endeavour to settle all international disputes by peaceful means;

Considering the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, and in particular General Assembly resolution 194 (III), calling upon Israel and the Arab States to settle the questions in dispute between them as soon as possible and by common agreement, so that peaceful relations may be established between them;

Considering that such peaceful relations would promote the well-being of all the peoples concerned and would make an important contribution to peace and security in the Middle East and in the whole world;

Renews its appeal to the Governments concerned to undertake direct negotiations—with the assistance of the Conciliation Commissions for Palestine, if they so desire—with a view to finding a solution acceptable to all the parties concerned, for all the questions in dispute between them."

The revised, final draft provided for the addition at the end of this paragraph of the words "particularly the question of the Arab refugees." (A/SPC/L. 80, Dec 11, Rev. 1, Dec 14, Corr. 1, Dec 19; A/SPC/SR. 324, Dec 19)

This revision was made, as the representative of Guatemala, one of the sponsors, stated in the committee, "to relate the resolution more explicitly to the item" on the agenda. (A/SPC/SR. 323, Dec 19)

According to Israeli sources, the idea of presenting a draft resolution on direct negotiations was first embraced by 12 African countries in Oct. Subsequently a few African countries dropped out and some Latin-American countries and the Netherlands joined as sponsors. Israel was reported to have been actively canvassing support for the resolution. (Ha'aretz, Oct 17, Dec 5, 15; Jer. Post, Dec 15)

Arab sources reported that the delegations of Mauritania and Tunisia were particularly active in attempts to dissuade African countries from supporting "the Israel cause." Mauritania was instrumental in arranging a meeting between the "Palestine Arab delegation" and the UAM representatives with the aim of persuading the latter to withdraw their sponsorship of the resolution on direct negotiations. A similar meeting took place between the "Palestine Arab delegation" and 16 Latin-American representatives under the auspices of the Libyan delegation. (Hayat, Dec 9, 14)

Course of Debate: Arab Stand. [With varying degrees of emphasis all Arab representatives engaged in an all-out attack on Israel, denying her very right to exist; criticized the PCC and the Johnson mission, while praising Davis' report; called for the unconditional repatriation of the refugees; demanded the appointment of an international custodian to supervise refugee property in Israel and collect the revenues from that property for the account of the refugees; and voiced strong opposition to the negotiations proposal.]

Ahmad Shukairy, the representative of Saudi Arabia, described Zionism as "nastier than Fascism, uglier than Nazism, more hateful than imperialism, more dangerous than colonialism." He said that unless the UN "met its responsibility" to protect the Israel Arabs, "there would soon be 250,000 more refugees." He accused the PCC of "deliberate inactivity" with regard to the implementation of para 11 of resolution 194 and, while not questioning Johnson's goodwill, he thought that his appointment had been unnecessary and that his report betrayed a tendency "to reduce the refugee problem to nothingness." The PCC, Shukairy stated, should be, if not abolished, at least reconstituted to assure "equitable geographical and ideological representation." Finally, he rejected the call for direct negotiations with Israel as "futile and sterile," and urged the delegations sponsoring it to seek fresh instructions from their governments. (A/SPC/SR. 307, 308, 310, 323, Dec 5, 6, 19)

Adib Da'udi, the representative of Syria, while paying tribute to Davis for "the remarkable work" done by UNRWA, stated that the PCC was continuing to follow a policy of "evading all responsibility." He regretted that the Commission's report put so much stress on the question of compensation for refugee property—a question which, in his view, was "purely secondary" to the question of repatriation. He thought that the Commission had put Johnson "on the wrong road": he should have been instructed to proceed directly to negotiations with Israel on implementing the repatriation of the refugees instead of dealing with such questions as the development of the ME. Johnson himself was to blame because he had not pinpointed in his report Israel's responsibility for the failure to carry out the provisions of para 11. (A/SPC/SR. 312, Dec 8)

Akram Zu'aytar, the Jordan representative, stated that, before offering the refugees a choice between repatriation and compensation, the UN should adopt a resolution calling on Israel to evacuate the areas it was controlling in excess of the territory allocated to it under the 1947 Partition resolution. As half of the refugees came from these areas, their return there would by itself solve half of the refugee problem. He further suggested that Davis might be a "good choice" for the role of custodian of refugee property in Israel. (A/SPC/SR. 312, Dec 8)

Adnan Pachachi, Iraq's representative, rejected the call for negotiations with Israel because "the Arab States were not entitled to negotiate on the refugees' rights": the dispute was not one between Israel and the Arab states, but between Israel and the refugees. (A/SPC/SR. 324, Dec 19)

Hasan Sabri al-Khuli, the representative of the UAR, stated that the African countries which had sponsored the draft resolution on Arab-Israel negotiations had erred in their judgment of Israel's motives. Nevertheless, he declared, "the Arab countries would spare no effort to maintain their ties of friendship with the African States in question." (A/SPC/SR. 322, Dec 18)

Other Arab delegates who participated in the debate were those from Libya (A/SPC/SR. 313, Dec 11), Lebanon (A/SPC/SR. 316, Dec 13), Yemen (A/SPC/SR. 319, Dec 15), Sudan (A/SPC/SR. 321, Dec 18), Tunisia (A/SPC/SR. 314, Dec 11) and Morocco. (A/SPC/SR. 319, Dec 15)

Israel's Stand. Golda Meir, Israel's Foreign Minister, declared that her delegation supported the draft resolution on negotiations, which was "the only way towards progress." While the Israel government had always believed that the solution of the refugee problem lay in the refugees' resettlement in the Arab countries, she noted, "it had never said that not a single refugee would ever in any circumstances be allowed to return to Israel." With regard to compensation, Mrs Meir said that any settlement of this issue would have to take into account Jewish abandoned properties in the Arab countries and in the Arab-controlled parts of Palestine. She thought that the proposed changes in the composition of the PCC would serve no useful purpose. She commended UNRWA's humanitarian work but contended that Davis' report "had trespassed on highly controversial ground" when it referred to para 11. Mrs Meir stated that Israel had some reservations regarding the Johnson report but did not elaborate. (A/SPC/SR. 318, Dec 15)

Another Israeli representative, Michael Comay, expressed the view that the US and the 16-nation draft resolutions were not inconsistent but rather supplementary. Israel, however, had reservations regarding those parts of the US draft which stressed para 11 in disregard of the other functions of the PCC. (A/SPC/SR. 323, Dec 19)

US Stand. Francis Plimpton, the US representative, declared that his country "firmly supported" the provisions of para 11 and had given "unqualified support" for the Johnson mission. The US would oppose "any proposals or action that might prejudice the results of that initiative." (A/SPC/SR. 311, 323, Dec 7, 19)

Attitudes of Other Countries. The UK, Italy, Norway, Greece and Iran reiterated in general the arguments advanced by the US, particularly with regard to the need of upholding Johnson's efforts. Objection to the Arab criticism of the PCC was taken by the two other members of the commission, Turkey and France. The French representative pointed out that while much had been said about Israel's intransigence, "those who uttered that reproach had nothing but intransigent proposals." At the same time [in an obvious allusion to the 16-nation draft resolution], he stated that France could not support any draft "which, however well-intended, was likely to give rise to political reactions which would cause it to remain a dead letter."

The representatives of the USSR, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Mauritania, Mali, Guinea, Ghana, Ethiopia, Ceylon and Cambodia made statements which, with varying degrees of emphasis, favoured the three-nation amendments and opposed the negotiations resolution. Zenon Rossides, the representative of Cyprus, also expressed himself against the negotiations resolution; with regard to repatriation he advocated, as "a first step," the return of a limited number of refugees, in line with the suggestions made by Ireland and New Zealand at previous debates on the refugee question. (See MER 1960, p. 213.)

The representatives of Nigeria, China and India underlined the need to grant the refugees a choice between repatriation and compensation. The Indian delegate mentioned his own country's experience with resettling nine million refugees from Pakistan, and went on to argue that the Arab refugee problem, too, could have been solved "by purely economic methods" were it not for the Arab refugees' strong desire to return to their former homes.

Mexico and Peru expressed reservations with regard to both the three-nation amendments and the negotiations proposal. The Mexican delegate said that the sponsors of that proposal "were proposing the best of all solutions," but he added that he could not support it because of Arab opposition.

Statements favouring the negotiations proposal and opposing the three-nation amendments were made by several of the sponsors of the 16-nation draft, as well as by Denmark and Congo (L). The delegations of Australia and New Zealand expressed similar views by stating that, in dealing with para 11, it should not be overlooked that this resolution also included paragraphs 5 and 6 on negotiations and the settlement of all outstanding disputes. [The New Zealand delegation did not reiterate this time the proposal it had made during the 15th UN session regarding a "pilot" repatriation scheme (MER 1960, p. 213), but urged Israel to demonstrate its good intentions by making provision for compensation and for the return of "a number" of refugees "subject to the normal requirements of national law."] (A/SPC/SR. 310-324, Dec 6-19)

Most active among the sponsors in defending the negotiations resolution against vehement Arab attacks were Arsène Assouan Usher, the representative of the Ivory Coast and Frédéric Guirma of Upper Volta. At one point there was an uproar when the Saudi Arabian representative, Shukairy, used the French word vendu (sold) when speaking of the 16-nation draft. The Ivory Coast representative, for his part, touched off a furor when he commented reportedly that Shukairy "may be used to buying Negroes, but he cannot buy us." (Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, Dec 15)

Vote in Committee. On Dec 18 the representative of Senegal proposed the adjournment of the debate to the resumed UN session in 1962. The proposal was rejected, with only Senegal voting for it. (A/SPC/SR. 322, Dec 18)

The next day the committee proceeded to vote, taking up first the three-nation amendments to the US draft resolution.

The first of the amendments (on the reconstitution of the PCC) was passed by 47 votes to 27, with 24 abstentions. It was supported by the Arab, Muslim and Soviet Bloc countries and by Cuba, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Brazil, Cyprus, Spain, Cambodia, Ceylon, China, India, Japan, Cameroun, Dahomey, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, Ivory Coast, Nigeria and Senegal.

The second amendment (calling for the protection of refugee property) was adopted by 42 votes to 36, with 20 abstentions. [Some delegations which supported the previous amendment abstained, notably those of Brazil, China, Cyprus, Ivory Coast, Japan and Nigeria. The only case of a switch in the opposite direction was Iran, which abstained on the first amendment but supported the second. Furthermore, Bolivia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Haiti, Uruguay, Canada, New Zealand and Congo (L), which had abstained on the reconstitution of the PCC, voted against the property paragraph.] (For sources, see below.)

Amended US Resolution Adopted, Negotiations Resolution Rejected. The US draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 74 votes to 1 (Israel), with 23 abstentions. The US and UK representatives declared immediately after the vote that although they had voted for the amended resolution, they opposed the amendments and hoped they would be rejected by the plenary.

The draft resolution on Arab-Israel negotiations was rejected: it obtained 34 affirmative as against 44 negative votes, with 20 abstentions. The affirmative votes were cast by the sponsors, Israel, most West-European and "White Commonwealth" countries (Austria, France, Greece, Ireland, Norway and Sweden abstained); the US, the UK, Italy, Turkey, Cyprus and Spain voted against, as well as the majority of Latin-American and UAM countries (Argentina, Bolivia, Colombia, Mexico, Peru, Venezuela, Congo (L), Senegal and Togo abstained). (A/SPC/SR. 324, Dec 19; A/5068, Dec 19)

Israel sources reported that the US considered the negotiations proposal impractical and therefore unsound. It was thought that the negative attitude of the US had influenced a number of other countries. Criticism of the American stand was reported to have been voiced in the Israel cabinet.

France's "neutral" stand was termed in Israel "disappointing," but the explanation was advanced that, as a member of the PCC, France could not support a resolution which was claimed by the US to be prejudicing the Commission's efforts to solve the refugee problem.

Satisfaction however, was expressed in Israel that a considerable number of states—even though a minority—had for the first time backed an approach to the problem which Israel had been advocating all along. (Ha'aretz, Oct 17, Dec 5, 15; Jer. Post, Dec 15, 20)

Plenary Rejects Amendments. On Dec 20 the GA plenary held separate votes on the amended US draft resolution. The results of the vote were, in respect of the first amendment (reconstitution of PCC), 44 in favour, 29 against, and 25 abstentions, and in respect of the second amendment (property protection) 40 in favour, 37 against, and 21 abstentions. The two amendments were thus rejected, having failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority.

[The reduction in the number of affirmative votes as compared with the committee vote was accounted for by the switch to abstention by Cambodia, Cameroun and Dahomey on the first amendment, and by the latter two only on the second. Australia and New Zealand, who abstained on the first amendment in the committee, voted against it in the plenary.]

Operative para 1 of the US draft (calling, i.e., for the intensification of the PCC's efforts for the implementation of para 11) was adopted by 64 votes to 14, with 21 abstentions. The Arab countries voted against it, while Israel and the Soviet Bloc countries abstained.

Finally, the US draft resolution, without the three-nation amendments, was approved by 62 votes to none, with 37 abstentions. The Arabs and most of the delegations which supported them in the previous votes abstained, whereas Israel voted affirmatively. (A/PV. 1086, Dec 20)

Comments on Debate. Arab delegation circles in New York were reported to have summed up the results of the debate as "neither a failure, nor a gain" from the Arab viewpoint (Hayat, Dec 27). Press comments in Jordan and Lebanon, however, said that the outcome was a "defeat" which they attributed to the Arab governments' lack of preparation and lack of ability to gain friends in the world. (Hayat, Dec 21; Falastin, Dec 22) Israeli diplomatic quarters were said to have described what happened at the debate as a "psychological reverse" for the Arabs. They pointed out that the vote on "property rights" had been less favourable to the Arabs than in the previous session, and that this had been the first time that several countries had come out openly in support of Israel's position on direct negotiations and had taken a firm stand against Arab attacks. There was strong resentment at the US's "active opposition" to the negotiations proposal. (Ha'aretz, Jer. Post, Dec 22)

THE REFUGEES' STATUS AND CONDITIONS

Statistics of Refugees and UNRWA Activities. In June 1961, 1,151,024 people were registered as refugees with UNRWA, as compared with 1,120,889 in June 1960. The UNRWA report noted, however, that those figures "are based on the Agency's registration records which do not necessarily reflect the actual refugee population owing to factors such as the high rate of unreported deaths and undetected false registration." (Director of UNRWA, Annual Report, July 1960-June 1961, UN, A/4861, p. 14; further referred to as Report.)

According to Arnold Hottinger, the ME correspondent of the Neue Zürcher Zeitung, the UNRWA lists contained the names of at least 100,000 deceased persons and the official number of refugees registered with UNRWA—as recorded above—exceeded "the actual figure by at least 150,000 but not more than 200,000." (Swiss Review of World Affairs, Nov)

Roy Lucas, UNRWA chief in Jordan, stated in Amman on Sept 6 that his agency estimated that the food ration list in Jordan contained some 90,000 deceased persons whose rations were still collected. (Jihad, Sept 7)

Of the registered refugees, 854,268 received full rations and services; 169,730 (mostly children in Jordan) received services, but not rations; and 177,566 received neither rations nor services. (Report, p. 14)

The distribution of registered refugees according to country of residence was given as follows: Jordan—630,725 (of whom 204,544 lived in UNRWA camps); Gaza Strip—261,125 (156,738 in camps); Lebanon—140,201 (61,541 in camps); Syria—118,973 (20,039 in camps). Of the total registered refugees, 38% lived in UNRWA camps. (Report, p. 16)

UNRWA, in collaboration with UNESCO, had direct responsibility for 390 schools with 128,501 refugee children, and also paid subsidies for most of the 59,157 refugee children who were educated in government or private schools. (Report, p. 20)

In the field of health care, UNRWA operated or subsidized 100 health centres and eight mobile clinics, and was directly responsible for the maintenance of six hospitals. (Report, p. 7)

In the four-year period 1957-61, UNRWA assisted financially in the emigration of 1,665 refugees, of whom 595 went to the US, 266 to Venezuela, 508 to Brazil, 86 to Colombia, 44 to Canada, and 166 to other countries. (Report, p. 26)

At the end of 1960 UNRWA had a personnel of 10,849, of whom 10,703 were locally recruited staff and 146 international staff. (Report, p. 26)

Evaluation of the Refugee Situation. In a review of the refugee situation, Arnold Hottinger, the ME correspondent of the Neue Zürcher Zeitung, wrote that to understand the particular situation of the Palestinian refugees in the Near East one must first abandon the idea that they constitute a uniformly miserable mass of people. To be sure the camps were still there, and even grew from year to year and they contained a great number of people who were "unemployed, embittered, impoverished, abounding in children, numb and resigned and yet fanatically clinging to the artificially nourished hope of an eventual return to Palestine," yet less than half of all the Palestine refugees were living in camps. "According to UNRWA data their number is 409,223 while 694,507 are living outside the camps."

However, neither those who were in the camps nor those refugees who lived outside the camps determined the general attitude and general policy of the refugees. These were determined by the more educated among them, and by those further removed from the camps and comfortably established throughout the Arab countries as economic elite and government advisers. Hottinger summarized their policy formula: "The refugees are to be left in their miserable condition as a sort of pawn for Arab rights in Palestine; it is not desirable that they adapt themselves to the economic life of their host countries, because that would mean the loss of the strongest lever by which the Arabs hope to move the world to once more put the Palestine question on the agenda."

The question of economic and political assimilation of the refugees in their host countries had two aspects; the attitude and desire of the refugees and the policies and practices of the host countries. Only Jordan had made an effort to assimilate the refugees politically by granting them Jordanian citizenship; Lebanon, Syria and Egypt had rejected such assimilation.

On the other hand, it should be remembered that a new generation of refugees had emerged: half of them consisted of children less than 15 years old, and they were willing to work in the host countries, all of which had made economic progress. The situation, of course, differed from country to country. The refugees in Syria seem to have made the best adaptation to the host country's standard of living, and the economic pattern came close to the experience of the refugees. The situation was less favourable in Lebanon because of the basic economic pattern of the country which was more commercial than agricultural. Although Jordan offered full political acceptance, the economic opportunities for the refugees were very limited; similarly the refugees had very few economic possibilities in the Gaza strip. Economic assimilation was very difficult, although the refugees would have wanted to become integrated.

In none of the host countries, however, had the number of refugees who had been able to make themselves independent kept pace with the growing birth rate. An increase of the refugee population of at least 2½-3% had to be expected. This increase also outstripped the effect of the considerable UNRWA efforts to provide vocational training.

Three basic conditions were required for a "gradual integration of the refugees within the life of the Near East": a more even distribution of the refugees over a larger area, vocational training of the young, a further improvement of the standard of living of the entire region. (Swiss Review of World Affairs, Nov; compare with Report of the Director of UNRWA, pp 233-4)

ISRAEL

Release of Blocked Refugees' Accounts. The PCC stated in its 19th Progress Report that under its 1952 agreement with the Israel government for the release of refugees' accounts blocked in the Israeli branches of Barclays and Ottoman Banks, £2,790,045 had been released by mid-1961. (Israel's Foreign Minister, Golda Meir, stated in the UN on Dec 15 that the total released amounted to £3,500,000.) The PCC further reported that, following Israel's decision to release refugees' accounts in all other banks operating in Israel, the Commission had now secured the concurrence of most Arab governments for this new release scheme. (UN document A/4921, Oct 13)

JORDAN

Jordan to Facilitate Refugees' Citizenship; UAR Objects. (Compare MER 1960, p 214.) According to a proposal submitted by the Passports Department of the Ministry of the Interior, the Jordan naturalization regulations would be amended to allow "Palestinians" residing in other countries to obtain Jordanian nationality and passports. The amended regulations would consider people of Palestinian origin who went abroad for the purpose of work or studies as "temporarily absent," and would cancel the provisions of Dec 20, 1949 and Feb 16, 1954 which required continuous residence in Jordan for a period of at least five years as a condition to obtaining Jordanian nationality [Official Gazette Feb 16, 1954 stated that four years were required.] (Jaridah, Beirut, Nov 26)

The Cairo Akhir Sa'ah attacked the tendency on the part of "certain Arab countries" to facilitate naturalization of refugees, saying that they "disregarded the holy duty" of keeping "the spirit of revenge" alive in the Palestinians' hearts. The granting of citizenship would kill the desire of the Palestinians to return to their homeland and thus help Israel "to liquidate" the Palestine cause. (Akhir Sa'ah, Dec 13)

Cabinet Decides against Refugee Census. In May the Jordan cabinet decided on a number of principles which would guide its dealings with UNRWA, subject to parliamentary approval. (This followed negotiations with UNRWA in 1960; see MER 1960, pp 214-5.) These included i.a.:

(1) No refugee census would be held in the Kingdom, "taking into consideration the fact that UNRWA has not asked for such a census." (2) The government and the agency should reconsider the scale of income in force [i.e., JD 15 per month, at which income level the refugee was no longer entitled to UNRWA rations]. A committee should be set up to consider the cases of withdrawal of ration-cards on the basis of a temporary income scale pending agreement on a permanent new scale. (3) The cancellation of the names of deceased refugees remaining on UNRWA rolls should be accepted. The resulting surplus rations should be given to refugee children who had not been receiving rations, in accordance with recommendations to be submitted by a joint committee. (4) The government should prohibit the sale of ration-cards. (Difa, May 16)

Suspension of Individual Self-Support Projects. In April Jordan's Ministry of Development announced that the programme of individual self-support projects for refugees [initiated by UNRWA in 1955] would remain suspended until agreement was reached between the government and UNRWA. It was understood that the government objected to the agency's procedure of verifying the eligibility of the family of the refugee applying for self-support aid, as well as to the agency's insistence on granting aid for agricultural projects only. (Palestin, April 6)

Government Schools Ordered to Exclude Refugee Children. In June the Jordanian Minister of Education issued an ordinance which forbade, "in view of the strong pressure on the Ministry's budget," the acceptance of any refugee pupil in government schools except on the Minister's written authorization. The ministry would also ascertain the number of refugee pupils already enrolled in government schools. (Palestin, June 28)

Musa Alami's Project in Trough. In May and June, Musa Alami, the director of the Arab Development Society, attempted to raise funds in Britain and the US in order to save the Society from financial collapse. Alami's scheme consisted of a vocational training centre for orphan refugee boys near Jericho; it was said to have been financially dependent on the profits from a nearby experimental farm extending over 800 acres and employing a large number of refugees. The fruit and vegetables of the farm had been sold to Aramco in Saudi Arabia. In Dec 1960, however, at a week's notice and under pressure from the Saudi Arabian government, Aramco cancelled its contract. This threatened the closing of both the farm and the vocational centre.

In a letter published in The Times, Dr Arnold Toynbee, Freya Stark and others appealed to the public to raise £100,000 which, they said, were necessary to tide the Society over the two years which it needed to develop new markets. There were also reports that the World Bank was considering Alami's request for a long-term loan. (Times, May 25; Difa, May 28; Economist, June 3; Manar, Aug 14)

LEBANON

Granting of Lebanese Nationality to Refugees Suspended. Abdallah Mashnuq, the Minister of the Interior, told Ash-Sharq News Agency that his Ministry had either rejected or "frozen" 400 applications by refugees to obtain Lebanese nationality; this was in addition to 1,200 similar applications already "frozen" on instructions from the President.

This indicated a retreat from the previous policy whereby refugee applicants who could prove that they were of Lebanese origin or had been Lebanese nationals in the past were eligible for Lebanese nationality, although "considerations of numerical balance between the communities" had always been taken into account in the issue of naturalization certificates to refugees. While the Minister refused to disclose the reason for the suspension order, the news agency correspondent believed that it was connected with the decisions and recommendation of the Arab Foreign and Defence Ministers' conference and other Arab League conferences, which had expressed concern at the refugees' eagerness to obtain the nationality of the countries where they were living, a phenomenon liable to lead, with the passage of time, to the disappearance of the "Palestine personality" (Jaridah, July 29). There was, however, also a general slowing down of granting of citizenship. (Compare p 377 b)

Government Plans Refugee Census. The Lebanese Minister of the Interior, Kamāl Junblāt, stated at a press conference on Nov 23 that Lebanon was "too much open" to Palestine refugees and that, according to authoritative estimates, some 40,000 refugees had clandestinely entered Lebanon from other countries. He added that his Ministry was planning to hold a census of refugees living outside the camps in order to identify refugee "infiltrators," who would thereupon be turned out of Lebanon. (Jaridah, Nov 24; Falastin, Nov 25)

Contribution to Refugees Curtailed. The Lebanese government's annual budgetary allocation for aid to Palestine refugees was reduced from £L270,000 to £L85,000. At the same time it was decided that this allocation should be placed at the disposal of the Administration of Refugee Affairs, whereas previously it had been included in the budget of the Ministry of Social Affairs. (Hayat, Oct 26)

Efforts for Better Treatment of Refugees. In Jan deputy Adnān al-Hakīm called on the government to accord the refugees civil rights similar to those enjoyed by Lebanese citizens. He said many refugees were now persecuted and some were expelled immediately on entering Lebanon. (Anwar, Jan 7)

On July 18 an Arab Higher Committee delegation headed by Emīl Ghūrī met Maj.-Gen. Adil Shehab, the commander of the Lebanese army, to ask for easing of the regulation limiting the refugees' freedom of movement. They complained that the refugees' chances of finding work were severely handicapped as they usually had to wait two to three days to obtain a permit for a single journey inside Lebanon. Shehab promised to see what could be done about this. (Sahafah, July 19)

Involvement of Refugees in Attempted NSP Coup and measures against them (see p 402 a).

SYRIA

Before Break-up of UAR: Proposals to Strengthen Links between Refugees in Syria and Gaza Strip. Dr Usāmah an-Najīb, the Secretary of the Palestinian National Union in the Syrian Region, announced that contacts were being made with leaders of the Gaza Strip with a view to forming a unified Higher Committee of the Palestinian National Union. He further stated that Col. Abd al-Hamid Sarraj had approved a recommendation to cancel the restrictions on the movement of refugees between the two Regions. (Mamar, July 21)

After Secession: Egyptian Reports of Persecution of Refugees in Syria. According to the Egyptian press, the refugees in Syria were suspected by the new regime of disloyalty and placed under constant watch; 75 of them were reported to have been expelled from Syria. Special arrangements were made to provide new jobs for them in Egypt and the Gaza Strip. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Oct 30, Nov 13; Musawwar, Dec 15; Ahram, Dec 28)

GAZA STRIP

UNRWA's Attitude towards Political Activity by Employees. Seventy-nine of UNRWA's local employees were reported to have been among those elected in Jan to the Palestinian National Union of the Gaza Strip.

In a press interview the UNRWA representative in Gaza, James Weldon, stated that while he sympathized with the social and cultural aims of the Palestinian National Union, he considered that UNRWA employees, just as other UN employees, should not engage in political activity. (Economist, Feb 25; Falastin, a Cairo monthly, June)

Views on the Refugee Situation. In Feb, in a statement to MENA, the Egyptian Governor of the Gaza Strip, Lt.-Gen. Ahmad Sālim, charged that since UNRWA supplied the Palestinian people foodstuffs not exceeding 1,500 calories per person daily, which was inadequate for any child over three years of age; and that despite the severe cold and dampness, the agency had allocated one blanket for every six persons, UNRWA must have had a plan "to exterminate the people of Palestine, and to liquidate the Palestine problem." (MENA, Feb 16 [20])

Lt.-Gen. Yūsuf al-Agrūdī [who replaced Ahmad Sālim as Governor of the Gaza strip] declared in Sept that the refugees' economic situation had improved materially as a result of the implementation of "the Amer Plan," aimed principally at increasing the Strip's agricultural potential through the reclamation of unproductive lands and increasing the water supply. (Quwwat al-Musallah, Egypt, Oct 1)

CARE inaugurated a $500,000 economic development aid project for the Strip, which would be linked with the UAR government's "Make Gaza Green" project. (Christian Science Monitor, June 7)

OTHER COUNTRIES

Iraq: New Dwellings for Refugees. The Ministry of Social Affairs decided to start a building project for Palestine refugees in Za'itaniyah.

The annual allocation for aid to Palestine refugees in the Iraqi budget amounted to ID200,000. (Zaman, Sept 28)

Saudi Arabia: Reported Liberalization of Naturalization Procedures. In Sept the Saudi Arabian Information Office announced that instructions had been issued to extend "considerable facilities" to Palestine refugees applying for Saudi Arabian citizenship. (Siyasah, Beirut, Sept 27)

Colombia: Palestinians Expelled. In Jan the Colombia government reportedly decided to expel from the country 20 Palestinians of Jordanian nationality. A Colombian official communiqué said, it was reported, that while the persons in question had been admitted to Colombia under the farmers' quota, they actually did not work in agriculture. (Hayat, Jan 26; Akhbar Sa'ah, Feb 22)

THE REPUBLIC OF CYPRUS

SYNOPSIS

INTERNAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

1961, the first full year of the Republic, was characterized by growing tension between the Greek and the Turkish communities. Major provisions in the Constitution—the 70:30 ratio in the civil service, the establishment in the five major towns of separate Greek and Turkish municipalities, the establishment of the army—were not implemented, in spite of the insistence of the Turkish community. The Turkish representatives in Parliament reacted by vetoing the taxation laws, with the consequence that President Makarios saw himself forced to order the collection of taxation without a lawful basis, and that income tax became a matter for the communal chambers.

There was complete separation between the communities—a kind of apartheid, in the words of President Makarios. Inside the Greek community opposition to President Makarios and his supporters crystallized; their opponents demanded a complete repudiation of the "sinful" Zurich agreements, "real self-determination" and Enosis.

In Feb Cyprus joined the British Commonwealth. Later during the year increasing emphasis was laid on a policy of non-alignment, favoured by the Greek and opposed by the Turkish community.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTER-COMMUNITY RELATIONS

[The strained relations between the Greek and Turkish communities were the main internal problem during Cyprus' first year of independence. (According to the 1956 census there were 417,986 Greek Orthodox as against 92,642 Muslims (Turks) and 19,251 others.) Below are some impressions and evaluations by foreign observers of the situation in general, followed by a record of specific issues.]

"No Nationhood Developing"—"Complete Separatism." Writing from Nicosia in March, a New York Times correspondent observed that seven months after Cyprus had achieved independence there were no real signs that "a sense of nationhood was developing." "Almost all of the leadership in each community is dedicated to a jealous defense of its rights against the other. Mutual suspicion is still the prevailing mood and in both communities the overriding aim is complete separatism wherever possible." (NYT, March 10)

The same point was made later by a correspondent of The Times: "Communal separation spreads to the smallest social matters. If you go to a Greek house you take a Greek taxi and are offered a Greek cigarette, and it is the same pattern with Turks. The two communities co-exist but do not mingle."

"Greeks will always be Greeks, and Turks will always be Turks." Archbishop Makarios told the correspondent, who observed that the people of Cyprus were lacking in the will to forge an exclusive loyalty and were investing "half their loyalties" abroad. In comparison, Lebanon, another ME country with a "divided heart," survived "largely because to be a Lebanese means something positive."

Writing on the first anniversary of the Republic, The Economist commented that the Cypriots did not feel moved to celebrate the event; unlike other new countries, the Republic was "unwanted by many of those who belong to it," and it had "not yet acquired enough of a responsibility to inspire them, whether Greek or Turk, with loyalty and enthusiasm." The detailed provisions of the Zurich agreements, The Economist observed, tended to separate rather than unite the two communities, as had been proved by the difficult negotiations on the question of the municipalities and the civil service. (For sources, see below.)

Cooperation Between Makarios and Küçük. All the three sources quoted above were united in the opinion that—in the words of The Economist—President Makarios and his Turkish Vice-President Küçük provided an "excellent example of cooperation," in this situation of deep divisions. (For sources, see below.)

No Wish to Break Up Settlement For Lack of Peaceful Alternative. With all the difficulties, The Economist felt, "at present most Cypriots do not want the settlement to break down, if only because no other peaceful alternative is at present apparent." They knew that they could not look for support in Athens or Ankara.

Similarly, The Times correspondent wrote that the Cypriot leaders knew that the world had been happy to get rid of the Cyprus problem, and that the Zurich and London agreements had worked, with all their imperfections. "They are hesitant about trying to change even a comma of them, for fear that this would open the floodgates and wash the whole complicated edifice away." (NYT, March 10; Times, Aug 25; Economist, Sept 12)

Following are the major issues in inter-community relations during the year.

Separation of Municipalities. [Article 173 of the Constitution provided for the establishment of separate sectors and municipalities for the Turkish inhabitants of the five largest towns (Nicosia, Famagusta, Limassol, Larnaca, Paphos). In 1960, after independence, no agreement could be reached on the demarcation lines (MER 1960, pp 227-8) and the problem continued to mar inter-community relations in 1961.]

At the beginning of the year it became clear that the joint committees set up in the five towns to work out the new arrangement had reached a deadlock. Thus, in Jan the Greek mayor of Larnaca expressed his opposition to partition "to avoid the trouble and complications that are bound to affect both communities." He argued that partition was not mandatory under the Constitution and that the President and Vice-President who, under the Constitution, would have to review the municipalities issue in four years time, had better do so immediately. On Jan 11 the Greek mayor of Famagusta said that the joint committee for municipal partition had reached a deadlock because of the "exorbitant demands" by Turkish members; no further meetings would take place. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 3, 12)

On Feb 9 the Cabinet began debating a bill to end the deadlock. The bill foresaw the operation of two municipal councils in each of the five towns; Greek and Turkish citizens and premises coming under the jurisdiction of a Greek municipality and a Turkish municipality respectively. At the same time the bill would extend the existing municipal arrangements for two months, as by Feb 16 the Municipal Corporations Law would expire. The bill was opposed by the Turkish members on the grounds that "contrary to the Constitution" the bill did not provide for separate regions for the Greek and Turkish municipalities. On Feb 17, however, the House unanimously passed the bill, essentially as proposed. (Cyprus Mail, Feb 10, 14, 18)

The existing municipality laws were repeatedly extended, each time for two months (e.g. Cyprus Mail, July 16), while further discussions on the delimitation of the municipal community boundaries proved inconclusive. (See e.g. Cyprus Mail, July 12.)

Inter-Communal Friction in Parliament. On Feb 3 President Makarios, in the name of the cabinet, asked the House of Representatives to take measures against two of its Turkish members, who, according to press reports, had made "insulting remarks" against Polycarpus Georgiadis (Yorgadjis), the Minister of the Interior. While recently visiting Turkey, these two MPs had attributed to the Minister "responsibility for recent murderous acts in Cyprus, alleging even that the said murders were committed on his orders." At a press conference the following day, the two Turkish MPs denied that they had made such a statement, and deplored the President's letter.

The Greek members of the House also issued a statement of protest. They noted, in addition to the charges made by the President, that a Turkish MP had reportedly said: "We are in the vanguard of duty as wardens and guardians of the border of the Turkish fatherland."

On Feb 6, when the House started to debate the issue, the Turkish members walked out in protest, having argued that the House had no right to debate the matter. The Greek members continued the debate, which concluded in a "declaration" condemning the alleged insulting statement which, not having been denied in the House, "poisons the smooth relations between the two communities and constitutes a provocation to the Greek Cypriot people." In the debate, a Greek member stated that the "boundaries of Cyprus are Greek, and Greek Cypriots are determined to fight to acquire true self-determination. The threat from Turkey cannot force us to put down the fighting flag... We hope that the day is not far when, free from constitutional or other restrictions, the Cypriot peoples can... decide their future."

On Feb 9 the Greek Communal Chamber passed a resolution expressing its "indignation at the unacceptable statement about the national future of Cyprus" allegedly made in Turkey by representatives of the Turkish community.

On the same day Vice-President Dr. Küçük condemned the "destructive speeches" made on the subject by Greek members of the House. He said that references to "true self-determination for Greek Cypriots" were contrary to the Constitution and had "rightly left us in anxiety." He said that the Turkish Cypriots would remain faithful to the Constitution but would make no concessions in regard to their rights.

On Feb 10, the Greek members of the House, in reply to Dr. Küçük, declared that their statements were only "in defence of the Greek Cypriot rights," and were not intended against Turkey or the Turkish community in Cyprus; they gave assurances that the Greek Cypriots stood for friendship with the Turkish community. On the same day, in an attempt to settle the issue, Archbishop Makarios stated: "The Government is devoted to the faithful implementation of the agreements on which the Republic is built." [The issue thus subsided.] (Cyprus Mail, Feb 4, 5, 7, 10, 11; Athens News Agency, Feb 11)

Issue of Tax Bills. A tax extension bill, which came before the House of Representatives on March 30, served as an opportunity for the Turkish members to register their dissatisfaction with the non-implementation of the separation of municipalities and the 30:70 ratio in the civil service, as well as with the cut in the army budget. The tax and customs laws of the Republic ceased to have effect from March 31. The government proposed to extend them for three months, and 25 Greek members of the House voted in favour; 11 of the 15 Turkish members, however, voted against. As according to the Constitution all fiscal matters required separate Greek and Turkish majorities, the Turkish vote in fact constituted a veto. Neither the Turkish leaders nor the Turkish press raised any objections to the bill itself, but they made it clear that the vote was meant to exert pressure for the implementation of the municipalities and 30:70 ratio clauses in the Constitution. Before the final vote, five Turkish members proposed an extension of two months on the understanding that these questions would meanwhile be satisfactorily settled, but the Greek members voted against. (Cyprus Mail, April 1)

In an official statement, Archbishop Makarios accused the Turks of abusing their rights under the Constitution and, disregarding the vote in the House, instructed the respective officials to continue to collect taxes and customs. He said: "The Constitution exists for the sake of the people, and I am rendering a high service to the Republic of Cyprus, whose salvation constitutes for me the supreme law."

The Turkish Vice-President of the House of Representatives, Dr. Müderrioğlu, dismissed the charges that the Turkish stand on the extension bill constituted blackmail; it was all done by the Greek side, he asserted. He said that the budget and the 30:70 ratio in the civil service were indeed connected: as the Turks were far from reaching their 30%, they consequently did not receive their proper due in government salaries (Cyprus Mail, April 2). The deputy Turkish community leader, Denktas, condemned the action of President Makarios as "illegal and opportunistic," and said all Turkish importers had been advised not to pay taxes and customs. It was initially reported that they complied (Cyprus Mail, April 4). The Greek Cypriot press condemned the Turkish position. An editorial in Eleftheria emphasized that the income tax bill incident proved that the Cyprus regime could not function, and called for the radical revision of the Zurich Agreements. (Eleftheria, April 6)

When the House met again, on April 11, no mention was made of the tax extension bill. On April 13, President Makarios told a press conference that tax collection was normal; there had been no instances of importers refusing to pay duties. He admitted that he had acted unconstitutionally in ordering tax collection, but said that otherwise it would have been impossible for the state to continue to function. He reiterated that the rights of the Turkish community under the Constitution would be fully implemented. (Cyprus Mail, April 12, 14)

The tax issue came up again in Dec. On Dec 18, ten of the Turkish members of the House voted against a new income tax bill, while four abstained. At issue was the period of validity of the law: the Turkish members demanded that it be reviewed by the House annually, and subsequently proposed a review every two years. This was rejected by the Greek members, both on the grounds that this was impractical and that it was intended to provide a means of "blackmailing the Greeks."

On Dec 20 President Makarios stated: "I shall disregard any constitutional provision which, if abused, may obstruct the regular functioning of the state." He said that the share of the Turkish community in income tax payments was only one-sixteenth of that of the Greek community; revenue from the tax in 1961 had been estimated at £3.8m., of which £2.4m. was from foreign companies and individuals, £1.32m. was from Greeks, and only £85,000 was from Turks. A special temporary tax would therefore be levied on the Greek community through the Greek Communal Chamber, and a special tax for foreigners would be introduced in the House. The President added that in spite of these measures a depletion in revenues was to be expected, and consequently the implementation of provisions in the Constitution such as the 30:70 ratio in the civil service and the establishment of the army would be delayed.

Rauf Denktas, the President of the Turkish Communal Chamber, reacted by calling on the Turkish Cypriots to cease paying taxes to the Republic. He said that arrangements were being made by the Turkish Communal Chamber to collect all direct taxes until a law was properly enacted empowering the government to collect them.

Vice-President Küçük issued a statement severely criticizing President Makarios for his declaration. He added a complaint of his own, namely that he had been denied any say in executive matters, though under the Constitution the powers of the Vice-President and the President were "almost identical." He promised that he would continue to do his utmost to secure respect for the Constitution and to find a solution to the present difficulties.

On Dec 27 the House passed as a matter of urgency a law on income tax for foreign nationals operating in Cyprus, both Greek and Turkish members voting in favour. The matter of income tax for Cypriot nationals was not dealt with and remained in abeyance. (Cyprus Mail, Dec 19, 21, 22, 28)

The issue of the Army proved to be another problem generating tension in inter-communal relations. Under the Constitution, the army should have numbered 2,000 men (1,200 Greeks and 800 Turks). The annual budget envisaged was £1m.

On Jan 20 the House approved the army bill. At the same time, however, it was reported that the government intended to establish in 1961 only two "regiments," of 300 men each; 360 troops would be Greek and 240 Turkish; expenditure would be cut to half a million pounds. In Feb the House approved the budget cut, all Greek members voting for the cut and all Turkish members opposing it. (Turkish opposition was mainly due to reluctance to allow any infringement on the Constitution, since the lower budget would have meant a reduction in the size of the army). Recruitment of the first group of 400 men started on March 3. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 21, 22, Feb 8, March 4)

A new crisis over the army issue occurred in Oct when Vice-President Dr Küçük vetoed a decision by the cabinet to establish the army on the basis of mixed Greek-Turkish units throughout. The Defence Minister (a Turkish Cypriot) had proposed that separate Greek and Turkish units be established. The Greek majority in the Cabinet, however, took the above decision on Aug 10, and reiterated it on Sept 21 and on Oct 13. This was the first time Dr Küçük had used his veto right under the Constitution.

Dr Küçük said that if army units were completely mixed, many complications liable to lead to serious communal troubles would occur. He advocated an army of five battalions, each comprising one Greek and one Turkish company. Such an arrangement would also enable the implementation of a provision in the Constitution that forces stationed in territory where members of one community constituted nearly 100% of the population should belong to that community.

In reaction, President Makarios issued a statement saying that the establishment of the army on a basis of segregation was "totally unacceptable," as this could not lead to "a unified Cyprus army as contemplated by the Constitution." In view of the Vice-President's veto, the President added, "I do not think that we should proceed with the formation of an army of 2,000 men as envisaged in the Constitution." (Cyprus Mail, Oct 21, 22)

The army bill came up again for a vote in the House of Representatives on Dec 22, when the budget was further cut to £180,000. All Greek members voted for the cut and all Turkish members voted against it. (Cyprus Mail, Dec 23)

THE GREEK COMMUNITY

[The political situation within the Greek community was characterized mainly by the lack of an effective political party behind the government while internal strife continued. The group which supported President Makarios' election in 1959, the Patriotic Front, continued to function as a combination of divergent anti-Communist or non-Communist groups, including trade unions, farmers' organizations, businessmen, and professional people.]

The Pan-Cyprian Ex-Fighters Association, a remnant of the former EOKA fighters, opposed to Archbishop Makarios, organized a demonstration on Jan 13, the anniversary of the plebiscite on Enosis held in 1950. The demonstration was in support of General Grivas (former commander of EOKA) and against PM Constantine Karamanlis of Greece. The Minister of the Interior, George Hadjis, himself a former EOKA commander, instructed the police to break up the demonstration in Nicosia. Before the demonstrations the police raided the Association's headquarters. During the demonstrations participants were attacked and beaten by civilian opponents.

On the occasion of the anniversary, all Greek papers stressed that the Zurich agreements were not what the Greek Cypriots had set out to achieve. The daily Makhi [whose editor, Nikos Sampson, was an EOKA hero] declared that "the spirit of Enosis is still alive"; "the pan-Hellenic dream" would be fulfilled. "We shall find the proper time to fulfil our national aspirations." (Makhi, Jan 16; Cyprus Mail, Jan 17)

On May 1, the EOKA anniversary, the Ex-Fighters Association distributed leaflets throughout the main towns of Cyprus, calling on the Greeks of Cyprus to "smash the Zurich chains" and to continue the struggle towards union with Greece. (Cyprus Mail, May 3)

The Murder of Peter Gray, an Englishman working in Cyprus, aroused a wave of indignation throughout the island. The government offered £20,000 for information leading to the arrest of the killers. Among the suspects arrested was Nikos Sampson, the editor of Makhi, and another former EOKA member; they were released two days later for lack of evidence. (Cyprus Mail, May 13, 14, 17; Eleftheria, Phileleftheros, May 14)

The Publication of the Memoirs of Gen. Grivas in Cyprus, in Nov, caused considerable uproar. In his memoirs, Gen. Grivas sharply criticized Archbishop Makarios and the Minister of the Interior, George Hadjis, for the role they allegedly played during the EOKA struggle. On Dec 4, three days after the first consignment of the books arrived in Cyprus, President Makarios in a radio broadcast charged Grivas with distorting the truth and sully the EOKA struggle. He said that the memoirs were imbued "not with the honesty and sincerity of a fighter but with the personal motives of a small politician."

Most Greek newspapers reported the President's statement with no comment, whereas Haraaghi, the Communist daily, strongly supported him.

Several members of the committee originally formed to distribute the book, amongst them members of Parliament, resigned in protest against the charges made by Grivas, while the Minister of the Interior, denying the charges made against him, accused Grivas of falsifying the truth. The Greek press expressed anxiety over the rift in the Greek community. (Haraaghi, Dec 5; Eleftheria, Makhi, Dec 7; Phileleftheros, Dec 7, 12; Cyprus Mail, Dec 5, 6, 7, 8)

The Patriotic Front and the Democratic Union. The Patriotic Front—which in 1959 had supported Archbishop Makarios for the Presidency—was to be completely reorganized, it was reported in July. Twenty-eight of the 35 Greek members of the House and 19 of the 22 members of the Greek Communal Chamber belonged to the Front. The Front chairman was to be Glafkos Clerides, the President of the House of Representatives. There would be a policy declaration and the Front would be organized throughout the country in district, regional and executive committees. The decision on the reorganization, which had been contemplated for some time, had been prompted by the "consolidation of the Democratic Front" [Union, which strongly and vocally opposed

President Makarios and his government.] (Cyprus Mail, July 15)

The first annual conference of the Cyprus Democratic Union to which the above report referred took place on July 9. The Union was founded by the late John Clerides (father of Glafkos; he died on Jan 17). The chairman of the party, Dr Dervis, ex-mayor of Nicosia and SG of the defunct Cyprus National Party, outlined the party programme. Among other points, he demanded the abolition of the army and the exclusion of the clergy from "politics, banks, and mines" as essential for its prestige. In its resolutions the congress expressed "indignation at the shocking situation" that resulted from the "sinful Zurich regime," opposed the proposed partition of municipalities, and declared that it would continue by all legal means the struggle for the implementation of the Cypriot people's "undeniable right" to self-determination. (Cyprus Mail, July 10)

In Dec, Tassos Papadopoulos, the Minister of Labour, brought a libel action against Ethniki, the paper of the Democratic Union. In his evidence he emphasized that he had been "one of the few" who had advised Makarios against the signing of the Zurich-London agreements. Dr. Dervis, chairman of the Democratic Union, who gave evidence for the defence, said that "in Cyprus we have serfdom, not democracy." He admitted that in articles he published in Ethniki he had referred to the cabinet as [President Makarios'] "children's choir," had called those serving the regime "lackeys," and the regime itself, "the rule of the clergy." Another witness for the defence declared that he was a Communist "and I am proud of it." He said the only good thing that had resulted from the Zurich agreements was that Cyprus now belonged to the UN and could demand of that body to grant it "self-determination," to "get rid of the alliance which I consider unreasonable and immoral." Told that it was unconstitutional to demand this, he said that the call for Enosis had also been unconstitutional. (On Dec 29 the court reserved judgement on the case.) (Cyprus Mail, Dec 13, 15, 20, 21, 23, 29)

The Cyprus Communist Party—AKEL. [AKEL, with five (Greek) members in the House of Representatives, and a daily (Haraaghi) to voice its opinion, was active during the year. AKEL advocated a policy of positive neutrality, a struggle for the removal of the British bases on the island, and the acceptance of Soviet aid; it voted, however, for Cyprus' joining the Commonwealth.]

In July AKEL called for a conference of all groups in Cyprus to establish a united front to fight imperialism and colonialism. It charged the West and "Anglo-American imperialism with causing the government to stray from its policy of neutrality. In a press interview, President Makarios accused the Communists of trying to undermine the work of the government, and advised them to desist "if they intend to make good use of the lawful rights and liberties granted to them under the Constitution." AKEL complained that the President's "implied threat" was based on a "distorted version" of AKEL's stand for a policy of positive neutrality. The party affirmed its support for this policy, and reserved the right to criticize the government for any deviation from it. (Haraaghi, July 15; Cyprus Mail, July 25, 27)

AKEL held an October Revolution anniversary meeting in Nicosia. (Mizan, Dec)

The SG of AKEL, Papaioannou, participated in the twenty-second CPSU congress in Moscow, in Oct. In his speech he said that the Cypriot people would fight for liquidation of military bases on the island and for

"true national independence," being confident of the "unlimited support" of the Soviet Union and the Socialist countries in this struggle. (Mizan, Nov)

AKEL planned its tenth congress for March 8, 1962; this was to be the first legal congress since the party was banned by the British in 1955. (NCNA, June 12 [FE 17])

THE TURKISH COMMUNITY

[The internal political unity of the Turkish community was evident throughout the year, although in Dec there were signs of dissension.]

In the beginning of Dec, eleven of the 15 Turkish members of the House formed an independent parliamentary group. They had been elected on the ticket of the National Union Federation—led by Vice-President Küçük—which, they said, "had ceased to exist." Greek newspapers speculated that this move could possibly lead to the formation of a new party demanding a firmer line in the defence of Turkish rights. In a press interview, the deputy chairman of the group, Halit Ali Rıza, said that the group did not intend to organize a new party, but could possibly become the parliamentary group of another party. He said the group would seek to co-operate with the Greek members of the House but the Greeks, on their part, must fully respect the rights of the Turkish community. He added that the group considered itself free to criticize any government act, even if the Turkish government members had concurred in it.

The Greek press, interpreting the formation of this group as a rift in the Turkish leadership, identified it with R. Denktaş, the President of the Turkish Chamber (Phileleftheros, Dec 11; Kypros, Dec 12). However, in a statement to the press on Dec 11, Denktaş declared that his cooperation with Dr Küçük was "close and cordial" and he was not interested in forming a new party, as the National Union Party under Dr Küçük fulfilled its purposes; he added that the forming of the parliamentary group did not necessarily mean a divergence of opinion on "Turkish national affairs."

On the same day Dr Küçük stated that the new group had "no significance from a community point of view"; it would not take a separate line on "problems of national character" because it could not go against the will of the people. (Cyprus Mail, Dec 7, 11, 12)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

NOTE: For relations with the Arab countries and Israel, see under these countries.

UN, INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS AND CONFERENCES

Joining International Organizations. [In Feb Cyprus decided to associate with UNICEF.] On Dec 12 Cyprus was admitted to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. (UN Yearbook, 1961)

In May Cyprus was admitted as the 16th member of the Council of Europe. (Statesman's Yearbook, 1961)

UN Voting Record. Whereas at the 15th session of the UN General Assembly Cyprus' vote coincided slightly more often with the vote of the US than with that of the Communist countries, the situation was reversed at the 16th session. At both sessions, however, Cyprus' vote coincided much more often with that of non-Arab ME, Afro-Asian, and Latin-American countries—in that order—than with either of the world powers. (For details see pp 4 ff.)

[Zenon Rossides, Cyprus' representative at the UN, took an active part in the proceedings of the Assembly on several occasions.] Thus on Oct 19 he proposed the establishment of a permanent UN military force. (The idea had been advocated by President Kennedy.) (NYT, Oct 19)

UN Aid. The UN Special Fund granted Cyprus £250,000 for an agricultural research institute. (Cyprus Mail, May 26)

Neutrality and the Belgrade Conference. [The question of Cyprus' international orientation was a major issue dividing the two communities. Whereas the Greek Cypriots repeatedly underlined Cyprus' affinity with the neutralist camp, the Turkish community insisted that Cyprus' place was with the West.] When the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries was announced, the Greek Cypriot press insisted on Cyprus' participation.

Cyprus was invited to the conference only in Aug, after prolonged debates in Cairo as to "who is a neutral." On Aug 22 the Cyprus government approved participation in the conference, overriding the objections of the three Turkish ministers. Vice-President Küçük stated that participation of Cyprus would be against the interest of the Republic, but that he had decided not to use his veto right in the matter. [The President's speech at the conference (Sept 3) was welcomed by most of the Cyprus press], and on his return he was received at Nicosia airport by Vice-President Küçük. (Cyprus Mail, Aug 23, 24, 26, Sept 9; see also pp 59b, 62a, 64b, 66a.)

In Oct Eleftheria demanded a "radical reappraisal" of Cyprus' foreign policy, and the dismissal of FM Kyprianou, because Western confidence in Cyprus had been shaken. It said that East and West attached different meanings to "unfettered neutrality," and that it was necessary to convince the British people that the Cypriots had no less fervent feelings towards them than towards Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito, who had been invited to Cyprus.

In reply to a journalist's question, apparently referring to the above editorial, President Makarios said that Cyprus would adhere to a policy of non-alignment.

On the same day a US embassy spokesman said that the US had never connected its attitude to Cyprus with any specific point in the latter's foreign policy. (Cyprus Mail, Oct 20)

UNITED KINGDOM

Cypriot Leaders Meet Queen Elizabeth. On Jan 20, President Makarios and Vice-President Dr Küçük were present at the British sovereign base of Akrotiri to welcome Queen Elizabeth II, who stopped there briefly on her way to India. They had separate talks with the Queen; President Makarios' talk lasted over an hour. No statement was issued after the meeting. Earlier, the UK representative in Cyprus said the meeting would set "the final seal on the restoration of good relations and friendship" between the two countries. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 21)

At the beginning of the year, the question of membership in the British Commonwealth was the central theme in foreign policy discussions in Cyprus. In Jan it was reported that the Patriotic Front was divided over the issue. The Cyprus Chamber of Commerce, the Cyprus Association of Manufacturers, and the Turkish Chamber of Commerce all issued statements in support of membership, pointing out the economic advantages that would be derived from such a move. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 21, 24, Feb 9)

On Feb 16 the House of Representatives voted to apply for membership in the Commonwealth for a period of five years. Forty-one members of the House voted in favour, and nine, all members of the Patriotic Front, voted against. [On the rift in the Patriotic Front, see above: The Greek Community.] AKEL, which rather unexpectedly voted for membership, explained that although Cyprus must eventually leave the Commonwealth, it must prepare for this by working for economic independence; it must do "what the UAR and Cuba did." (Cyprus Mail, Feb 17)

On March 13 the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference in London unanimously approved Cyprus' application, and the Republic of Cyprus thereby became the 12th member of the Commonwealth. The following day President Makarios, accompanied by the Foreign and Defence ministers, left for London to attend the conference. On his return the President stated that he was now "more than ever convinced that our link with the British Commonwealth will be beneficial to Cyprus in all respects." He said that in his talks with the British PM he had met with great understanding. (Cyprus Mail, March 14, 23)

Economic Ties; Development Assistance. [In 1960 the UK had granted Cyprus £12m. ($33.6m.) for the period 1960-5. This sum was regarded in Cyprus as general revenue and not as development assistance.]

In March President Makarios stated that in the framework of a five-year development plan—which would require $48m. in foreign aid—Britain would be approached for a loan of more than $30m., to finance electric power development. He would also apply for a $7m. loan for the enlargement of Famagusta port which the British had undertaken to assist, in the framework of the independence agreement. (Britain retained certain rights in Famagusta port, which served the British military bases.) Britain had already undertaken to grant $1.4m. for the development of Nicosia airport. (NYT, March 11)

Negotiations for the British loan for the electric-power project were conducted in London by the Cypriot Minister of Finance, in May. At first talks were reported to have reached a deadlock, whereupon Cyprus papers charged Britain with going back on her promise for the loan; some advocated the acceptance of Soviet aid. On his return to Cyprus, the Minister stated that Britain had offered a "considerable sum," but had asked for interest at the current rate in the British money market plus commission, which would amount to some 6 percent. (Cyprus Mail, May 19, 21, 23, 24, 26)

The British army envisaged spending $4.5m. in Cyprus during 1961, mostly on works by Cypriot contractors. (Cyprus Mail, June 3)

Britain remained by far Cyprus' most important trading partner (see tables of trade, pp 82-5.)

Question of Common Market. The possibility of the UK associating with the European Common Market disturbed public opinion in Cyprus, in that British imports of Cyprus' agricultural produce might be curtailed. On July 8, Edward Heath, Lord Privy Seal, arrived in Nicosia to discuss the question in the framework of British consultations with Commonwealth members. In a statement issued at the end of the talks, Heath said that the vital interests of Cyprus would be preserved and her position would be considered in the negotiations with the Common Market. Later in the month President Makarios stated that Britain's association with the Common Market without adequate guarantees to Cyprus would greatly weaken relations between Cyprus and the Commonwealth. Heath had undertaken to report Cypriot apprehensions to his government. (Cyprus Mail, July 8, 9, 11, 25)

Emigration. Of 14,589 Cypriots who emigrated in 1960, 13,534 went to Britain, 80.6% of them Greeks and 15.2% Turks.

Sabotage at British Base. (On the bases, see also p 90a.) Between July 26 and Aug 7, a pipeline carrying water to the British sovereign base of Dekhelia was damaged 12 times by saboteurs. The part of the pipeline affected was in Cypriot sovereign territory and was guarded by Cypriot police. The sabotage was believed by the British authorities to be the work of a small group of extremists of either the Left or the Right. Though the independence agreement permitted the British to take measures to ensure the effectiveness of the bases, they felt that any extraordinary step would only appear as a provocation; thus they preferred to leave the matter in the hands of the Cyprus government. The acting British High Commissioner protested to President Makarios. (NYT, Aug 4, 8)

GREECE AND TURKEY

Aid to Communities. [Financial aid from Greece and Turkey to Cyprus took the form of grants to the Greek and Turkish communal chambers.]

Greece. In June, addressing a group of Cypriot journalists, PM Karamanlis of Greece called for unity and cooperation in Cyprus. He added that Greece would always be ready to help Cyprus, both morally and financially. He praised both President Makarios and Vice-President Küçük for their moderation. He said it was "essential" that Makarios serve as President during the first stages of the Republic and expressed his confidence that under these two leaders Cyprus could thrive. He further said that Cyprus could play its part in securing peace and stability in the Mediterranean. (Cyprus Mail, June 17)

In Sept, in an announcement made in Athens during a brief stopover, Archbishop Makarios said that Greece had offered substantial economic assistance to Cyprus. (Cyprus Mail, July 19)

Turkey. In July, in an interview with Greek journalists, President Gürel of Turkey said in answer to a question on the future of intercommunal relations in Cyprus: "I am optimistic about the future of Cyprus and I do believe that the small difficulties that are being faced and may be faced in the future during the application of the Zurich and London agreements could be settled in a spirit of friendship and mutual understanding." (Cyprus Mail, July 19)

WEST GERMANY, UNITED STATES

German Federal Republic. By the end of 1960, Cyprus and the GFR had exchanged diplomatic representation at the level of embassies.

Three trade and aid agreements were signed on Oct 30. The trade agreement reduced restrictions on German imports of Cypriot wines and agricultural produce. A technical assistance agreement provided, i.e., for a German grant of DM1.3m. for survey work in the island. Economic aid would consist of a German state loan of DM12m. at interest rates of 3½ to 5½%, according to the type of project, and of government guarantees for loans by German private companies up to DM20m. for industrial development. (Cyprus Mail, Oct 31)

On Nov 21 it was officially announced that President Makarios would pay a state visit in May 1962. A day later the German ambassador conveyed an invitation to Vice-President Kōçik, who accepted it for a date towards the end of 1962. (Cyprus Mail, Nov 22, 23)

United States. By the end of 1960, both the Cyprus ambassador to Washington and the American ambassador to Nicosia had taken up their posts.

An agreement on a US grant to Cyprus of 50,000 tons of grain was concluded in Nov 1960, and on Jan 11, 1961, the first shipment reached Cyprus. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 12)

Discussion of further US economic aid to Cyprus continued throughout the year. On Dec 15 the Cyprus Foreign Ministry announced that extensive US government development assistance to Cyprus—both direct from the government and through the World Bank—had been promised to Foreign Minister Kyprianos by Secretary of State Dean Rusk. (Cyprus Mail, Dec 16)

USSR AND OTHER COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

USSR—Diplomatic and Political Relations. The USSR recognized Cyprus immediately after the announcement of its independence. The first Soviet ambassador to Cyprus presented his credentials on Dec 31, 1960. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 1)

In April, the Cyprus government approved the opening of an embassy in Moscow, without fixing a date. (Cyprus maintained by that time embassies in New York, London, Ankara, Athens, Bonn, and Cairo). A government spokesman denied that the decision was indicative of a "general swing to the left" in Cyprus (Cyprus Mail, April 28). [No ambassador to Moscow had been appointed by the end of the year.]

A Cypriot parliamentary delegation, headed by the President of the House of Representatives, visited the USSR from July 23 to Aug 12. (Mizan, Sept)

On Oct 22 the Cyprus House of Representatives passed a resolution protesting against the continuation of nuclear tests, and called on the Soviet Union to refrain from testing its 50 megaton bomb. With the exception of the five AKEL members and one other Greek member, all members present voted for the resolution. (Cyprus Mail, Oct 24)

Scope of Relations. In March a Cyprus-USSR Friendship society was launched in Moscow. Reporting on this occasion, New Times enumerated the following contacts between Cyprus and the USSR: A delegation of Soviet collective farmers had recently visited Nicosia; ships carrying Soviet tourists had called at Famagusta; a Cypriot delegation would attend the World Youth Forum in Moscow, and the Mayor of Limasol had been invited to Moscow. (Quoted in Mizan, May.)

Question of Soviet Aid. The question of Soviet aid was a topic of public discussion. AKEL claimed that the USSR had offered economic assistance, but the offer had not been taken up by Cyprus. The Greek ambassador to Cyprus warned against economic ties with the Communist bloc; such ties, he said, "could have social repercussions." (Cyprus Mail, March 22)

In May the Cypriot press discussed the aid question in association with two developments: reports that development aid which had been expected from the UK was now in doubt, and the preparations in Cairo for the neutralist meeting in Belgrade. The Communist papers, as well as Greek Cypriot papers advocating a policy of neutralism, insisted that Cyprus must accept economic assistance from both East and West. The Greek-Cypriot Eleftheria, however, insisted that Cyprus must accept assistance only from the West. The Turkish-Cypriot press rejected any notion of acceptance of aid from the USSR. Replying to charges that no "concrete" offers for Soviet aid had been made, the Communist daily Haraaghi wrote that both Khrushchov and Mikoyan had stated that Cyprus had only to apply for aid, and it would be offered with no strings attached. (Quoted in Cyprus Mail, May 21, 23, 24, 31, June 2)

It was reported that the USSR had renewed her offer of aid during the visit there of the Cypriot parliamentary delegation (on which see above). While one Greek-Cypriot paper, Tharos, insisted that Cyprus as a neutralist state could benefit from economic assistance from both East and West, Eleftheria denounced Soviet aid as a trap intended to ultimately subjugate the country to Communism; in evidence the paper quoted "present Soviet hostility to the UAR." [See relations between the UAR and the USSR: The Great Propaganda Campaign.] (Quoted in Cyprus Mail, Sept 12, 24.) [No concrete development in respect of Soviet aid took place in 1961.]

Communist Broadcasts against British Bases. Moscow broadcasts to Cyprus (in Greek) were mostly concerned with the British bases on the island, which, they said, exposed Cyprus to serious danger in the event of a nuclear war, and were baring Cyprus also in peacetime. The broadcasts claimed that the whole population, "even right-wing politicians," had come to recognize this. The British, however, were staging military demonstrations to intimidate the Cypriots and crush their "unanimous resistance" to the presence of the bases.

On the occasion of the first anniversary of the promulgation of the Republic of Cyprus, Moscow Radio also denounced the activities in Cyprus of the "US and West German monopolies." The Soviet Union, on the other hand, had consistently supported "the Cypriots' just demands at the UN," was among the first to hail Cyprus' independence, and was now quickly developing cultural, trade, and other relations; [no mention was made of economic aid.] (R. Moscow in Greek, June 2, 27 [SU 5, 29], July 6 [SU 11], Aug 16 [SU 17]; see also R. Tirana, R. Sofia, July 5 [EE 7]; TASS, April 30 [SU May 2])

Trade Agreements. A trade agreement between Cyprus and the USSR for 1962, providing for trade exchange to the value of £800,000 by either side, was signed in Cyprus on Dec 22. (Cyprus Mail, Dec 23)

Rumania, Poland. The Rumanian ambassador presented his credentials in May, and the Polish Chargé d'Affaires—in June. In Nov a Polish firm won the tender for the enlargement of Famagusta port. (Cyprus Mail, May 19, June 15, Nov 3)

THE REPUBLIC OF IRAQ

(Al-Jumhuriyah al-Iraqiyyah)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

SYNOPSIS

The most serious event in Iraq's political history in 1961 was the rising of the Kurdish tribes under Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani. The rebels said they aimed at Kurdish autonomy within Iraq. The rising broke out in the summer and reached a peak in September when the government launched a counter-offensive which succeeded in driving the tribes back, but failed to subdue them. At the end of the year fighting flared up again. (For a detailed synopsis see below: The Kurdish Rising.)

Another important internal political development was the continued persecution and weakening of the Communists, and the growing strength of the nationalists, the regime's implacable enemies.

Observers described the prevailing political atmosphere in Iraq throughout the year as charged with discontent and conflict. Public security continued to be shaky, though perhaps less so than in 1959 when Communist influence was at its peak; in some areas, however, and especially in Mosul, political murders of reputed Communists by nationalists were reported to be a common occurrence. In March, the Baghdad taxi-cab drivers rioted for two days after an increase in the petrol tax. Both nationalist and leftist opponents of the regime fanned the flames. The authorities reacted vigorously, and the disturbances were quickly suppressed, with some loss of life.

There were no reports of plots against the regime nor unrest in the army during the year, though it was assumed that the army harboured disaffected elements, mainly nationalists. At the same time the authorities carried out no purges or large-scale preventive arrests, in contrast to the previous years of the new regime. Qasim was increasingly lenient towards fallen opponents; this policy was highlighted by the release from prison of the pro-UAR Colonel Abd al-Salam Arif, Qasim's junior partner in the revolution (in November), and the pardon granted to the five Ba'ath members who had participated in the attempt on Qasim's life in 1959 (in December).

Insofar as the Iraqi public was not actively opposed to the regime it was said to be apathetic and indifferent, a mood engendered by what was described as the revolution's lack of direction and PM Qasim's methods. While the officially-inspired cult of Gen. Qasim as "the sole leader" was as prominent as ever, he was widely thought to be unpopular; even his sanity was doubted. His standing was considered to have diminished still more following the Kurdish rising, the Kuwait crisis and the unsuccessful oil negotiations with the IPC.

The authorities allowed the press considerable latitude in criticizing the regime—Qasim's personality excepted—and to give expression to the struggle among the various political factions. Among the public, it was reported, derogatory remarks against the regime and Qasim personally were frequently made without particular fear of consequences, a phenomenon described as "startling in a police state." Primarily, the press voiced a demand for civil liberties and the rule of law, the abolition of military government and, above all, the promulgation of a constitution. The integrity as well as the efficiency of the civil service were also openly criticized as were faults in the implementation of the agrarian reform and the economic situation.

The government underwent minor changes. The Sovereignty Council, which under the 1958 provisional constitution acted as head of state, was reconstituted in November, after the death of its junior member, the Kurd an-Naqshabandi. Qasim appointed two new members, both quite unknown to the public, while Lt.-Gen. Najib ar-Rubay'i remained chairman.

Cabinet changes were made in May: the most significant was the replacement of Dr. Faysal as-Samir, the Minister of Guidance, the sole remaining leftist member, by the anti-Communist Brig. Isma'il Arif. In October Brig. Fu'ad Arif, Minister of State, resigned, presumably in connection with the Kurdish rising. The ministries of guidance and of oil affairs, and the directorate-general of security, were reorganized during the year in the interest of greater efficiency. It was, however, widely alleged that an additional reason for the reorganization of oil affairs was the government's desire to remove Abd al-Fattah Ibrahim, a prominent leftist, from his position as Director of the General Board of Oil Affairs. The Board was abolished.

The government took steps to tackle various social problems. Enrolment at institutes of higher learning increased considerably; at the same time there were complaints of academic unemployment and lack of adequate student facilities. Comprehensive social security legislation was discussed a great deal but was not enacted. Agrarian reform progressed as far as expropriation and re-distribution of lands was concerned, but organizationally and socially it was widely held to be unsatisfactory and the authorities implicitly admitted this criticism to be just. The government made far-reaching tax concessions to the peasants. The building of popular housing continued; in the new 5-year plan, introduced in 1961, however, it was given a relatively minor place.

Legalized party life became increasingly more restricted. Four licensed parties were active at the beginning of the year, in varying degrees; all were unfriendly to the regime. Two of them officially ceased to exist in October. The Democratic Party of Kurdistan associated itself with the Kurdish rising, and consequently was prohibited. The National Democratic Party (NDP) suspended its activities after having suffered recurrent dissensions and secessions. The National Progressive Party under Muhammad Hadid, which had seceded from the NDP in April 1960, survived the year, but seemed quite inactive; its newspaper, the daily Al-Bayān, criticized the regime, especially on the absence of democracy. The other party which survived was the minuscule legal Communist Party led by Da'ūd as-Sā'igh, established in 1960 with the aid of the authorities as a rival to the Communist Party proper.

Of more importance were the illegal political groupings. They comprised nationalist pan-Arab groups and the Communists, who were involved in an intense struggle with each other as well as with the government. The general impression was that the nationalists were growing stronger and the Communists weaker, though the latter were still thought to be the best organized political body. One reason for this change was the widespread public resentment and even hatred of the Communists, incurred by what was described as the "red terror" of 1959. The government's attitude was still more important: the Communists were persecuted whereas the nationalists were shown relative leniency. The Communist threat to the regime had appeared in the spring of 1959, after the nationalist opposition had been crushed, for the time being. The Communists had also utilized their ascendancy for entrenching themselves in public life, especially in front organizations: trade unions, peasants' and professional associations, which the nationalists had never done. Thus the government worked all through 1960 and 1961 to oust the Communists from these positions and to weaken them in other ways; the nationalists, the only real alternative civilian political force, benefited from this policy without even having to use much initiative. The government persisted in this policy though the Communists seemed to acquiesce in Qasim's regime for fear of a nationalist take-over while the nationalists clearly aimed at its overthrow.

The nationalists were divided in their attitude to President Abdel Nasser. In 1959 the Ba'ath party had split into pro-Nasserists and those determined on an independent policy, with the latter prevailing. In 1961, Fu'ād Rikābī, the exiled former Secretary-General of the Iraqi Ba'ath, was expelled from the party, and joined a rival pro-Nasser Ba'ath group. There were several pro-UAR groups, among them the "Arab Nationalists" (qawmiyyūn al-ʿarab); three of them were said to have formed a clandestine "National Front." Towards the end of the year, a report spoke of a link between the Ba'ath, the Istiqlal party and the qawmiyyūn.

The nationalists occasionally demonstrated in the streets, mainly in the nationalist stronghold of the A'zamiyah quarter of Baghdad, and they conducted subversive propaganda among pan-Arab, anti-Communist, and anti-Qasim lines. The professional organizations which had been wrested from Communist control with the government's help and which had been taken over by the nationalists served as outlets for their demands and resentments. The nationalists took the offensive against the Communists wherever they were stronger, especially in the Mosul area where many reputed Communists were reportedly murdered.

The Communists (ittiḥād aṣṣ-ṣa'ab) were said to be suffering from internal dissensions; a move to oust the leaders of the dominant pro-Soviet faction was reported in February, and another rift in November. The existence of conflicting tendencies in the party also was made clear by Communist policy pronouncements. The party condemned the government's hostility, the "reactionary in fluences" under which the regime had come, and its "anti-democratic policies." However, while the party depicted the national bourgeoisie—represented by Qasim—as inconsistent and prone to compromise, tendencies against which the party was called on to struggle, it continued to advocate an alliance in a national front with those bourgeois groups which were hostile to imperialism. Whoever failed to observe these distinctions was condemned, those with "leftist tendencies" who struggled against the bourgeoisie as a whole, and the "defeatists and opportunists" who, because the government was anti-imperialist, failed to combat its reactionary measures.

The authorities persecuted the Communists throughout the year. Communist cells were liquidated and members arrested and tried, their newspapers were suppressed, and they were ousted from the leadership of associations and trade unions by various stratagems. The teachers' and the journalists' associations were wrested from Communist domination in February and in June respectively, the latter with the open assistance of the authorities; the General Federation of Trade Unions went anti-Communist in May. Only the Students' Association was still leftist-led by the end of the year, but at the cost of a split and a continuous struggle with the authorities. Of the front organizations only the Partisans of Peace managed to survive but the authorities closed all their premises; their chairman, Aziz Sharif, was apparently the only prominent Communist or near-Communist who remained on good terms with PM Qasim. The Union of Democratic Youth, another front organization, was dissolved by the authorities and so were a number of provincial branches of the pro-Communist Iraqi Woman's League. It should be mentioned, however, that no death sentences on Communists were carried out, and that Qasim did not publicly abuse them.

Apart from the Kurds, there was little news on the various religious and ethnic groups. The government took care to conciliate Islamic circles—including an amnesty for leaders of the extremist opposition Islamic party who had been imprisoned in October 1960—but apparently found little response. The Shi'is demanded the abolition of the personal status law enacted under the new regime, and they were reported to be extremely anti-Communist as a result of the anti-religious terror of 1959. There were reports of tension and occasional fighting between Turkomans and Kurds, as well as between Yazidis and Bedouin tribes. The authorities made some attempts to improve the situation of the nomads.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SURVEY

1961 was a year of planning in the Iraqi economy: in addition to the continued preparation of industrial and other surveys, mostly in the framework of existing agreements with the Communist countries, the government issued a Five-Year Development Plan for 1961-65 which aimed at doubling the national product within 10 years at a cost of JD566m. The government also continued to work out a legal framework for its economic policy in accord with the socio-economic concepts of the Qasim regime.

At the same time, there was no real improvement in the economic situation though agricultural production increased. Apart from administrative shortcomings the fault lay in the inconclusive negotiations with the IPC and political complications, namely the Kurdish rising and the Kuwait dispute. Oil output remained stationary, the agrarian question was far from being solved, industrial growth was unsatisfactory, the budget was once more based on deficit financing, the balance of payments worsened, and the foreign currency reserves continued to shrink.

Population. According to official figures the population of Iraq was 6,637m. The most populated of the 14 provinces were Baghdad—1.43m, Mosul—764,000, Basra—550,000 and Diwaniya—522,000.

Agricultural Output. Agricultural output, which had fallen steeply since 1958 through drought and shortcomings in the Agrarian Reform Organization, rose in 1960/1, as weather conditions improved, but remained lower than in 1957.

Agricultural Taxation. Important developments took place in agricultural taxation. In March two taxes were abolished: the Istihlak tax of 10% on the value of produce reaching the market, and the land tax, ranging between 2% and 15% of the value of production. These taxes were replaced by a direct tax on agricultural lands ranging from 5% to 15% taking into account irrigation methods and disposal of produce; vegetable crops, cotton, jute, oil seeds, sugar beet and sugar cane were exempted for three years, and so were many peasants as individuals.

In Sept this law was rescinded by a new Agricultural Land Tax Law, which was made retroactive from April. All peasants were exempted from paying taxes on their crops; however, the Agrarian Reform Organization was to pay tax for peasants over whom it had authority and the Tobacco Monopoly and Dates Association was to pay 7% on behalf of growers instead of 12%. Landowners were to benefit from a substantial reduction, but were warned not to reimburse themselves from their peasants. The Minister of Finance hoped that the law would simplify administration, lighten the burden on the peasantry and, above all, contribute to checking the serious problem of flight from the land.

Agrarian Reform. The Agrarian Reform Law of Sept 1958 had limited holdings to a maximum of 250 hectares of irrigated, and 500 hectares of unirrigated land. Surplus lands were to be expropriated in return for compensation in the form of 3% debentures redeemable after 20 years, and redistributed to peasants in plots of 7.5 to 15 hectares of irrigated, and 15 to 30 hectares of unirrigated land. According to Iraqi sources the total area covered by the law was over 2.2m. hectares, of which over 1.2m. hectares were expropriated by Aug 31, 1961; only 427,998 hectares, however, had reached the state of "finalized expropriation." The total area distributed by Aug 31, 1961, was 517,210 hectares and 28,877 peasant families had been "fully investigated for the purpose of land redistribution." Furthermore, over 1.5m. hectares were leased to peasants under a temporary administrative arrangement, 58% being state domains and the rest expropriated lands.

The delay in establishing agricultural cooperatives, mistakes in the implementation of the reform and tension between landowners and peasants, as well as the drought, were held responsible by Iraqi critics for the fall in agricultural production.

Irrigation and Agricultural Development. In Nov the Darbandi Khan dam was dedicated although it was to be completed only in 1962/3. The dam was to irrigate the Diyala basin and had a projected storage capacity of 3,000 million cubic metres; its estimated costs were ID26m.

Grain silos were built and large government farms were established under the Soviet aid agreement (see p 298a for details). Numerous demonstration plots and stations for pest control were also established.

Industry. Apart from oil, industry's share in the national product remained low, about 9%. The volume of industrial output was reported to have increased from ID104m. in 1960 to ID110m. in 1961.

Measures were taken to encourage investments in industry and building. In April 30% of inherited industrial shares and properties were freed from inheritance tax; tax exemptions were also granted for new buildings and 50% of Arab capital invested in industry and building. In May, a Law on Capital Investments in Industry gave special concessions to industrial plants with at least ID3,000 worth of machinery if 60% of the capital was in Iraqi hands and at least 90% of the employees were Iraqis, apart from essential foreign experts. The law provided for a 10-year exemption from land tax, stamp duty and profit tax on profits of up to 15% of the paid-up capital, exemption from customs duty on raw materials, the sale or lease of state lands for industrial purposes on favourable terms, and the formation of an Industrial Development Committee to supervise the execution of the law, comprised of representatives of the ministries of finance, trade and industry and the Federation of Industries.

In December the Minister of Trade ordered the 1960 Commercial Agencies' Law to be implemented within 6 to 12 months: all agencies except those dealing with exports were to be confined to Iraqi nationals or companies with majority Iraqi shareholdings, and all foreign-owned agencies transferred to Iraqi ownership. The law affected 663 foreign-owned trade agencies.

In January a step towards industrial cooperation between the private and the public sectors was taken with the formation of the Amara Industries Company (textiles) and the Hilla Industries Company (tannery); each concern with a capital of ID100,000, 40% to be subscribed by the state-owned Industrial Bank and the rest by the public.

The capital of the Industrial Bank, which aimed at encouraging private capital to enter industry, was increased from ID8m. to ID10m.

Despite all the encouragement given to the development of private industry it was only in the public sector that appreciable progress was made, though a cigarette factory in Sulaymaniya was the only major project reported to have been completed. Planning and execution of the various enterprises envisaged in the agreements with the USSR in 1959 and Czechoslovakia in 1960 continued. (Details on pp 296-9.) Tenders were also awarded to US, Dutch and Swiss firms. Planning started on various state-owned enterprises, among them a reed paper mill, the Sulaymaniya sugar refinery and the Kufa shoe plant.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

Official figures showed that industrial production in the private sector retained its lead over the public sector but neither showed much advance: the value of production in the private sector rose from ID80.0m. in 1960 to ID85.4m. in 1961, and the number of workers from 83,000 to 88,000; in the public sector the value increased from ID23.1m. to ID24.5m. and the number of workers rose from 22,000 to 23,000.

For industry in the Five-Year Plan—see below.

Oil. The output of crude oil continued to increase, though at a slower rate:

CRUDE OIL OUTPUT IN IRAQ

Year	Tons (m)	Rate of growth
1959	41.8
1960	47.5	14%
1961	49.0	3¼%

The 3¼% growth of Iraqi output in 1961 compared with a 7% growth in the Middle East at large. All oil continued to be produced by the IPC and its subsidiaries, except for about 0.5m. tons in the Naft Khaneh field of the state-owned Khanaqin oil company.

The drastic slow-down in the rate of growth was thought to be due to the increase in port dues at Basra and to Qasim's general policy as exemplified in the negotiations with the IPC (pp 291-2). Oil royalties decreased from ID95.1m. in 1960 to ID94.8m. in 1961 because posted prices fell by 2½ to 6% in August 1960.

Development work by the oil companies continued. The "looping" (i.e. laying parallel pipes along an existing pipe-line by using existing pumps) of the pipe-line from the northern fields to the Mediterranean terminals was completed, increasing their annual marketing capacity from 28m. tons in 1959 to 48m. tons. The construction of the floating oil-harbour in the south also progressed. With the completion of these two projects export capacity would rise to 70m. tons per annum.

Foreign experts invited by the government examined the following projects: The development of the state-managed Khanaqin field in eastern Iraq, the erection of a refinery at Basra, and the expansion of the one at Dawra near Baghdad. A tender was issued for the laying of the first section of a pipe-line from Khanaqin to the K3 pumping station of the IPC's Kirkuk-Mediterranean pipe-line via Dawra which would enable oil from Khanaqin to be refined at Dawra and exported.

In March the General Petroleum Administration was liquidated and its functions were transferred to the Ministry of Oil Affairs. This step was to streamline administration though political motives were said to have played a part: the desire to deprive the Communist Party of the stronghold it was thought to hold in the General Petroleum Administration.

Budget and Public Finance. Figures for the 1960/61 and 1961/62 budgets appear in the following tables; figures for 1957/8, the last year of the former regime, are included for comparison.

50% of the oil revenue went into the ordinary budget, as compared with 30% under the monarchy. Direct taxation remained low. The increase in the estimated revenue from customs and excise taxes was in part due to the increased tax on petrol, alcoholic beverages and cigarettes, decreed in March.

The Five-Year Plan. The five-year plan for 1961/2-1965/6 was published in Oct. Superseding the interim 5-year plan of 1959, it was intended as the first stage in doubling the national income within 10 years (like the UAR plan for 1960-65).

Annual allocations were estimated at ID97.1m. in 1961/2, ID108.1m. in 1962/3, ID117.6m. in 1963/4, ID119.6m. in 1964/5 and ID113.9m. in 1965/6.

The plan was to be financed from the following sources: (1) oil royalties—ID315.8m.; (2) Soviet and Czechoslovak credits for specified projects—ID77.2m.; (3) profits of local authorities and government undertakings—ID30.8m.; (4) loans, internal and foreign—ID142.5m.

It was intended to increase the percentage of oil royalties spent on development from 50% in 1961 to 56% in 1964 and 60% in 1965 (in comparison with 70% under the monarchy).

The main investments envisaged were:

Industry:—Electricity—ID38.1m.; chemical industries (including caustic soda, ethylene, poly-ethylene, P.V.C., fertilizers, paper, rayon yarn, tyres)—ID36.4m.; textiles—ID23.7m.; metals (including a steel mill and an agricultural machinery factory)—ID17.6m.; Basra oil refinery—ID10.6m.; ceramics and glass—ID6m.; geological surveys—ID4.6m.; oil and gas pipelines—ID4.2m.

Additional sums were earmarked for medicines, various consumer goods, atomic energy projects and a centre for industrial training.

Agriculture:—Water storage—ID14.9m.; irrigation and drainage—ID66.4m.; government farms and tractor stations—ID10.8m.; artesian wells—ID5.8m.; silos—ID3.3m. Communications:—Railways—ID39.8m.; roads and bridges—ID36.4m.; ports and shipping (including the Umm Qasr port project)—ID18.8m.; Baghdad airport—ID11.2m.; broadcasting and television—ID7.6m.; posts and telegraph (mainly telephone) ID3.5m.

Building and Housing:—Ministry of Defence projects—ID30m.; housing schemes and slum clearance—ID24.1m. (including ID10m. for housing army officers in Baghdad); educational institutions—ID13.8m.; hospitals—ID11.6m.; administrative buildings—ID11.6m.; water supply—ID4.2m.; sewage schemes—ID8.0m.; jails—ID2.2m.

Finance and Prices. In 1961 the means of payment amounted to ID110.2m. as compared with ID107m. in 1960, ID114m. in 1959 and ID98m. in 1958. The rate of currency in relation to demand deposits did not significantly change from the two previous years; in 1961 currency totalled ID75.2m. and demand deposits ID35.0m.

According to Iraqi sources, the wholesale index for Baghdad fell from 110 in 1960 to 109 in 1961 (1953=100); in 1958 and 1959 it had been 97 and 106 respectively. On the other hand the Baghdad cost-of-living index rose slightly from 111 in 1960 to 112 in 1961 and the food index—from 117 to 120.

External Trade and Payments. In 1961 the trade deficit (excluding oil) again grew, mainly because imports increased by ID6.7m. over 1960, despite government efforts to limit them.

1961	145,671	7,874	223,100	5,381	236,355

Low agricultural production was the principal factor in the decline of exports, and accounted to some extent for the increase in imports. Apart from oil, the main exports were dates (ID2.6m. in 1961 compared to ID3.5m. in 1960), wool, cement, hides and furs, and cotton. There was a new beginning in the export of grain (ID0.8m.). The main imports were motor vehicles (including tractors) and spare parts, electrical machinery and other mechanical equipment, tea, sugar and grain.

83.7% of imports came from the West (85.5% in 1960). Britain maintained her position as Iraq's chief supplier with 22.2% of the total. Combined exports from Communist countries amounted to 12.3%, as compared with 9.7% in 1960. The best customers for Iraqi exports (excluding oil and re-exports) were Lebanon (14.5%), India (9.7%), the USSR (9.5%), the US (7.3%), Saudi Arabia (6.8%) and China (6.8%).

Social Legislation and Related Matters. The cost-of-living allowance for government employees earning less than ID10 a month was increased from February 1. In Sept the regulations for the protection of women in industry were tightened. Homes were distributed under various government housing schemes and more extensive measures in this field were promised.

Throughout the year there were reports that extensive social legislation was about to be enacted. In January the Acting Minister of Social Affairs envisaged relief on a national scale for the aged, disabled, orphans and poor in general, which would bring their income to a minimum of 120 fils a day in Baghdad, Basra and Mosul, and 100 fils elsewhere. During the latter part of the year, official quarters spoke of plans to replace the 1956 Social Insurance Law. However, by the end of the year no legislation had been enacted.

Education. Considerable progress was made in education. According to Iraqi statistics, in 1961 63% of the population were illiterate. The number of pupils at primary schools had risen from 413,000 to 860,000 since the revolution; at secondary schools "by 147%"; and at colleges etc. from 5,400 to 14,700.

Among the major difficulties and drawbacks of higher education, the President of Baghdad University listed the inadequate preparedness of secondary-school graduates for university demands, the absence of an overall scheme for the constructive absorption of educated youth, and unemployment among graduates in the humanities and agriculture.

THE GOVERNMENT

VIEWS AND POLICIES: INTERNAL AFFAIRS

[Qassim's views on the character of the regime, its aims, and the dangers besetting it had not changed (see MER 1960 pp 232-4). His outlook was optimistic; he strongly stressed the social significance of the July 14 revolution. The chief enemy remained the "imperialists"; during the second half of the year, in the wake of the Kuwait dispute and the Kurdish rising, Qassim's attacks on imperialism became ever more frequent and violent, and these, in contrast to 1960, became in fact the central theme of his statements.]

The Republic Is Safe and Strong. Qassim, Basra, March 26: "We are living in a secure and quiet country..." (INA, March 26)

Qassim, Baghdad, Aug 17: "The Iraq Republic, brothers, is today stronger and more firmly established than ever before. As each day passes our republic... adheres more firmly to order, organization and discipline." (INA, Aug 19)

Qassim, Baghdad, Nov 21: "Stability now prevails in the country." (INA, Nov 21)

Enemies of the Republic Defeated. Qassim, Baghdad, May 6: "Those who have worked against the country's interests are divided into three groups: Some of them worked for the good of imperialism; these... have been defeated and crushed. Another group... were deceived; they have returned to reason... The third group are the opportunists; these will soon return... to cooperate for the sake of God, of the people and of the homeland." (INA, May 7)

Qassim, Darbandi Khan, Nov 23: "The catastrophes and the calamities which befell the country, and which were staged by the imperialists, the rank-splitters and the saboteurs after the revolution, are all but bubbles... rash acts which we have overcome with patience and faith." (INA, Nov 23)

Improving Social Conditions. Qassim, Baghdad, May 24: "The principles of your revolution stipulate that all the poor and needy should enjoy pure water and electricity in every home; each family should own its house." (INA, May 24)

Qassim, Baghdad, Feb 20: "The revolution... has raised the standard of the people... If you follow the trade figures month after month you will notice that they rise. Living conditions are now on a high level; we endeavour to improve them further and help the poor. At present we are working earnestly to do away with slums." (INA, Feb 20)

Social Justice to be Achieved but Not at Expense of the Rich. Qassim, Darbandi Khan, Nov 23: "The blessed July 14 Revolution came for the good of the people; it came to strike at imperialism; it came to establish brotherhood and affection; it came to raise the people's standard; it came to guide the poor and the weak, to make them happy... Our revolution came not to lower the just level of the rich, but to raise the level of the poor to that of the rich." (INA, Nov 23)

National Unity and Freedom of Religion. Qassim, Basra, March 26: "Our country takes care of the interests of all, without partiality or discrimination; in our country [all] other religions are free..." (INA, March 26)

Parties, Sects Contravene National Unity. Qassim, Darbandi Khan, Nov 23: "Do not be disunited in sects and parties; I warn you, if you are divided against the enemy, the imperialists and the traitors lie in wait for you. The country... requires your sincere and continuous efforts, unity and work." (INA, Nov 23)

Imperialists the Root of Evil. Qassim blamed agents of imperialism for the Baghdad drivers' strike in March (INA, April 2) and for the Kurdish rising. (INA, Sept 26)

THE SOVEREIGNTY COUNCIL

[At the beginning of 1961, the Sovereignty Council consisted of only two active members—Lt. Gen. Muhammad Najib ar-Rubay'i as president and Khalid an-Naqshabandi as a member; a third member, Muhammad Mahdi Kubabah, had not made an appearance since Feb 1959, though no formal resignation was ever made public.]

Khalid an-Naqshabandi died at Baghdad on Nov 27. The deceased, a Kurd, was born near Amadiya in 1916. He became an army officer and later joined the civil service. Prior to the Revolution he served as governor of Arbil province. He was appointed a member of the Sovereignty Council on July 14, 1958. (IT, Nov 28, 29)

On Dec 1 PM Qassim, in his capacity as C-in-C of the armed forces, issued a notification announcing that the Sovereignty Council had been re-formed as follows: Lt. Gen. Muhammad Najib ar-Rubay'i—president [no change]; Abd al-Majid Kamūnah and Rashid Arif—members. [Kamūnah, a Shi'i, was born at Karbala in 1911; he joined the civil service and until his promotion to the Council served as a member of the Civil Service Board. Rashid Arif, a Kurd, was born in 1910. A judge, he was appointed shortly after the Revolution as a member of the Court of Cassation, in which capacity he acted as chairman of the Higher Purge Committee of 1958. Both new members had hitherto been quite unknown to the public at large.] (IT, Dec 3)

THE GOVERNMENT

Ministers Criticized as Leftists and Incompetents. In March and April Ath-Thawrah attacked the civilian ministers, singling out the ministers of Planning (Shaybani), Guidance (Samiir), Housing (Rifa'at), and Commerce (Zahawi). These ministers were "doomed to failure"; besides inclining towards Communism, they were incompetent. The Minister of Oil Affairs [Salmān] was explicitly exempted from this criticism and praised for being "imbued with the principles of the revolution." (IT, March 2)

Later Ath-Thawrah criticized the Ministry of Industry [Minister—Abd al-Hamid] for lack of planning and for "manufacturing reports." (IT, April 27)

Reshuffle. On May 14 a Republican Decree, signed by the members of the Sovereignty Council and by the PM, announced the following changes in the Cabinet, in the public interest and according to the suggestions of the PM: Mustafa Ali, the Minister of Justice, and Abbas al-Baldawi, the Minister of Municipalities, were relieved from their posts, each "according to his request" and on grounds of health; Fayal al-Samiir, the Minister of Guidance, was relieved of his post because of his appointment to the cadre of the Foreign Ministry. The following

Adil Jalāl, the Governor of Diyala province—Minister of Agriculture; and Brig. Isma'il Arif, the Minister of Education—acting Minister of Guidance. (IT, May 15)

The portfolio of Agriculture had been in the hands of Brig. Fu'ād Arif, the Minister of State (see MER 1960, p. 235).

[Faysal as-Sāmīr was widely considered leftist, and was attacked as such.] Writing before the reshuffle, Ath-Thamrah said the Ministry of Guidance (as well as that of Housing) had been "a failure from the outset and continued to be filled with opportunists" (quoted in IT, March 2). Sāmīr left Iraq on July 19 to take up his appointment as chargé d'affaires in Jakarta. (IT, July 20)

In July it was reported that Hāshim Jawād, the Foreign Minister, had tendered his resignation to Qasim who refused to accept it; Jawād's step was believed to be connected with the Kuwait crisis. (Manar, Jordan, July 4)

On Oct 1 Brig. Fu'ād Arif was relieved of his post as Minister of State "due to his wish and personal circumstances." [The dismissal at this time may have been related to Arif being a Kurd.] (INA, Oct 2)

Ministry of Oil—Reorganization. A law promulgated on March 7 abolished the General Board of Oil Affairs [established in 1959 and since then under the directorship of Abd al-Fattāh Ibrahīm, the prominent leftist politician and initiator of the abortive Republican party; see MER 1960, p. 244]. In its stead an inter-departmental Oil Board was formed, headed by the Minister of Oil Affairs. An explanatory note said the law aimed at unifying all regulations concerning oil affairs and at ensuring their supervision by the Ministry of Oil, which had been previously impaired by the powers of the Board. (IT, March 8)

[It was widely alleged that an additional reason for the reorganization was the government's desire to remove Abd al-Fattāh Ibrahīm from a post of official authority.]

Criticism of Administration and Civil Service. There was occasional criticism of government administration, efficiency and integrity.

Al-Bayān claimed that the enthusiasm engendered by the revolution was on the wane, as private interests took precedence over public consideration in some government departments; the civil service was growing in numbers, but declining in quality; bribery was rampant and members of the public who refused to comply were penalized (IT, Feb 9). Later in the year the paper claimed that corruption, luxury and indifference, which had characterized the civil service under the monarchy, had gradually returned, mainly because of its great expansion. "In addition to all these there is the distressing government red tape which is causing general resentment and dependency and which encourages maladministration." (IT, Nov 30)

THE ARMY, POLITICAL ASPECTS

Strength and Organization. In 1961 the strength of the Iraqi army was reported as 64,000 officers and men. (Lamethav, Israel, July 4, quot. "British intelligence circles.")

At the end of the year there were four infantry and one armoured divisions; viz: inf. divs. 1, 2, 3, 5 and armoured div. 4. The GOCs at that time were—Brig.

Khalil Sa'id, GOC 1st Div; Brig. Mahmūd Abd ar-Razzāq, GOC 2nd Div; Brig. Abd al-Karīm Muhammad, GOC 3rd Div; Brig. Abd al-Jabbār Sa'di, GOC (acting) 4th Div; Brig. Asim Muhammad Amin, GOC (acting) 5th Div. [Brig. Jawād, GOC 5th Div; was in Europe at the time—Hayat, Aug 15; Bilad, Dec 1] (R. Baghdad, Dec 3 [W 7])

Changes in Command. [In contrast to the previous years of the regime, no major purge was known to have taken place in the army.]

In Jan Col. Hasan Abūdi, OC Mosul district, was relieved of his post, and Brig. Qasim Attār Bāshi, GOC 5th Brigade, took over in addition to his existing command. (Ahali, Jan 27)

On Feb 21 Brig. Abd al-Jabbār Jawād was appointed GOC Fifth Division (Ahali, Feb 22). [He supplanted Maj.-Gen. Ghālīb Abd al-Azīz, who was Asst. CGS.]

In July Brig. Sayyid Hamid Hussein, GOC 1st Div, was relieved of his post and appointed governor of Diyala province. (Akhbar, July 30; IT, Aug 3)

[In all these changes may be detected a security significance. Brig. Jawād was Qasim's brother-in-law. Brig. Hussein was reputed to have aroused Qasim's suspicion by having accumulated in his hands too much power as de facto military ruler over Iraq's seven southern provinces, and being a devout Shi'i in close contact with the religious circles of Karbala and Najaf, he was apparently none too friendly to the regime; a farewell party arranged for Brig. Hussein by Najaf notables was called off "at his personal request" (Akhbar, July 30). Col. Abūdi, on the other hand, was reputedly an active Communist, in an area still smarting under the aftermath of the Shawwāf rebellion.]

In Aug, Brig. Sayyid Hamid Sayyid Hussein, the former Commander of the 1st Division [garrisoning the seven southern provinces of Iraq] took over his new post as Governor of Diyala Province (IT, Aug 3). [Brig. Hamid had been known for his ruthless persecution of Communists in the area of his command. Unsubstantiated but wide-spread rumours had made him a rival, if not a would-be successor, to Qasim, perhaps because his energy matched his military resources.]

SECURITY MEASURES

Curfew Abolished. From Army Day 1961 (Jan 6) night curfew was abolished throughout Iraq. (R. Amman, Jan 7-IMB, Jan 8)

Automatic Weapons Banned. On Jan 25 a comprehensive law regulating the manufacture, possession and bearing of weapons was promulgated. It replaced the law of 1939 and its amendments; the new law was to come into force on April 26 (full text in Bayan, Jan 27). On May 14 a clarification of the law was to come into effect; it defined "automatic weapons" as "war weapons," and hence absolutely forbade their possession and carrying. (INA, May 13)

Ban on Photographs. An order issued on June 1 forbade the taking of photographs in various places, including dung-hills, market-places, ruins, bridges, graveyards, slaughter-houses, oil pipe-lines and military camps. (ANA, June 1 [3])

New Aliens' Residence Law. On June 5 a new aliens' entry and residence law was promulgated replacing the law of 1938, to take effect after three months. The law gave wide powers to the directors of public security; the power to delay the departure of an alien was vested in the Minister of the Interior. (R. Baghdad, June 5 [7])

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PUBLIC

EVALUATION OF THE INTERNAL SITUATION

Following are impressions gained by foreign observers during the course of the year:

General Atmosphere: Insecurity and Apathy. The majority of observers described the atmosphere as charged with suspicion, insecurity and discontent. The varying of nuances, as the year went on, may have been due as much to the differing impressions of the onlookers as to changes in the situation.

An impression published in Jan [though possibly gained in part at the end of 1960] was that "...from the moment your aircraft lands... you feel yourself enveloped in a world of fear, suspicion and conflict. Army officers and green uniformed police dominate the scene." "Bitterness and disillusionment" were everywhere. Political arrests were common, phones tapped and letters opened. All the same, critical and derogatory remarks directed against the regime and Qasim personally were frequently made without particular fear of consequences—a phenomenon "startling in a police state" for which the observer offered no explanation (Sunday Times, Jan 29). Another report, from the same period, also mentioned that "people talk with less fear" and added that "the atmosphere in Iraq is saner"; it should, however, be mentioned that the comparison was with the beginning of 1959, when

Communist influence was at its peak. (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15)

The atmosphere at Mosul was found to be especially oppressive. Here public security was in a state of deterioration ever since the Shawwāf mutiny of March 1959. Communist atrocities perpetrated during the aftermath of that affair were "still fresh in the public mind and the Nationalists are not willing to wait for the police to act"; in consequence the murder of leftists was an almost daily occurrence. The population was "living in a state of extreme fear." "Even doctors refuse to answer calls at night." Several businessmen interviewed by the observers said that "the situation was so extremely explosive that they were afraid that the violence might spread into large-scale killings." (Aidan Crawley and Virginia Cowles, Sunday Times, Jan 29)

A report published in July mentioned "significant signs of unrest... directed as much against worsening economic conditions as the strange Messianic posturings of Qasim," and stressed in this connection the "excise riots" (taxi-drivers' riots) at Baghdad in March, the "collapse of farming" and the dissipation of oil revenues. However, this report said that "no one is prepared to speak out openly and condemn the PM." (Colin Jackson in Irish Times, July 18)

Later reports commented on the lack of popular enthusiasm for the July 14 celebrations (Daily Telegraph, July 13; NYT, July 23; Guardian, Aug 1). The Guardian analyzed the atmosphere prevailing in Baghdad at that time as one of dejection caused, in the main, by "the revolution's lack of direction"; "now that the revolution has let off the old anti-imperialist head of steam, nobody is sure what the next step should be." Qasim no more than others. Apathy resulted. (David Holden, Guardian, Aug 1)

Apathy and inertia, too, were the prevailing sentiments among the Iraqi public towards the end of the year, according to The Economist, due to a lack of "enthusiasm for Qasim's method" and wide-spread disbelief in his capability (see also below). This indifference existed side by side with "the barricade of the army, the secret police and ... stringent security arrangements." (Economist, Nov 4)

Qasim's Personality, Cult, Tactics, Diminished Standing. On the whole, Qasim's standing was regarded as low.

There was a general feeling that Qasim lived in a world of his own, divorced from reality. His "piercing wild eyes ... with his curious fixed smile" (Irish Times, July 18) seemed a key-note to more than his physical appearance alone. One observer was impressed by his inability, or unwillingness, during an interview to "grapple with a single question" put to him, staring all the time into vacancy; in consequence, the reporter "could understand not only the political uncertainty but the economic confusion that prevails in Iraq." (Sunday Times, Jan 29)

In Baghdad the officially-inspired Qasim cult was as prominent as ever. His picture was posted on almost every billboard, sometimes "four identical portraits on the same wall," and appeared on triumphal arches and restaurant menus. A new song proclaimed "Oh Karim, He Restored Our Glory." A patriotic sketch broadcast for Revolution Day depicted him slaying with a white sword the villains Imperialism, Treason and Israel. His official appellation was "The Faithful Leader." (Sunday Times, Jan 29; Daily Telegraph, Feb 15; Irish Times, July 18; Newsweek, July 24; Guardian, Aug 1; see also MER 1960, p 236.)

However, as an Iraqi told a British reporter, "the Leader is not popular" (Sunday Times, Jan 29); this conclusion appeared to be universally accepted, though one observer thought that Qasim's prestige, in contrast to his popularity, was higher than in 1959, owing to the recession of Communism, a more competent civil service and his handling of the recent Arab League conference in Baghdad (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15). In general, Qasim's diminished standing was considered due to his lack of administrative talent, his ignorance of economics, his clemency towards convicted Communists (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15); some thought him "a man incapable of rational thought whose only conspicuous talent lies in the field of conspiracy and intrigue" (Sunday Times, Jan 29). One reporter stated that many Iraqis doubted his sanity (Guardian, July 13). The Kurdish rising harmed his position. (Financial Times, Sept 15)

There was a consensus of opinion that Qasim maintained his rule mainly by manoeuvring between opposing political forces, restrictive measures, judiciously applied gestures of encouragement and a complex system of mutual control. Thus, "when he appoints a provincial governor who is a Nationalist, he invariably gives him a military commander who is a Communist" (Sunday Times, Jan 29; NYT, July 13; Newsweek, July 24). The loyalty of the army was, of course, indispensable to Qasim's existence; though disaffected, mainly nationalist, elements were no doubt present there as well. Qasim seemed able to rely on his intelligence service to forestall any attempted coup against him (Scotsman, Jan 14; NYT, July 23). A feeling among the public that a change of regime might be for the worse was a factor in Qasim's favour (Guardian, Aug 1). The secession of Syria from the UAR was seen, five weeks after the event, as strengthening Qasim's position only marginally. (Economist, Nov 4)

Communists, Nationalists and Centre. The general impression was that "the political parties have no scope for activity. Qasim does not wish it." (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15)

There was a consensus of opinion that the Communists were out of favour with the authorities, harassed, driven underground and incapable of endangering the regime for the time being. The general public would not forget their excesses during the first year after the revolution; in Mosul and its vicinity, anti-Communist hysteria had reached the point where it was "dangerous for anyone to appear in the streets wearing red" (Irish Times, July 18). Trade unions and front organizations also experienced the chicanery to which the Communists were subjected.

Qasim's personal attitude was seen as more ambiguous. Though he had been chiefly responsible for denying victory to the Communists in 1959, and had not seriously tried to impede the anti-Communist tide since then, he needed the Communist support against the nationalists, his more implacable enemies. One British observer called him "a moderate nationalist with a sneaking sympathy for Communists." (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15)

At the same time the Communists were held to be the best organized political body in Iraq, too well entrenched to be eliminated. They were lying low; their feeling that they were in no position to take over, and their dread of a nationalist upsurge, made them acquiesce in Qasim's regime with all its drawbacks. The licensed Communist party of Da'ud al-Salhi was regarded as a worthless tool of Qasim. (Washington Post, Jan 29; Time, Feb 10; Daily Worker, Feb 28; Financial Times, May 12; Irish Times, July 18; NYT, July 23; Guardian, Aug 1; Economist, Nov 4)

Observers did not profess to know very much about the nationalists. Popular feeling in favour of union with the UAR expressed itself in Baghdad on the occasion of the arrival of the UAR Foreign Minister to attend the Arab League Meeting in Jan (Time, Feb 10). An underground "Nationalist Front," still uncommitted, was reported as having been "recently" formed by three nationalist groups, which were not further defined (Financial Times, May 12). A later report mentioned the Ba'ath and the "pro-Nasser Arab Nationalists" as working together (Scotsman, Oct 28). All nationalists were fanatically anti-Communist. Opinions were divided as to whether they were a match for the Communists in influence and popular strength, as distinct from organization (Monde, Feb 5; Irish Times, July 18; Scotsman, Oct 28) but there seemed to be an impression that Nationalists were growing stronger and the Communists weaker. (Financial Times, May 12)

The centre parties were seen as ineffective, partially because of the split in the National Democratic camp, but chiefly because of the generally unfavourable atmosphere. (Guardian, Aug 1; Scotsman, Oct 28)

Outlook. Observers were wary of forecasts, but feelings as regards Qasim's chances of survival seemed to be divided. Since he had confounded prophets of woe so often, there was no cogent reason why he should not go on doing so for an indefinite time. (Daily Telegraph, Feb 15)

In the summer The Economist saw hope for the regime in its recent Arab policy, for which it gave chief credit to Hashim Jawad, the Foreign Minister (Economist, June 3). The Financial Times too struck a cautiously optimistic note, suggesting that the Iraqi economy "has begun to find its feet" (Financial Times, Sept 15). Most observers gave gloomy forecasts, implying that they did not see how Qasim could maintain his rule much longer (Sunday Times, Jan 29; Irish Times, July 18; Newsweek, July 24; Guardian, Aug 1; Economist, Nov 4). The Kurdish rising further darkened the prospect. Thus The Economist commented: "The danger of a better organized, more united Kurdish rebellion has been postponed, not ended; and General Qasim will probably find that having been brutal once, he has no alternative but to be brutal again." (Economist, Nov 4)

THE DEMAND FOR CIVIL LIBERTIES CRITICISM OF THE REGIME

[Throughout the year, public opinion—channelled through the press—demanded the implementation of civil liberties: parties, freedom of the press and opinion, abolition of military government, rule of law, and above all, a constitution. Although these requests implied, and sometimes directly expressed, dissatisfaction with the regime, the government allowed the press considerable latitude; only Qasim was sacrosanct. In response, Qasim gave repeated assurances that a permanent constitution was about to be granted.]

Demand for Constitution. In Jan Al-Bayān [National Progressive party] asked for the speedy promulgation of a permanent constitution to restore political stability and enable parties to fulfil their obligations to the public (Quot. in IT, Jan 20). (The same request, similarly based, appeared inter alia in Sawt al-Ahrār [leftist], Jan 30; Ath-Thawrah [nationalist—pro-Qasim], March 13, Aug 9; Al-Ahali [National Democratic party], Oct 5; Al-Bayān, Nov 10.)

Government Promises. [Qasim continually gave the impression that this request for a constitution would be met. Following are some examples:] On Feb 20 he said "soon the national parliament will emerge." (INA, Feb 20)

In March it was reported that in July Qasim would open the new General Assembly building in Karradat Maryam (IT, March 24). [The ceremony did not take place.]

On Nov 12 Qasim declared that the drafting of the constitution would commence within the next few days (IT, Nov 15) and on Nov 23 he said that within a few weeks the constitution would be promulgated, and elections would be held for the National Assembly. (IT, Nov 24)

In Dec it was reported that the government had asked several countries for the texts of their constitutions, for reference, and that it would shortly set up a committee to draft the constitution (Zaman, Dec 16, 19). On Dec 19 an official source said that the members of the committee would be announced before Army Day, Jan 6, 1962. The government would submit a draft, which the committee might amend, or exchange altogether for a new draft (IT, Dec 20). [No such steps were taken.]

Demand for Party Freedom and Elections. Various papers stressed the importance of political parties for a healthy national life and demanded their restoration; see, e.g.: Sawt al-Ahrār [leftist], Jan 30; Al-Ahali [NDP], Jan 16, Feb 28, Oct 5; Al-Bayān [NPP], Jan 28, Aug 10; Ath-Thawrah [Nationalist pro-Qasim], March 13, Aug 9; Al-Mabddā [Communist], Dec 9.

Al-Bayān analyzed the current political situation in Iraq as a vacuum created by the failure of extremist groups, which in turn had tried to capture the state by violence after the Revolution; it was for democracy to fill this vacuum. (IT, March 12 quot. Bayan)

The paper accused reactionary elements of having shed all restraint in their endeavour to regain their influence. "It has been established that some heads of sensitive government departments are demonstrating hostility to officials who are members of recognized parties wishing to cooperate ... for attaining the objects of the Revolution." (IT, July 31 quot. Bayan)

Against Military Government. Military government, and its instruments—the Special Military High Court ("Mahdawi's Court") and the two Military Courts—were attacked as being no longer necessary (IT, Feb 10, quot. Siyasi al-Jadid; IT, Feb 23 quot. Bayan; Ahali, March 1). Al-Bayān also demanded relaxation of the aliens regulations which were vexatious, unnecessary and harmful to the Iraqi economy. (Bayan, Jan 25)

Protest Memorandum Handed to Qasim. In May a [pro-UAR] source reported that the presidents of four professional associations—lawyers', engineers', doctors', teachers'—had handed Qasim a memorandum sharply protesting against the character of the regime. They said it was dictatorial, abusive of the rights of the individual, forgetful of its promises, wasteful, and isolationist in regard to the Arab world. Qasim had received the applicants and, having discussed their grievances, had demanded that their démarche should not be published. Its text had subsequently been posted clandestinely in the streets of Baghdad. [The associations mentioned had recently moved from leftist to "nationalist" leadership; see below: Semi-Political Associations, and MER 1960, p. 255.] (Hawadith, Beirut, May 12)

THE TAXI DRIVERS' RIOTS

[The only serious disturbance of the peace in 1961—besides the Kurdish troubles—took place towards the end of March when Baghdad taxi-cab drivers rioted for two days, after an increase in the excise duty on petrol. Both nationalist and leftist opponents of the regime fanned the flames. There were a number of fatal casualties, and demonstrators—not all of them taxi drivers—were still in prison at the beginning of May.]

In mid-Sept there were 5,000 registered taxi-cabs in Baghdad province. (INA, Oct 7)

Excise Duties Raised. On March 23 an amendment to the excise law raised the retail price of petrol, lubricants, tobacco products and alcoholic drinks by 10% to 25%; the excise on kerosene and diesel oil was not affected. The Minister of Finance explained that the increases were in the public interest, since tobacco and alcohol were unhealthy, bus fares remained unchanged and patrons of taxi-cabs could pay more in any case. (IT, March 24, 27)

Iraqi Press Comment. Khabāt, Sawt al-Ahrār, Al-Ahālī and Al-Fajr al-Jadīd criticized the new duties; the last-mentioned paper claimed that the raising of petrol and tobacco duties was anti-social but supported the increase in the excise on alcoholic beverages. (IT, March 28, 29)

On the other hand, Ath-Thawrah (writing after the riots) wrote that the tax increases were moderate and in the public interest. (IT, March 30)

The Riots. [On the morning of March 28 riots broke out in the (nationalist-inclined) A'zamiya quarter of Baghdad. The authorities maintained strict censorship but the gist of events is clear from the following statement.]

On March 28 the Military Governor General issued a proclamation in which he stated that the agents of imperialism were exploiting "slight increases" in the excise duty on petrol to incite "simple people and children" to join them in "anarchist acts" in order to obstruct the operation of motorized traffic. The citizens were called upon to concentrate on their daily tasks and to inform the authorities of all breaches of the peace. No assembly of seven people and over could take place except by special permit and the carrying of all firearms and other weapons was forbidden in Baghdad province (IT, March 29). The same day (March 28) the Military Governor General assured shopkeepers of his full protection against "anarchists and rioters" who might force them to close their premises. (IT, March 30)

The same day curfew was imposed on A'zamiya from 4 pm until further notice. Troops were instructed to fire on any person violating the curfew. On March 30 curfew was imposed from 4 pm till 11 am. (IT, March 29, 31)

Lebanese sources reported riots in Baghdad, in the A'zamiya, Karrada ash-Sharqiya and Hindiya quarters. The taxi-drivers went out in demonstrations, burned a bus and overturned several private cars; they were joined by students and others. Clashes took place with the police, and the army intervened. (R. Beirut, March 29—IMB, March 29; Mid. Mir., April 1, 8)

Casualties were variously given as three dead—"all from firearms discharged by civilians"—(Thawrah, April 25), and seven dead and 100 wounded (NYT, April 1) and 19 students dead as well as 40 wounded. (Mid. Mir., April 8)

On April 9 the authorities relaxed the curfew, and on April 16 it was totally lifted (IT, April 10, 17). Seventy students who had been detained after being involved in the riots were released on May 17. (Jihad, Jordan, May 18)

Political Backers. During the rioting Communists and nationalists were said to have "acted in concert in protest against the army for the first time since the revolution" (Mid. Mir., April 8). Sources variously stressed the part played by the nationalists (Mid. Mir., April 1) and by the Communists. (Thawrah, March 30, April 2, 5)

Khabāt reported that students' and workers' organizations [under Communist control] had called on "newspapers and parties" to express solidarity with the taxi-drivers. (IT, March 29)

Of the Iraqi newspapers, Khabāt and Al-Ahd al-Jadīd implied sympathy with the striking taxi-drivers (IT, March 29, April 2); Ath-Thawrah, while disapproving of their action, said that they had been exploited by "anarchists." (IT, March 30)

LENIENCY TO OPPONENTS

[Throughout the year, but especially in its second half, Qasim showed conspicuous leniency to opponents, except

Communists, who had been convicted or otherwise penalized; probably he now thought them less dangerous and wished to ease the atmosphere.]

General. In honour of July 14, Qasim reduced all prison sentences by 10%. (Zaman, July 11)

On order from Qasim, a committee was set up at the Ministry of Defence to investigate the problem of detainees; by the end of Aug. 140 persons were reported to have already been set free as a result of the committee's recommendations (Ahālī, Sept 1) and in Oct their number was given as 485. (Menar, Jordan, Oct 10 quot. Ahd al-Jadīd)

On Oct 24 it was officially announced that "in fulfilment of the desire of Qasim," there was not a single political detainee anywhere in the country (IT, Oct 25). [However, a good number of Communists—if no others—were at the time in prison. See under: The Communist Party, below.]

Leniency to Prominent Personalities of the Old Regime. In March the order impounding the property of the following personalities of the old regime was lifted: Darwish al-Haydari [former Director General of the Ministry of Agriculture], Abdallah al-Damallūji [former Ambassador], Ahmad ar-Rāwī [former Senator and Ambassador], and Yahya Qasim [liberal politician, editor of Ash-Sha'ab daily]. (IT, March 5)

On the occasion of July 14, Qasim ordered the release from prison of a number of prominent politicians and high army officers of the old regime. Politicians: Ahmad Mukhtar Babān, Muhammad Fādīl al-Jamālī, Tawfīq as-Suwaydī, [all former PM's] Burhān ad-Dīn Basha yān, Khalīl Kannah [former ministers] and Ibrahīm Hasan [former Ambassador to Cairo] (Zaman, July 14); Jamālī left for Lebanon after his discharge (Akhbar al-Usbu', Jordan, July 18). Officers: Lt.-Gen. Muhammad Rafiq Arif, last CGS under the monarchy, Maj.-Gen. Umar Ali, former GOC 1st Div., Maj.-Gen. Wafiq Arif, former GOC 1st Corps, and Maj.-Gen. Ahmad Mar'i, former Director of Military Intelligence. [These officers were released on the occasion of July 14; later they were reinstated in the army with full rights, but not returned to active service. This decree was considered a response by Qasim to the wishes of army circles. (R. Beirut, Sept 3 [5])]

In Sept, Diyā' Ja'far, another minister under the old regime, was permitted to return to Iraq; he had been abroad during the revolution. (Jihad, Jordan, Sept 4)

It was believed that by July Qasim had already set free almost all the adherents of the old regime who had been arrested after the revolution. (Falastin, Jordan, July 16)

Taha al-Hāshimī Honoured Posthumously. On June 12, Marīah Taha al-Hāshimī died in London. His body was brought to Baghdad for the interment, at which Qasim was represented. The Iraqi press stressed in its obituaries the deceased's military and literary achievements (IT, June 13, 19, 20), [without, however, mentioning his role during the monarchy, when he served for a long time as Chief of Staff and minister. He served as PM on the eve of the Rashīd Ali al-Kaylānī coup in 1941 for two months at the end of which he was forced by the insurgents to resign, his attempts to reconcile the warring factions having failed. Hāshimī was also well-known for his writings on Iraqi geographical and military topics.]

Nationalists—Kaylānī, Arif, Pardoned. In May Abd ar-Rahīm ar-Rāwī, who had been sentenced to death [early in 1959) for his part in the abortive plot of Rashid Ali al-Kaylani in Dec 1958 and whose sentence Qasim had later commuted to five years' imprisonment, was released on amnesty (IT, May 31). Kaylani himself was released from prison in July (IT, July 18). In Sept the order impounding the property of Kaylani and Rawi was lifted. (IT, Sept 11)

[A major step in Qasim's policy of leniency was the pardon of Col. Abd al-Salam Arif. Arif had cooperated with Qasim in the 1958 coup d'état and during the first weeks of the regime became his second-in-command as deputy C-in-C of the armed forces, deputy PM and deputy Minister of the Interior. Soon, however, Arif revealed himself as an ardent partisan of President Abdel Nasser and of union with the UAR, in contradiction to Qasim's policies. He was demoted, and sent as Ambassador to Bonn, whence he returned without permission. In Dec 1958, in a secret trial, he was sentenced to death for a plot against Qasim and kept in prison ever since.]

On Nov 25 Qasim revoked Arif's death sentence, ordered his release and revoked his dismissal from the army. (Akhbar, Nov 26)

In a press interview, Arif said that on his release from prison he was with Qasim from mid-day on Nov 25 until 5 am the next day when Qasim took him for a tour of Baghdad and personally escorted him home. Qasim was still his brother, he said, as brothers remained brothers forever; all [evil] was forgotten and he expressed his thanks to Qasim. (Taqaddum, Nov 27)

Qasim ordered Arif to be paid over ID5,000 in pension arrears, as well as his house rent for the years he spent under arrest. (BBC in Arabic, Dec 13-14MB, Dec 14)

Nationalists—Shawwaf Plotters, Ba'athists Pardoned, Sweeping Amnesty. On Dec 2 Qasim ordered the release from prison of Munir Fahmi al-Jarrâh, Ibrahim Ali al-Kaylani, Muhammad Sa'ad ash-Shaykh and Yunis Attâr Bâshi, who had been sentenced by the Special High Military Court ["Mahdawi's Court"] for their part in the Shawwaf rebellion of March 1959. (IT, Dec 3)

At the same time, the authorities freed the assets and property of retired Brig. Najî Tâlib since he had returned to Iraq and the reasons for impounding his assets no longer existed. [Tâlib, a leader of the Iraqi Ba'ath party, had served in Qasim's first Cabinet as Minister of Social Affairs. He fled to Lebanon after his attempt on Qasim's life in Oct 1959.] (IT, Dec 5)

On Dec 4 (the morrow of "Safety Day") Qasim issued three proclamations providing for a far-reaching amnesty. The five persons [Ba'athists] sentenced to death on Feb 25 1960 (see MER 1960, p 247) for their part in the attempt on Qasim's life—Iyâd Sa'îd Thâbit, Khâlid Ali Sâlih, Hamid Mar'i, Salim Isa az-Zibâq and Ahmad Taha al-Azzûz—were ordered to be released forthwith. Mar'i, a Syrian, was to be deported. (INA, IT, Dec 5; Ahd al-Jadid, Dec 7)

All other death sentences passed by civil and military courts were commuted to 15 years' imprisonment. Prison sentences were reduced by half. "Internees, detainees and deportees for security reasons" were to be released. The amnesty was not to apply to fugitives from the law (INA, IT, Dec 5). In consequence of the amnesty, 600 out of 900 prisoners were released from the central prison at Baghdad; at Baquba 150 prisoners were freed. (IT, Dec 7)

Forty-two persons under sentence of death were reprieved under the amnesty. (IT, Dec 10)

[A number of Communist leaders, who had been detained during the year, were not released. See also below: Arrests of Communist Leaders.]

Festivals. [By 1961 an all year-round cycle of festivals glorifying the regime had been established.]

Army-Day. Jan 6 was declared an official holiday (IT, Jan 4). [On Jan 6, 1921 the Iraqi army was established.]

March 24, the anniversary of Iraq's withdrawal from the Baghdad Pact [in 1959] was celebrated as Freedom Day throughout the country. (IT, March 24)

May 1, Labour Day was again kept as an official holiday. In a two-hour address at a rally in Baghdad, Qasim stressed the regime's striving for social justice. He announced that a social security law was being drafted and would be implemented "at a favourable opportunity." [There was no reference to the traditional significance of May Day.] (IT, May 1, 3-5)

July 14, Revolution Day passed without untoward incidents, though under heavy security precautions maintained by the army (IT, July 15; Times, July 16). As in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 237) the authorities warned that no deviation should be made during the processions from the slogans and cheers authorized by the authorities (IT, July 7). The 38 "national" slogans praised Qasim and the July 14 revolution, underlined the progress made in Iraqi society and economy and abused imperialism and its works in Palestine, Algeria, Southern Arabia and Kuwait. (For details see IT, July 9.)

Dec 3, Safety Day (id al-salâmah wa al-ibtihâth), the second anniversary of Qasim's return from hospital after the assassination attempt of Oct 7, 1959, was again celebrated all over Iraq as a public holiday. (IT, Dec 5)

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PARTIES

THE COMMUNISTS

(Ittihad ash-sha'ab)

Synopsis. [The Iraqi Communist party, which in 1960 had changed its name to Ittihad ash-Sha'ab (IS) but failed to secure a licence under either the old or the new name, continued its existence underground throughout the year. The authorities harassed the Communists relentlessly and continued to wrest from their control trade unions and other public associations. (See below: The Government and Semi-Political Associations.)

The Communists themselves seemed to have believed that Qasim personally was less hostile. Consequently, their attitude to the regime was ambivalent. They recognized its hostility and drew the consequences, ideological, polemical and organizational; on the other hand, they made it clear that for the time being they saw no alternative.

Anti-Communist sources reported unsubstantiated dissensions within the party.

The legal Communist party, headed by Da'ud as-Sā'igh, which had been established in 1960 with official encouragement, dragged on its existence. Towards the end of the year there were indications of some kind of understanding with the IS.]

In Sept a Western observer said that "although the Communists are still better organized and more united than any other political group, no one seriously expects them to be able to seize power." (Financial Times, Sept 15)

Communists Support Qasim Despite Persecution. In May a Western observer noted that the Communists were one of the few groups which still supported Qasim, though in the preceding 18 months he had clearly shown that he regarded them as a danger and had arrested many of them; yet the Communists understood that if Qasim were to go, in the present mood of the Iraqi public (for which see below: Anti-Communist Atmosphere) they would be eliminated altogether. (Irish Times, July 18)

Party Leadership; Internal Disensions. In Feb it was reported "on good authority" that a serious split had developed within the IS leadership and that there was a movement to expel the leaders of the dominant pro-Soviet faction. The names given were Hussein Radawi, Amir Abdallah, Abd al-Qādir Isma'īl, Jamāl al-Haydari, Baha ad-Din Nūri, Hussein Sūltān, Muḥammad Sāliḥ al-Abīlī [sic] and Nāsir Abū. (IT, Feb 27 quot. Muṭaḥḥal)

[The party pseudonym of Hussein Radawi, sometimes spelt Rādī, was Salām Adil.] Under the latter name he participated as "First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Iraqi Communist Party" in the 22nd Congress of the CPSU in Moscow, in Oct (Pravda, Oct 25). (In 1960 Radawi (Rādī) appeared on the list of sponsors headed by Zaki Khayrī of the ICP's application, under the Associations Law; see MER 1960, p 239.)

In Nov a rift in the leadership was again reported, reputedly caused, amongst other reasons, by mutual recriminations that the party had latterly not known how to exploit a propitious situation and that the public had been antagonized by injudicious slogans. The leadership was said to have been composed of Baha ad-Din Nūri—general leadership; Hamzah Salmān—intelligentsia; Sādiq Ja'far al-Falāḥī—workers; and Adnān al-Barrāq—students. Jamāl al-Haydari, former member of the Central Committee, had been dropped. (Sharq, Nov 9)

Communist Critique of Regime: [An article by M. Salim in World Marxist Review of Oct, entitled "Three Years After the Iraqi Revolution," may be taken as reflecting the IS attitude at the time.]

With the 1958 revolution, Salim wrote, power passed into the hands of the "national anti-imperialist bourgeoisie," represented by a group of army officers, but "the working class and the peasants, led by the Communist party, played the cardinal role in the revolution."

"At first," continued Salim, "the Qasim government was obliged to rely on the support of [these] masses," as the republic was in danger from the imperialist powers and pro-imperialist reactionaries. Under these circumstances, the Communists supported Qasim. But after the first year, "the growth of the mass movement... especially in the rural localities" aroused the fears of the national bourgeoisie, which consequently began to repress Communists and democrats. (The article goes on to describe the regime's anti-Communist measures.) At the same time "the ruling group" compromised with the imperialists and sought the support of "reactionaries and monarchists," while the right-wing nationalists "have gone further, turning for help to the Egyptian bourgeoisie, and calling... for an end to the democratic development."

While the national bourgeoisie was not accused of betraying the revolution, it was "inconsistent, hesitant and prone to compromise." (For sources see below.)

Tactic of "Alliance and Struggle." The Communist tactic vis-à-vis the regime, the article continued, was therefore one of "alliance and struggle": alliance in an anti-imperialist front and struggle against "inconsistencies."

The party differentiated between bourgeois groups according to their attitude to imperialism, in keeping with their economic interests. The article criticized the "left tendencies" of those who failed to make these distinctions, struggled against the bourgeoisie as a whole and so "ignored the united front policy," as well as the "defeatist and opportunist opposition," which refrained from combating the reactionary measures of the government because it was anti-imperialist. (For sources see below.)

Policies: Regarding current tactics, the writer made the following points:

The alliance between workers and peasants must be consolidated. The party stood for radical agrarian reform, the regime having given in to the big landowners who coerced the peasants "all the way to the murder of peasant activists."

In view of the regime's increasingly anti-democratic policy, the party must fight for democracy under the slogan: "Build a national administration on democratic foundations."

The party demanded "self-government for the Kurds" but combated "nationalist-extremist tendencies among the Kurds."

The Kuwait question should be solved "in keeping with the freely-expressed will of the people"; Kuwait's liberation from imperialism being the main issue at present.

Solidarity and cooperation with the socialist countries provided the best guarantee for the consolidation and development of Iraq's independence.

"The national front policy is the only salvation for Iraq," the article concluded. This was the road to "a state of national democracy," as outlined in the documents of the Moscow meeting of the 81 parties, and conditions were now favourable for Iraq to become such a state. The masses had become aware of the anti-revolutionist tendencies of the national bourgeoisie, whose prestige was "rapidly declining," and the people were looking for "genuine revolutionary leadership." (W. Marx. Rev., Oct pp 37-43)

Criticism of Social and Economic Conditions. [The Communists were more critical of social and economic conditions than they had ever been since 1958. Herewith follows, a statement, from a leftist source, on the change of attitude, and two petitions for redress, identified by their terminology and sources as Communist-inspired.]

In Oct Saut al-Ahrār recalled that the patriotic (in this context, leftist) press used to gloss over the people's living conditions during the early days of the Republic, for fear of diverting the government from its main task of protecting the revolution. Now, however, the patriotic forces could no longer shut their eyes to the relevance of living conditions to the general political framework. (Quoted in IT, Oct 13.)

In Jan "the masses of Amara" addressed a petition to Qasim with 4,296 signatures, drawing his attention to the following grievances: the lack of doctors, the mounting prices of food and the need for popular housing schemes. (Itiglal, Jan 26)

In Dec a petition bearing 9,467 names and signed "Deputation of the Basra Masses" complained to the authorities about the economic crisis—crop failure, unemployment, and housing conditions—as well as dismissals and detentions. (Mabda', Dec 16)

Clandestine Communist Activities, Demonstrations, Distribution of Leaflets. On Feb 3 a Communist demonstration, about 10,000 strong, took place in Baghdad, ostensibly in support of the FLN but in reality to counterbalance an earlier pro-Nasser demonstration which had welcomed the UAR Foreign Minister. The demonstration was dispersed near the Ministry of Defence by the military, "who showed much more energy than when they faced the nationalist demonstration" [a few days before]. (Monda, Feb 5)

[The distribution of leaflets was a favourite Communist activity throughout the year.]

On April 4 Communist leaflets were distributed in Baghdad, attacking the new excise duties and praising the Al-Itiglal, Al-In'aniyah, Ar-Ra'y al-Amm and Khabat newspapers for their attitude in the matter. (IT, April 12 quot. Ahd al-Jadid)

In July 400 Communist leaflets were confiscated at al-Hāritha [Basra]. (Fajr al-Jadid, July 7)

In Nov two men were arrested in Baghdad while distributing Communist leaflets signed "The organization of sa'at al-qā'idah." [A pre-revolution Iraqi Communist group was known as al-qā'idah.] (ANA, Nov 27 [29])

On Dec 23 a man was arrested for distributing Communist leaflets in the Bab ash-Shaykh quarter. (Ahd al-Jadid, Dec 25)

Government Persecution of Communists and Near-Communists. In Oct. Salām Adil (alias Hussein Radawi) stated at the CPSU congress in Moscow that "at the present time over 50 fighters sentenced to death for displaying heroism in the struggle against reactionary forces" were in prison. "286 valiant fighters—Communists and democrats—were killed in broad daylight." (Pravda, Oct 25)

In Dec a Communist source reported that a "Committee in Defence of Democratic Rights and Liberties in Iraq" had published a pamphlet entitled "Stop the Terror!" which gave figures on "patriots and democrats" persecuted by the Qasim regime and concluded that things were far worse than under Nuri Sa'īd. Between mid-1959 [when the anti-Communist reaction set in] and May 1961, 112 persons had been sentenced to death and 770 to imprisonment by military courts; 7,000 active trade unionists had been "victimized, and many arrested"; 3,260 peasant societies had been denied licences "under various pretexts"; and "democrats" had been made to suffer for the disturbances at Kirkuk (July 1959), which had been "provoked by stooges of oil monopolies." (W. Marx. Rev., Dec)

Liquidation of Communist Cells. The discovery and liquidation of the following Communist cells and hide-outs was reported: at Awayna and at Sarrafīya [Baghdad]; at the latter place Diyāla Maryūsh, "a well-known Communist," was arrested with others (Thawrah, April 25); at Abu al-Khasib [Basra] (Manar, Jordan, May 5 quot. Zaman); at Saraj ad-Din [Baghdad] (Sharg, June 19); at Azamiya [Baghdad] (Thawrah, June 26); the Communist headquarters at Basra, where 40 arrests were made, including "long-sought" Wall Karim (IT, Oct 22); at Mosul, where the membership list of the local committee was found, and arrests carried out accordingly. (Ahd al-Jadid, Nov 29)

At the beginning of May Yahya as-Sa'ūdi, director of television programmes, was suspended for investigation, and five Baghdad radio announcers were dismissed "for the public good." The [nationalist] Al-Fajr al-Jadid welcomed these measures as a step towards a thorough purge of the Ministry of Guidance and hinted that the persons concerned had misused their offices for "propaganda in favour of certain interests" (Fajr al-Jadid, May 4, 9; Akhbar, May 10). [The wording of these comments, as well as the subsequent demotion of the Minister of Guidance, indicate that a purge of leftists was taking place.]

In accordance with the Associations Law 1960, a Basra Court dissolved the Central Sports Union Club and the Mahdāwi Sports Club, both in Basra, since they had ceased to function for over a year. [Both had been centres of Communist and pro-Communist activity during the first year after the Revolution, and had been harassed in 1960 by the local authorities until they suspended their activities.] (IT, Aug 29)

The Ar-Rābiṭah Press at Baghdad was closed by the authorities following a search which produced pro-Communist material (IT, March 6 quot. Mustaqbal). [This press, reputedly the largest in private hands in Iraq, belonged to the leftist politician Abd al-Fatḥ Ibrahim, till lately Director General of the government oil administration (see p 261).] Apparently, the press was later reopened, as the company increased its capital from ID20,000 to ID100,000. (IT, Dec 11)

Arrests of Communist Leaders. [Several Communist and near-Communist leaders were arrested.] At the end of March Muḥammad Mahdī al-Jawāhiri, publisher of [leftist] Ar-Ra'y al-Amm, Khalaf al-Tā'i, editor of [leftist] Al-Itiglal, Kāzim as-Samāwi and Tawfīq al-Aḥsā, publisher and editor of [leftist] Al-In'aniyah, were arrested for inciting to demonstrations during the drivers' strike; Tā'i was deported to Nuqtah Salman prison [near the Saudi Arabian border] (R. Cairo, March 30 quot. Ahd al-Jadid—IMB, March 31; BBC in Arabic, April 1—IMB, April 2). [Samāwi was set free on Aug 8 (Bilad, Aug 9).]

On May 1 a procession organized by the Federation of Trade Unions [then still Communist-led—see below] took place in Baghdad. A permit had been applied for at the beginning of April but was received only after the demonstrations. In consequence, Ali Shukur, Abd al-Qādir Ayyāsh, Khayrān Sālih, Hussein Alwān, Sādiq al-Falāhi and other GFLU leaders were committed to prison on May 2. (Bilad, April 11; Fajr al-Jadid, May 3; a letter of explanation signed by the detainees—Mabda', Oct 7)

In Oct the detainees protested the prison conditions (Mabda', Nov 11). In Dec these and other Communist detainees, including Ma'rūf Barzinji and Abd as-Zahrā' Ghadibān, sent telegrams to Qasim and Maj.-Gen. Abdi praising the recent amnesty [see above: Leniency to Opponents] and asking that their cases also be considered (Mabda', Dec 9; Sawt al-Ahrar, Dec 12). [They were still detained at the end of the year.]

Trials of Communists. [The courts, particularly the military ones, sentenced Communists in great numbers; the charges convey a certain picture of Communist activity. Some typical cases in the first months of the year are quoted below; trials of this character continued unabated until the end of the year.]

On Dec 31, 1960, the secretary of the Union of Commercial Stores Employees at Basra was sentenced in a civil slander suit to six months' "rigorous imprisonment" and ID1,000 damages, payable to the three plaintiffs. [Basra trade union officials at that time were generally Communists.] (IT, Jan 1)

The following is a list of prison sentences passed by military courts: In Jan—a teacher was sentenced to one year for having incited soldiers at the Habaniya military base against Brig. Sadiq Hasan, Commander of the 4th Div. [Brig Hasan was retired in Nov 1960; he was reputedly a "nationalist"; see MER 1960, p 236.] (Zaman, Jan 5); 76 persons to between six months and two years for disturbances at a cement factory in 1960 [during a Communist-organized strike for a wage increase]; 67 were released on bail (Falastin, Jordan, Jan 10); seven Communists to terms of imprisonment for assaulting members of the National Democratic Party (Zaman, Jan 17); in Feb—eight persons to up to 18 months for forcible extraction of contributions for "the illegal Communist Party" (Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 8); the assistant headmaster of Basra school to six months for tearing down a fatwa [religious decree] against Communism from the school wall (Zaman, Feb 14); a villager from Dohuk to three years for Communist propaganda and maintaining that Qasim was a Communist (Zaman, Feb 23); three teachers to six months for spreading rumours among villagers that the government was distributing poisoned wheat; the accused admitted that they had been members of the Ittihad ash-Sha'ab group, but as they were now "reformed" the court decided to defer the sentence (Zaman, Feb 28); in March—six persons to from two to five months for slandering candidates of the Independent list as "spies, traitors and agents of the Anglo-Americans" during elections for the Oil Workers Union in Sept 1960 [the Independent list, which emerged victorious, stood for the anti-Communists; see also MER 1960, p 252] (IT, March 3); six persons charged with assembling to discuss the [banned] book "The Tasks of the Communist Party in the Post-Independence Era" were bound over for one year on ID500 (IT, March 3); an inhabitant of Basra to six months for having in his possession 36 copies of Lenin's speeches (Akhbar, March 12); a "proved anarchist" to one year for having incited workers at a Mosul textile store in Aug 1960 to strike for higher wages. (IT, March 13)

Five persons were remanded for trial in April for inciting peasants to deny landowners their rights in defiance of the law (Mustaqbal, April 19); a similar trial had been held in Jan, involving the secretary of the "Partisans of Peace" branch at Hay (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 20). Three Basra teachers were remanded for trial for spreading Communist propaganda and beating their headmaster, who had tried to argue with them. (Mustaqbal, April 21)

In April an art student was sentenced to three and a half years for being in possession of Communist pamphlets (ANA, April 23 [25]) and another to nine months for having been in possession of Communist party records. (Zaman, April 26)

during the 1959 riots, but death sentences passed were not carried out.]

In Jan leftist papers published editorials and readers' letters urging that death sentences recently passed in connection with the aftermath of the Mosul mutiny (spring 1959; see MER 1960, p 242) be commuted, or that retrials be held (e.g., Bilad, Jan 5; Ittihad, Jan 3, 8, 20). Anti-Communist papers published letters denying that the writers had ever supported such demands (e.g., Zaman, Feb 19; Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 22). Distributors of leaflets attacking the government for holding these trials were arrested. (Falastin, Jordan, Jan 10)

On April 26 three people, including a soldier, were sentenced to death, and six others to various terms of imprisonment, for "dragging" and murdering the district commissioner (qa'imqam), the medical officer and the police commander of Dohuk (Mosul province) in March 1959 (IT, April 27; Falastin, Jordan, April 28). On May 8 four soldiers—one an officer—and a civilian were sentenced to death and four others to long terms of imprisonment for the murder of two Turkomans at Kirkuk during the July 1959 riots there. (IT, May 10)

Leftist Papers Suppressed. On Jan 4 [the leftist] Al-Ittihad analyzed the total volume of notices and advertisements published by the Ministry of Defence in the Baghdad dailies, on the previous day, and alleged discrimination against the leftist press. The published schedule ran: Al-Ittihad; Sawt al-Ahrar; Al-Bilad; Khabat; Al-Siyasi al-Jadid and Al-Akhbar—nil; Al-Fajr al-Jadid—ID13,500; Al-Mustaqbal, Al-Ahadi, Al-Bayan—ID7,500 each; Al-Ahd al-Jadid—ID6,000; Al-Zaman—ID4,500. [All the neglected papers were pro-Communist, with the exemption of Al-Akhbar.] (Ittihad, Jan 4)

Al-Ittihad was closed down by the authorities on or about Jan 25 and was to reappear about March 5. [This may be connected with the above charges.] (Bilad, March 1, 3). [Al-Insaniyah, Ar-Ra'y al-Amm and Al-Ittihad were apparently closed down at the end of March] and their owners and/or editors arrested for supporting the drivers' strike (Mid. Mir., April 1; see also above: Arrest of Communist Leaders). Al-Siyasi al-Jadid had its licence revoked on April 18, no reason being given. (IT, April 20)

During the year the military Governor-General revoked licences of several newspapers, most of which had been closed down during 1960; among them were: Sawt al-Ummah, Ittihad al-Umal, Al-Yaqah, Kifah ash-Sha'ab, Ath-Thaqafah al-Jadidah, Sawt al-Tallah (IT, Aug 7); Ittihad ash-Sha'ab, Sawt al-Akhd, Al-Hadharah (IT, Aug 28); Ash-Shabab, Al-Haqiqah (IT, Aug 8); Nidd' al-Tallah (IT, Oct 31). The last-named had been licensed as a weekly in Feb by the Ministry of Guidance [then still under leftist influence]. (Bilad, Feb 19)

In Oct Mahmud Shawkat, publisher of the leftist paper Ath-Thabir, which had been closed down in Nov 1960 (see MER 1960, p 243), petitioned Qasim, after his appeal had been rejected. (Bilad, Oct 10)

Anti-Communist Atmosphere. [There were reports from various parts of the country of violent popular hatred for the Communists.] A Western observer found that "everybody except the Communists" referred to 1959 as the year of the "Red Terror." (Financial Times, Sept 15)

In Mosul acts of revenge on "the perpetrators of the 1959 massacres" were said to occur almost daily (Hayat, March 14). In Dec a [pro-Communist] daily reported that a women's delegation from Mosul had petitioned

Qassim for "the restoration of security" in their home town (Bi'ad, Dec 28). A Lebanese journalist reported outbursts of hatred against the Communists in the Shi'i region about Karbala, also in reaction to the 1959 Communist atrocities (Hayat, Jan 18). [See also Evaluation of Internal Situation; the Nationalists in General (Disturbances in Mosul); Government and Islam (Anti-Communism Rampant among Shi'is).]

THE IRAQI COMMUNIST PARTY

(Da'ud as-Sa'igh)

Hostility of Right, Left and Government. After it reappeared as a weekly on Feb 4 (see MER 1960, p 244), Al-Mabda', the party organ, complained that it was engulfed by hostility, its ideological growth stunted, and its readers intimidated and insulted in public. Whereas the Right directed its attacks on "democratic movements" in general, the party's enemies on the left (the Ittihad al-Sha'ab Communists) were making hysterical attacks upon it. However, the party was conscious of its mission and would do its duty. (Mabda', Feb 4, 23)

In Oct (?) the authorities at Kut closed the local branch of the [legal] Communist party for being inactive, in accordance with the Associations Law of 1960. (Jihad, Jordan, Oct 11 quot. Ahd al-Jadid)

In Nov, on its second anniversary, Al-Mabda' ascribed the crisis which had beset the paper—and the party—in the previous year to the unfavourable circumstances affecting "the whole democratic movement" in Iraq and the "obstinacy of the reluctant comrades [viz., the leaders of the IS Communists] to join their Communist party." As a result, Al-Mabda' had appeared only 22 times in its second year. (Mabda', Nov 25)

Party Branches, Conventions. The last two months of the year were devoted to internal conferences and elections. At the beginning of Nov Al-Mabda' asked the authorities to expedite the granting of permission for the Baghdad, Arbil and Basra branches to hold meetings so that the party's eight branches might prepare for the party conference (Mabda', Nov 4). On Nov 17 the Baghdad branch elected its nine-man committee, headed by Fālih Hasan (Mabda', Nov 18). On Nov 28 Qassim received Da'ud as-Sa'igh, chairman of the party. (IT, Nov 30)

On Dec 2 the annual conference took place with 120 delegates in attendance [as against 160 in 1960; see MER 1960, p 244]. The following were elected to the executive committee: Da'ud as-Sa'igh—chairman, Sa'ad Muhsin, Ali Hādi, Abd al-Jabbār Mājīd, Ibrahim Abd al-Hussein, Ghaddān Hamzah, Muhammad Jawād Ta'mah, Abd al-Karīm al-Asadi, Umar Sūf, Karīm Nasīf, Zuhayr al-Tā'i, Turkī Abd al-Jafūr, Fālih Hasan, Khalil as-Sālihi, Jāsim Ismā'il, Anwar Taha, Abd al-Jabbār Hasan. (Mabda', Dec 1; Taqaddum, Dec 3)

Towards the end of the year Al-Mabda' published telegrams to Qassim from imprisoned IS Communists (Mabda', Dec 9). [It was not clear whether this indicated a rapprochement between the two groups.]

THE NATIONALISTS IN GENERAL

Synopsis. [The "nationalist" in Iraq could only loosely be defined as those who were sharply anti-Communist and pro-pan-Arab, though not necessarily adherents of Abdel Nasser. Their political organizations were entirely clandestine; strongest among them was apparently the Ba'ath party. The authorities paid them much less hostile attention than in 1960, perhaps because they were considered less dangerous.]

Revival of Pro-Nasser Influences. In July a Western observer said that "any visitor to Baghdad now must notice the revival in the influence of the pro-Nasser forces," at a time when Communist influence was at an all-time low. (Irish Times, July 18)

"Nationalist Front" Formed. In May three "young nationalist groups" were reported "recently" to have formed an underground Nationalist Front, based on common opposition to the Communists and to Qassim, their former supporter, and on a desire for closer links with the UAR. The Front was said to be as yet ill-cemented and undecided on what approach to make to Abdel Nasser if Qassim were to be overthrown. [The three constituent groups were not further defined.] (Financial Times, May 12)

Towards the end of the year, three underground anti-Communist parties were said to have been conspiring for Qassim's overthrow: the Istiqlāl, the Ba'ath and the "pro-Nasser Arab Nationalists [al-qawmiyyūn al-arab] who have links with Syria." (Scotsman, Oct 28)

"Party of the Arab Struggle" (hizb al-kifāh al-arabi). Among the messages of support received by Qassim for his Kuwait policy was one from "the prisoners convicted in the case of the Arab Struggle Party" (see MER 1960, p 250). The cable concluded "Death to all those who stand in the face of liberation from enslavement." (IT, July 10)

Various Nationalist and Pro-UAR Manifestations. On Jan 29 the UAR Foreign Minister on his arrival at Baghdad for the Arab League session was received by an "enthusiastic crowd," estimated by one source as 10,000 people, shouting "union under Abdel Nasser soon!" (R. Beirut, Feb 5—IMB, Feb 6; Time, Feb 10)

In March 171 teachers at Baghdad University urged Qassim to purge the university of "opportunists" and "party politicians preaching the class struggle" who were threatening the country with disaster. (Manar, Jordan, March 9)

On Sept 23, Qassim announced the elimination of a spy cell, which had attempted to stage a symbolic funeral at Azamiya on Sept 20 in support of Arab nationalism and "those who were executed for participation in a rebellion against the safety of Iraq" [obviously a reference to the officers who were hanged on Sept 20, 1959, for their part in the Shawwāf mutiny]. (IT, Sept 28)

In Oct, the Medical, Lawyers, Writers, Teachers and Economists associations strongly condemned "the group of traitors, agents of imperialism, slaves of gold, opportunists and other reactionary elements" as responsible for the dissolution of the UAR (IT, Oct 3); the same associations addressed a memorandum to Qassim strongly criticizing the government, inter alia, for its isolationist Arab policy. [The above-mentioned associations were by this time all "nationalist" led.]

In Nov eight fugitives were ordered to appear before a Military Court on a charge of forming a clandestine organization and distributing leaflets. [The address of six of them was given as Azamiya, the solidly nationalist quarter of Baghdad.] (IT, Nov 5)

Disturbances in Mosul. In March it was reported that not a day passed in the north of Iraq without an act of revenge on "the perpetrators of the 1959 massacres" [a term widely held to stand for the Communists]. (Hayat, March 14)

At the end of the year, it was reported that many women's delegations from Mosul had latterly called upon the authorities at Baghdad, to ask for the suppression of "unlawful occurrences" in their hometown, and for the restoration of security and stability (Biad, Dec 28). [The source and general context suggest that the delegations were complaining of anti-Communist violence.]

The Government and the Nationalist Press. The whole "nationalist" press increasingly and violently attacked the Iraqi Communists (see especially Ath-Thawrah, Al-Fajr al-Jadid, Al-Mustaqbal, passim).

On Jan 22 a new daily, Ash-Sharg [which proved to be sharply anti-Communist], first appeared. (Akhbar, Jan 21; Istiqal, Jan 23)

Ath-Thawrah [violently anti-Communist and sympathetic to Arab nationalism, but professing loyalty to Qasim] reappeared on Feb 16, having gone into "voluntary suspension" on Sept 20, 1960, because of "savagely Communist attacks" (Thawrah, Feb 16; IT, Feb 17; see also MER 1960, p 248-9). In May Ath-Thawrah again "voluntarily suspended publication" for three days, after its editor Yunis at-Tā'i had been called upon to explain to the authorities an article which appeared on April 25. (Ahd al-Jadid, April 27; ANA, May 21 [23])

Among the papers the licences of which were withdrawn by the Military Governor-General during 1961, after having ceased publication earlier, were the following nationalist organs: Al-Watani, Al-Hiyad (IT, Aug 7); Al-Hurriyah, Al-Fayha' (IT, Aug 22). [Al-Fayha' of Hilla was closed down after publishing on Oct 16, 1960, a statement by the Islamic party sharply attacking Qasim; see MER 1960, p 249.]

The authorities suspended [the nationalist] daily Al-Fajr al-Jadid as from Oct 26 (IT, Oct 27). [Contrary to official Iraqi government policy, the paper had continuously accused the new Syrian leadership of betraying the Arab cause.]

THE BA'ATH PARTY

(hizb al-ba'ath al-arabi al-istirdaki)

Synopsis. The Ba'ath party apparently continued to be the leading nationalist party, though it had split into at least two factions: pro-Nasserites versus "Aflaqites" (Michel Aflaq, Syrian co-founder of the party, stood for an independent policy). The split which rent the party as a whole and had its origin in the disillusionment of the party's Syrian leadership with the UAR regime, had already come out into the open at the party's convention in Beirut in Aug 1959. Abdallah Rimawi, SG of the party in Jordan, was then deprived of his post and later formed a dissident pro-Nasser Ba'athist party.

A public exchange between Fu'ad ar-Rikabi, former SG of the "Regional Command" of the Iraqi Ba'ath, and the "National Command"—the supreme leadership—of the party in Beirut in June 1961, made it clear that the party split in Iraq had begun at about the same time. Apparently, in this internal struggle the "Aflaqites" got the upper hand.

[Little was known on the organization of the Iraqi Ba'ath.] Hans E. Tuetsch, a Swiss journalist, reported that the party mainly followed the Communist cell pattern, but had not enforced "democratic centralism" to the same degree. (Indian Express, Feb 7)

Split Between Pro-Nasserites and "Aflaqites." In June Fu'ad ar-Rikabi clashed openly with the party's "National Command" in Beirut.

On June 24 Rikabi called a press conference in Beirut, and announced that the party in Iraq had severed relations with the "deviationist, so-called National Command." He read what he said was a statement by the Iraqi Regional Command, of June 14, explaining that after a year and a half of attempts to correct the deviations of the Beirut party leadership from within, the Iraqi Regional Command of the Ba'ath saw no alternative but to sever relations with the so-called National Command in Beirut. The National Command was distorting the party's principles by driving it into a clash with the UAR, seeking to cooperate with enemies of Arab nationalism including the Communists, and removing members "possessed of nationalist-revolutionary consciousness." By pursuing this line, the National Command had broken the unity of the party and placed itself beyond the pale, and it was the duty of Arab nationalists to expose its true role.

Moreover, while the party in Iraq was involved in a fateful struggle after the Mosul uprising (March 1959), the National Command had plotted against it, acting as the preparatory committee for the party convention in Beirut (Aug 1959). They had sent messages to "some youths" in Iraq expressing doubts regarding the UAR and calling for the removal of the party's leadership [i.e. Rikabi]. Finally they had helped opportunists to capture the Iraqi party's leadership by devious methods.

[Thus while Rikabi purported to make this statement in the name of the Iraqi Ba'ath, he confirmed the claims made by the National Command (cited further below) that the Regional Command of the Iraqi Ba'ath had been wrested from his control.]

Answering questions, Rikabi claimed that certain members of the "Beirut group" were in contact with British intelligence; but he refrained from mentioning their names. He denied being a member of the "Rimawi group" [the "Ba'ath Revolutionary Command"; see also below]. (Answer; Nahar, Lebanon; Ahram, June 25)

In reply, the Ba'ath National Command declared Rikabi entirely unqualified to speak for the party. It maintained that Rikabi had ceased to be SG of the Iraqi Regional Command, when it dissolved itself on Nov 29, 1959. The temporary Regional Command which was subsequently established passed a resolution, on Feb 2, 1960, in the presence of Rikabi, specifically excluding him from its membership. [Talib Hussein ash-Shalibi was apparently appointed SG.] The party's regional conference which opened in Baghdad in July 1960 preferred severe charges against Rikabi and called upon the national leadership to investigate them. In Aug 1960 the fourth national conference at Beirut, in which Rikabi participated, censured him for his behaviour while responsible in Iraq "and thenceforth he had no responsibility whatsoever in party affairs." On Oct 14, 1960, the party requested Rikabi to reply to certain specific accusations which had been forwarded by the Iraqi party congress. Finally, on June 15, 1961, Rikabi's party membership was cancelled as he had not replied to the accusations. The statement added that the declaration issued by Rikabi, after he had joined the "opportunistic Rimawi group," had not been distributed through party channels and that all Rikabi's allegations were totally untrue. (Nahar, Beirut, June 25)

[The proximity of the dates given for the statement issued by Rikabi and his expulsion from the party poses the question whether the two events were inter-related and which in fact came first.]

In Sept it was reported that party material confiscated by the Iraqi authorities in two Ba'ath cells discovered in Baghdad indicated a split within the party and contained an attack on Fu'ad al-Rikabi, the deposed regional leader. (Hayat, Sept 2 quot. Mustaqbal)

Rikabi Joins Rimawi in Rival Pro-Nasser Ba'ath Party. Three days after the exchange between Rikabi and the National Command, Abdallah ar-Rimawi published a statement in the name of the "National Revolutionary Command" of the Ba'ath expressing very strong support for the secession of the Iraqi Ba'ath from the "deviationist" leadership in Beirut. Rimawi especially attacked Michel Aflaq, who, he said, was responsible for the deviationist party congress in Beirut in Aug 1959. (Anwar, June 28)

After the breakup of the UAR, Cairo Radio quoted Rikabi, "SG of the Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party of Iraq," and Dr Fayal al-Wa'ili, of that party, as supporting the UAR. (R. Cairo, Oct 3 [5]). The following day "the territorial (regional) Command of the Ba'ath party in Iraq" was quoted to the same effect. (R. Cairo, Oct 4 [6])

At the beginning of 1962 Rikabi was reported a member of the "Revolutionary Command (al-qiyadah al-thawriyah) of the Ba'ath Party" which saw in Egypt "the basis of the Arab struggle"; Abdallah Rimawi was another member mentioned. (Ahram, Jan 2, 1962)

Authorities Lenient Towards Party Members. The Iraqi authorities were lenient in their attitude to a number of Ba'ath and pro-Ba'ath personalities who had earlier fallen foul of the regime, such as Col. Abd as-Salam Arif, Brig. Najj Talih and the six persons condemned to death in Feb 1960 for having attempted to assassinate Qasim in Oct 1959. (For details see above: Leniency to Opponents—Nationalists.)

THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY

[The National Democratic party, already seriously weakened by the split in its ranks in 1960 (MER 1960, p 245), suffered further from dissension and secession, and in Oct suspended its activities. As in 1960, the personality of Kamil al-Chadirchi, the veteran leader, was apparently the main reason for the party's inability to keep its ranks intact. The party's opposition to the regime made itself felt through its organ Al-Ahali.]

Dissensions and Secessions, Branches Close. On March 7 the Central Administrative Committee of the National Democratic party unanimously rejected the resignation submitted by Kamil Chadirchi from the party chairmanship and membership of the Committee. (IT, March 9)

On April 15 an extraordinary meeting of the NDP was held in Baghdad, presided over by Chadirchi, at which the resignations of the following leading members of the party were accepted after prolonged discussion: Hussein Jamil, Muzhir Fahmi al-Azzawi and Awad Ali an-Najm (Ahd al-Jadid, Alkhar, April 16). Jamil said that the resignations were due to differences "in the views and attitudes" between the party's President and the resigning members (ANA, April 16, [18]). Kamil Chadirchi and his deputy Hudayb al-Hajji Hammud also resigned, it was later reported, but their resignation "could not be considered because of the lack of a quorum." (IT, May 18)

A nationalist paper reported that the secession occurred because of the party chairman's desire to cooperate with the IS Communists and his slighting references to the pan-Arab movement (Ahd al-Jadid, April 16). Hussein Jamil in a letter to the editor denied the second part of this report [but did not mention Chadirchi's alleged pro-Communism]. (Zaman, April 19)

In April all 56 members of the Kasimiya branch of the NDP were reported to have resigned their membership (Ahd al-Jadid, April 16), while the Basra branch decided to suspend all party activity. (Ahd al-Jadid, April 26)

A nationalist paper attributed the "demise" of the NDP to the varying moods of its "dictator," Chadirchi, and to the realization that the time had passed for the breeding of Communism and opportunism, in which the party specialized. (IT, April 19 quot. Fajr al-Jadid)

The NDP and the Communists. [The party evidently suffered from its relative nearness to the Communists.] On Jan 1 in a memorandum to Qasim, Ja'far al-Badr, chairman of the Basra branch, complained that party members had been arbitrarily dismissed by the Railways and Ports administrations. Gen. Salih Zaki Tawfiq, Director General of Railways, replied that the dismissed men had "committed sabotage and spread anarchy" and that "experiences in this establishment... have confirmed that anarchists put on different cloaks." In reply, Al-Ahali reassured that the dismissed men were bona fide NDP members and law-abiding citizens. (Aheli, Jan 2, 4, 12; IT, Jan 4)

In Aug the NDP denied rumours that its chairman or any one else on its behalf was engaged in secret negotiations for the formation of a "National Front," though, the announcement added, the party did not see anything objectionable in such efforts. (Zaman, Aug 30)

Extraordinary Conference, New Central Committee. On May 19 the party held an extraordinary congress to elect a new Central Administrative Committee. Delegates to the congress were to be those who had participated in the Seventh Party Congress in Nov 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 245-6.)

The following were elected to the Committee: Ja'far al-Badr—Deputy Leader; Dr Sadiq Mahdi as-Sa'id—Secretary General; Abd al-Wahhab at-Tai—Assistant Secretary General; Abd ar-Rahim as-Sadawi—Treasurer; Abd ar-Ra'uf al-Hajji Mahdi; Muhammad Abd al-Mashabi, Jawad Kazzim al-Khayyat; Muhammad Riza as-Salman. Kamil al-Chadirchi who was at the time absent from Iraq was unanimously elected party leader by the new Committee. (IT, May 17, 18, 21)

Only 197 of the 779 delegates which had attended the Seventh Congress appeared this time. It was reported, and this was seen as indicative of the NDP's decline and of Chadirchi's standing within it. (IT, May 29, quot. Ahd al-Jadid)

Al-Ahali and the Government. [With the resignation from the party in April of Azzawi, editor of Al-Ahali, the paper had to close down pending government confirmation of a new editor, in accordance with the law. Since, apparently, the authorities were not in a hurry to take this step, the party tried stop-gap action which failed.] Khalid Ahd ar-Rahim, editor of the Amara paper Sani al-Ahali, was detained because he had published his paper in Baghdad in contravention of the terms of his licence. (Ahd al-Jadid, April 28)

In Aug the government approved Amjad Hamid as chief editor of Al-Ahali, at the request of the NDP (IT, Aug 15). On Aug 20 the paper reappeared with an editorial stressing the importance of a free press and of free party life in a free and developing society. (Ahali, Aug 20)

On Oct 13, the paper announced that it would cease publication as of Oct 14, in accordance with the executive's decision to cease all party activities (see below). (Ahali, Oct 13)

NDP Suspend Activities. "In view of conditions in Iraq." In Oct it was reported from "reliable quarters" that the NDP was expected to suspend activities. Heads and members of various branches of the party assembled in Baghdad on Oct 5 to discuss the resignation submitted by Chadirihi. If the decision to suspend activities were taken, the annual congress scheduled for Nov 2 would not take place. (IT, Oct 9)

On Oct 13 Al-Ahali confirmed the suspension of party activities "in view of conditions in Iraq nowadays" (Ahali, Oct 13). [The congress mentioned above did not take place.]

THE NATIONAL PROGRESSIVE PARTY

[This party, founded in 1960 by a splinter group of the NDP, was formally active throughout the year, but little was heard of it. Its chairman, Muhammad Hadid, did not hold office, but acted as adviser to the government on oil questions.]

Local Branches. On Jan 20 the party branch at Kazimiya (Baghdad) was opened (Bayan, Jan 22). On Jan 27 the Basra branch held its first conference. (Bayan, Jan 29, 30)

Party Conference, Criticism of Regime. The second annual congress of the NPP was held on Dec 27-28 at Baghdad, in the presence of 357 delegates. Resolutions called for a speedier implementation of agrarian reform, increased efficiency in government services and the restoration of normal political life, including the safeguarding of civic and constitutional liberties. The government's stand against the oil companies was approved and the Kurdish rising condemned. The members of the new Central Administrative Committee were Muhammad Hadid, Khadduri Khadduri, Na'il Samhri, Arak az-Zakani, Muhammad Sa'adun, Salman al-Azzawi, Dr Riza Hillawi, Hajj Abbas al-Jadi and Abd ar-Razzak Muhammad. (IT, Dec 28, 30; Mustaqbal, Dec 29)

[Throughout the year al-Bayan's attitude to political questions was generally in line with the above resolutions.

Since its criticism reflected a section of opinion wider than the NPP, it is described in more detail under: The Demand for Civil Liberties.]

OTHER PARTIES

The Islamic Party Liquidated. [This party had obtained its licence in 1960 through an appeal to the Court of Cassation, but its bitter criticism of the regime had led to its suppression and the imprisonment of its leaders; see MER 1960, p 249.] At the beginning of the year, Ulama' of Baghdad, Kirkuk and Arbil petitioned Qasim to release the leaders of the Islamic party, arguing that according to Qasim himself, fair criticism should not be punished (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 24, Feb 9, 19). A similar appeal appeared in the [nationalist] Ath-Thawrah, March 2.

On March 15 Qasim ordered the release from prison of Nu'man Abd ar-Razzak az-Samarra'i, the chairman, and of seven other members of the party, and received the group for a four hours' talk. (Zaman, March 16)

Al-Haydi commented that the Islamic party was less of a political party than a rallying centre for the faithful against the flood of disbelief which was engulfing Iraq since the revolution. This explained both the party's attraction and its clash with the regime. The paper expressed the hope that with the release of the party's leaders from prison, better days were approaching for religion in Iraq. (Hayat, March 17)

Soon afterwards the government ordered the liquidation of the party. It was suggested to its leaders that they should apply for a licence to form an association (Ahali, March 23; Falastin, Jordan, March 23). [Nothing was heard of this proposal later on.]

Proposed Party of Arah Brotherhood and Solidarity. (hizb al-ikhā wa al-ta'āwun al-araḥi) In Feb and April, "extensive contacts" were reported for the formation of such a party by inhabitants of Baghdad and Najaf. The initiators were not as yet prepared to make a detailed statement but asserted that the party "would play an important role in the service of the Arah nation" (Ahali, Feb 6; Thaqafah al-Islamiyah, April 22). [Apparently a Shi'i project; nothing further seemed to have developed.]

No "Congress Party". In Sept Hussein Jamil, former SG of the National Democratic party, denied that he and other former members of the NDP intended to found a new party to be called al-mu'tamar (The Congress). (IT, Sept 18)

THE GOVERNMENT AND SEMI-POLITICAL ASSOCIATIONS

[During the year the government continued to purge the trade unions, professional and other public associations, of Communists and near-Communists.]

THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF LABOUR UNIONS

(al-ittihād al-amm li-niqābat al-ummāl)

[The "de-communisation" of the General Federation of Labour Unions (GFLU), begun in 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 251-3), reached a decisive stage. At the second general convention of the federation held in May, the Communist leadership was ousted; the leftist president and secretary had been arrested a fortnight earlier, and were thenceforth kept in prison. Additional unions were wrested from Communist control, and trade unionists persecuted.]

A Communist source described the technique employed by the authorities to prevent "militant workers" from occupying trade union posts: they were dismissed from their jobs and then declared to be ineligible as they were no longer engaged in that industry. (Daily Worker, Feb 28)

Communists Lose Control of Unions, Leaders Arrested. Throughout the year there were cases of Communists losing control of trade unions in elections, e.g. the Post and Telecommunication workers, (Istiqal, Jan 26), the leather workers, the agricultural labourers (Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 28), the irrigation workers and the Ministry of Works employees. In the two last-mentioned cases protests alleging fraud were addressed to the authorities, and re-elections demanded. (Mabda', Dec 30)

Leftist trade unions were harassed. In Ali Ali al-Ghazali, secretary of the Tailoring Workers Union [a well-known Communist], was detained "without any accusation raised against him," as his trade union complained to the Military Governor-General (Re'y al-Amm, Feb 2). In March three trade unionists from Karbala were sentenced to eight months in prison for sending Qassim a memorandum "slandering... the police and administrative authorities, and... describing in a distorted manner the experiences to which trade unions there were exposed." (IT, March 8)

In April a former secretary of the Leather Workers Union was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for slandering a rival unionist by calling him a paid spy of imperialism and "Point Four agent" (Ahd al-Jadid, April 4). Military courts sentenced ten workers to prison for participation in strikes (e.g. Istiqal, Jan 26) and various "anarchist activities" (e.g. Thawrah, March 1). (For additional cases see also: The Communists pp 268-9.)

Communist Ousted From Leadership at General Convention. Following upon a dispute between the authorities and the GFLU as regards the date of elections to the executive committee, the former demanding a convention by Feb, and the latter arguing that elections were not due till 1962, the Military Governor-General postponed the elections for the time being. (Bilad, Jan 26, 10; Fajr al-Jadid, Feb 6)

Meanwhile Ali Shukur and Sadiq Falahi, president and secretary of the GFLU, were arrested for taking part in an unauthorized May Day demonstration. (Fajr al-Jadid, May 3; see also: The Communists (Arrests of Communist Leaders).)

Two weeks later, the convention opened in Baghdad (May 15-18). Qassim opened the convention with a speech stressing the freedom of delegates to elect whatever representation they wished. Afterwards several unions criticised the executive for its "subservience to a certain political group."

The elections to the 35-man executive on May 16 were won by the [anti-Communist] Independent list. Chief officers elected were: Hajj Ibrahim Jawad—president of the Oil Industries Workers' Union—president; Azhar Ibrahim an-Nadawi, president of the Railway Union—vice-president; Yusuf Isma'il al-Ani, president of the Plasterers' Union—secretary-general; Hashim as-Sayyid Abid—treasurer; Muhammad Raddi—organizational secretary; Karim Salmān—"national relations"; Badri Ahmad al-Ubaydi, of the Union of Municipal Employees—responsible for economic affairs; Fayal Sarhid, president of Vegetables Oil and Soap Makers Union—industrial relations. (INA, May 15; Zaman, May 16; IT, May 16-22)

A "nationalist" source stated with satisfaction that the trade unions had seen through the phrases and lies of the anarchists [i.e. Communists] and freed themselves from their influence. (IT, May 23 quot. Fajr al-Jadid)

Leftist sources alleged that the authorities had influenced the election results by force and fraud. Thus the Building Workers' Union delegates were said to have been arrested on the very first day of the convention, and thereby deprived of their vote. (Mabda', Oct 7)

On Aug 2 Qassim ordered the payment of ID10,000 to the GFLU, on the occasion of an audience granted by him to the Federation's new president, who said that the previous leadership had left the GFLU treasury empty despite considerable contributions from government and trade unions. (IT, Aug 6)

On Nov 14 the GFLU executive deposed Azhar Ibrahim an-Nadawi, its vice-president, "for negligence in carrying out his duties"; Hikmat Amin Abdallah was elected in his place. (Akhbar, Nov 22)

THE JOURNALISTS' UNION

(niqbat as-suhufiyyin)

[At the beginning of the year the Journalists' Union was still led by leftist circles. By mid-year an anti-Communist executive had been put in its place with the open assistance of the authorities, but dissension continued within the leadership.]

Communist Control Eliminated. In Feb the Union's president, Muhammad Mahdi al-Jawahiri [a celebrated poet and reputed Communist; see MER 1960, p 254], tendered his resignation which was rejected by the executive council (Zaman, Feb 8, 10). [Jawahiri apparently ceased to be active in the Union thereafter; at the end of March he was arrested—see p 268b.]

At the beginning of March, four [anti-Communist] dailies, Al-Fajr al-Jadid, As-Zaman, Al-Ahd al-Jadid and Al-Mustaqbal, published a memorandum which they had addressed to the Military Governor-General, asking his help in purging the Union of "foreign elements and narrow partisanship." A list was attached of 151 Union members, who were stated to be non-journalists and whose membership was therefore claimed to be invalid according to law.

[Anti-Communists had argued for some time that the Communists had achieved, and were maintaining, domination of the union by packing it with non-professionals; see MER 1960, p 254.] Al-Mustaqbal commented that the union should get rid of Communists and outsiders. (Zaman, March 2; IT, March 3)

On March 8 the Military Governor-General appointed an investigation committee to enquire into the state of the Union; he had its accounts impounded and the executive restrained from handling its assets. On March 10, 45 journalists elected, "with the approval of the Military Governor-General," a liaison committee to cooperate with the investigation committee for the conversion of the Union into a purely professional body. (IT, March 12, 14, 15)

At the end of May the committee presented its conclusions, which led to 72 members being excluded from the Union; another 27 members were excluded upon a request from the Military Governor-General to deny membership to "accountants and subscription collectors" (IT, June 2). [Thus approximately 40% of the members were excluded.]

The third annual congress of the Union (which had been postponed by the authorities until the committee concluded its work) opened on June 3, preceded and accompanied by fierce electioneering from the anti-Communist press (e.g. Ahd al-Jadid, May 31; Thawrah, June 2; Zaman, June 2, 4). After the opening addresses the congress adjourned until June 8 and again, for lack of a quorum, to June 9 when elections for the administrative committee were held. One hundred three out of 149 eligible members voted. The candidates of the Independent List were victorious; Taha al-Fayyad, owner of the [strongly nationalist] daily Al-Fajr al-Jadid was elected president by 50 votes against 41 cast for [the outgoing vice-president] Hasan al-Asadi; Tawfiq as-Sam'ani, publisher of [the moderate anti-Communist daily] As-Zaman, was elected vice-president by 50 votes against Fā'iq al-Buti, who received 39 votes; Rusmi al-Amil, editor of Al-Mustaqbal, was elected secretary. In his acceptance speech, the new president attacked the outgoing committee for its support of "foreign organizations and countries, while it neglected to support common Arab tasks." (IT, June 6, 9, 11)

Later Disturbances. On Nov 20 Rusmi al-Amil resigned in protest against "the autocratic and partisan attitude" of the Union's president Fayyād, "which did not permit the union to fulfil its true duty to the profession" (Bayan; Mustaqbal, Nov 22); Zaki Ahmad was appointed secretary in his place (Bilad Nov 25). On Dec 9 Fayyād submitted his own resignation to the executive, which refused to accept it (IT, Dec 10; Zaman, Dec 16). [Fayyād's daily, Al-Fajr al-Jadid, had been suspended by the Military Governor-General on Oct 26—apparently because of its attacks on the Syrian "secessionists." Fayyād was still active as president of the Union at the end of the year.]

Towards the end of Dec, Na'imah al-Wakil, Sālih Salīmān and Yūsuf Awdid resigned from the executive in protest against its "undemocratic procedures" (Sawt al-Ahrar, Dec 26; Mustaqbal, Dec 29). [Na'imah al-Wakil was the owner-editor of the pro-Communist weekly 14 Tammuz.]

Government Benefits. The authorities allocated 125 housing plots to members of the Journalists' Union housing cooperative. (INA, Sept 25)

THE TEACHERS' UNION

(niqābat al-mu'allimīn)

[This important union passed from leftist to nationalist control.]

Pro-Communists Defeated in Elections. On Feb 10, elections took place in the Teachers' Union.

The nationalist Al-Fajr al-Jadid strongly supported the United Educational Front (UEF) implying that its rival, the United Professional List (UPL), was a Communist instrument. (IT, Feb 10 quot. Fajr al-Jadid)

The UEF won a majority in nine provinces, namely Baghdad, Mosul, Kirkuk, Diyala, Ramadi, Kut, Hilla, Karbala, Diwaniya. The UPL won a majority in four provinces, namely Arbil, Sulaymaniya, Amara and Basra. Results for Nasiriya province were not published at the time (IT, Feb 12). The results were enthusiastically welcomed by the nationalist press (e.g. IT, Feb 13 quot. Fajr al-Jadid) and cautiously deplored by leftist papers (e.g. IT, Feb 16 quot. Sawt al-Ahrar).

Following the elections, the third congress of the Teachers' Union took place in Baghdad on Feb 20-23, attended by 620 delegates. In elections for the Union's Executive, the UEF candidates were victorious; Dr Muhammad Nāsir was elected president, Abbās Abd al-Latif and Ahmad Mārūt—vice presidents. (INA, Feb 19, 20; IT, Feb 22, 26)

[Najib Muhi ad-Din, the outgoing president, had been a sponsor of the leftist Republican Party in Feb 1960—see, MER 1960, p 244.]

Government Attitudes. The Minister of Education decided on a grant of 1D24,000 to the Teachers' Union in order to "cement the cooperation between the Union and the Ministry." (IT, March 27)

In Dec, the courts closed the club house of the Union's Sulaymaniya branch [which had returned a leftist committee at the elections] for "acting in a manner incompatible with its licensed aims." (Bayan, Dec 26)

THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF STUDENTS

(ittihād al-tullāb al-amm)

[Despite government harassment the left continued to dominate the Federation throughout the year. Towards the end of the year nationalist elements seceded and founded a new organization.]

Internal Orientation. In July the General Federation of Students (GFS) issued a statement condemning "imperialist intrigue" in Kuwait. (IT, July 9)

In Nov the Federation lauded the [Moscow-orientated] International Union of Students "for its anti-reactionary struggle," on the occasion of its 15th anniversary. (Sawt al-Ahrar, Nov 20)

Struggle With Authorities—Branches Closed. In March a "responsible source" at the Ministry of Education declared that elections for the GFS [which had been due since Nov 1960; see MER 1960, p 253] would be held "in due course," after "some problems... relating to the Union" had been solved (INA, March 4). In fact, elections were not held and towards the end of the year the GFS repeatedly asked the authorities to license elections (14 Tammuz, Nov 27; Bilad, Dec 8, 27). [The attitude of the GFS and the authorities may perhaps have been founded on the assumption that the leftists in the GFS were still in the majority.]

In Jan the authorities closed the Students' Union at the College of Education because of "acts of provocation" (IT, Jan 5), as well as the Basra branch. (Difa, Jordan, Jan 2)

In April the branches in Karbala, Diwaniya and Kirkuk provinces were closed down for having "neglected the proper affairs of the students and busied themselves overmuch with politics." (Akhhbar, April 2; Falastin, Jordan, April 27)

Disensions, Secessions; Rival Union Established. In April a "nationalist" source stated that among the many corporate withdrawals from the GFS were the Ramadi Students Union and two (named) secondary schools at A'zamiya. [Both Ramadi (Western Iraq) and A'zamiya (Baghdad) were "nationalist" centres.] (Fajr al-Jadid, April 20)

In Dec a GFS statement condemned the "Founders' Congress of the National Union of Iraqi Students" which had been held at the Medical College, "under cover of the 'fight against Communism.'" (Sawt al-Ahrar, Dec 7; Mabda', Dec 9). Fights broke out between the two factions at the Law and Medical colleges. (Akhhbar, Bayan, Dec 12; Mabda', Dec 16)

THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF PEASANTS' SOCIETIES

(al-ittihād al-amm lil-jum'iyyāt al-fallāhiyyah)

General. The number of licensed peasants' societies in Iraq was given as 3537 (INA, Aug 16). (In Feb 1960 it had been given as 3577—see MER 1960, p 255.)

First Congress. The 1st congress of the General Federation of Peasants' Societies (GFPS) assembled on Jan 14 at Baghdad, headed by its president Arīk as-Zakam. At the congress, Qassim stated that the government would continue land distribution and issued a warning to opponents of agrarian reform.

Congress resolutions urged that peasants should sit on the inspection bodies planned by the government to expedite the implementation of the agrarian reform law and that women should have equal rights as beneficiaries of land distribution, recommended triennial instead of annual elections for peasant societies and the Federation, and pledged loyalty to Qassim. (Bayan, Zaman, IT, Jan 13-16)

A leftist source accused Zakam of dictatorial tendencies and questioned the democratic character of the congress (Itiqat, Jan 24); Zakam rejected these allegations (Bayan, Jan 30). Zakam was a founder member of the National Progressive Party, whose organ was Al-Bayan—see MER 1960, p 246.]

Relations with the Authorities. In March, Zakam sent a cable to Qassim on behalf of the GFPS, thanking him for the abolition of duties on crops (istihlak) and land tax (on which see: Economic and Social Survey, above; IT, March 31.)

In Aug the Ministry of Finance allocated to the GFPS the sum of ID7,000. (IT, Aug 9)

On Sept 5 the Peasants' Society's Law was amended to provide for biennial elections to their administrative bodies. (IT, Sept 5; see also above.)

At the end of the year, a letter to the editor complained that officials had lately shown hostility to peasant societies and cooperated with land owners, "the enemies of the revolution." (Bayan, Dec 1)

OTHER PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATIONS

Lawyers' Union (niqabat al-muhamin). [The Union had been nationalist-led, with pronounced UAR tendencies, since 1959.] In Jan five members of the executive handed in their resignation to the Society's president, Abd ar-Razzaq Shahib, reportedly in protest against his decision to limit to 202 the number of Iraqi lawyers attending the forthcoming Arab Lawyers' Congress in Cairo. (IT, Jan 19)

At the annual elections on Oct 20 Shahib was elected president for the third time running; Nu'man al-Ani and Mahdi Qassim Kubba were elected first and second vice-presidents, respectively. Of the other two contestants for the presidency, Shukri Salih Zaki was ruled out by court order as not having 15 years' law practice to his credit and Abbas Hasan Jum'ah withdrew on election day (Bilad, Oct 21; IT, Oct 22). A leftist paper reported that there were many abstentions, and that the vote was taken "under the supervision of an official authority." (Bilad, Oct 21)

Industrialists' Association (ittihad al-sina'at al-iraqiyah). On Dec 19 elections took place for the executive of the Iraqi Industrialists' Association. Nuri Fattah was reelected president; Khadduri Khadduri [vice-chairman of the National Progressive Party] was elected vice-president. (Zaman, Dec 20)

Chamber of Commerce. On Nov 26 elections were held for the committee of the Baghdad Chamber of Commerce. Muhammad Ja'far ash-Shahibi was elected president for the 12th time running. (Zaman, Nov 28)

Engineers' Union; Leftists Lose Control. The third congress of the Engineers' Union took place in Baghdad on Jan 17-20. In the elections for the presidency, Adib al-Jadir, heading the Professional List, defeated the incumbent president, Abd ar-Razzaq Mutar, of the Engineers' Solidarity List. [In Iraq, since the revolution, "solidarity" lists represented leftist interests.] (INA, Jan 21; IT, Jan 17-24)

The Medical Union; Leftists Lose Control. In Jan, elections for the executive and regional committees of the union resulted in a "historic" victory for the [nationalist] Independent Professional List, when its candidate Dr Ahmad Kamal Arif was elected chairman by 900 votes against 339 votes secured by Dr Hashim Dugramachi of the [leftist] Cooperative List. (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 23)

Economists' Society Under Nationalist Control. On Dec 1 elections for the Iraqi Economists' Society resulted in the victory of the Professional List headed by Dr Hasan ath-Thamir, the incumbent chairman, with 486 votes as against 335 votes for the Democratic List (INA, Dec 2). [This was an affirmation of anti-Communist control.]

Writers' League under Nationalist Control. The League elections resulted as follows: Dr Abd al-Aziz ad-Duri—president; Dr Abd ar-Razzaq Muhi ad-Din—vice-president; Dr Yusuf Izz ad-Din—secretary; Shadih Taqah—treasurer [all personalities holding "nationalist" views]. (Akhbar, Dec 6)

THE PARTISANS OF PEACE

(ansar al-salam)

[The operations of this Communist front organization were severely restricted but it was not officially dissolved and maintained some activity until the end of the year.]

Government Activities Against Movement. At the beginning of the year, a leftist paper described the Peace Partisans as "the broadest, most solid and fastest growing anti-imperialist movement in Iraq." (IT, Feb 5 quot. Sawt al-Ahrar)

In Jan Aziz Sharif, secretary-general, addressed a memorandum to Qassim asking him to remove the obstacles which had been put in the way of the movement, e.g. closing of provincial branches and detention of members. Among prominent members mentioned as detained without trial were Tawfiq Munir, the deputy SG; Dr Abdallah Bustani [brother of Abd al-Qadir Isma'il Bustani, publisher of the Communist party organ Ittihad ash-She'ab]; Ma'ruf al-Karzanji. (Nida', Lebanon, Jan 20 quot. Itiqat, Jan 6)

In March the Mosul branch of the movement was reported closed by the authorities. (Difa', Manar, Jordan, March 14)

In May the Military Governor-General ordered the closing of all Peace Partisans premises throughout Iraq [but not the dissolution of the organization as such]. The reason stated was that the aims of the organization were the concern of the entire Iraqi people, and not of one section. The order added that the organization might apply for permission to hold meetings. (Zaman, May 9)

The [nationalist] paper Al-Fajr al-Jadid commended this measure taken against "a vicious group which set traps for simple people to lure them into the underground world of anarchy." (IT, May 10)

Activities Continue. In the spring Aziz Sharif paid a visit to Cuba where he met Dr Fidel Castro, and attended the conference of the World Peace Council at New Delhi. (Bilad, May 3)

In the summer Sharif issued statements on behalf of the movement supporting Qasim on the Kuwait question and thanking him for his stand on the "Ban the Bomb" issue. (IT, July 7, Aug 9)

The authorities licensed the holding of a meeting of the Peace Partisans in Baghdad on Aug 18, in support of the "Anti-Atom-Bomb Council" of Japan (IT, Aug 13); the meeting took place on that date (Akhbar, Aug 19). In Sept the movement sent its greetings to the Belgrade Conference, and later welcomed its resolutions. (IT, Sept 6, 10)

On Nov 30 Qasim received Sharif in audience, prior to his departure for Stockholm as Iraqi representative at a meeting of the World Peace Council there. According to a movement bulletin, Qasim had praised it and stressed that he was supporting it as before. (IT, Dec 3)

On Dec 8 the movement held its fourth annual conference in Baghdad. The SG described the international scene and stressed his loyalty to Qasim. (Sawt al-Ahrar; Bilad, Dec 12)

THE UNION OF DEMOCRATIC YOUTH

(al-ittihad al-amm li ash-shabibah ad-dimuqratiyah)
(Corrigendum: MER 1960, p 255: The name of the organization in Arabic should be read as above.)

[This Communist front organization which had been severely harassed by the authorities in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 255-6) was finally liquidated.]

In March a petition was addressed to the authorities for the release of Sami Mahjub al-Husseini al-Hurani, member of the secretariat, who had been detained by them for over four months. (Bilad, March 16; Istiqal, March 19)

In April the authorities closed down all the Union's branches for "having deviated from its legitimate purpose of doing true service to youth," and for having received financial aid "from a political party" (Ahd al-Jadid; Falastin, Jordan, April 27). At the same time the "Democratic Youth" programme of Baghdad Radio was discontinued (Mustaqbal, April 30) and the licence of the Union's magazine, Alam ash-Shabibah, was withdrawn. (Zaman, May 9)

An appeal by the dissolved Union to the Court of Cassation was rejected, and an official receiver was appointed to liquidate its property. (Ahd al-Jadid, June 29)

In Dec Dr Rahim Ajinah, secretary of the Union, petitioned Qasim to withdraw the order of dissolution. (Madba, Dec 29, 30)

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS

Authorities Close Women's League Branches. The [pro-Communist] Iraqi Women's League, whose activities had been curbed in 1960 (MER 1960, p 256), had a number of its provincial branches closed down by the authorities "for intervening in politics and deviating from the principles for which it had been licensed"; these centres were—Basra (Ahali, Jan 3); Mosul, closed down on March 21, dissolved on May 29 (Ahali, March 22, May 30); Diwaniya (BBC in Ar, March 26-IMB, March 27); Kirkuk (Haganah, June 6); Arbil (Bayan, Dec 26). In Dec the League petitioned Qasim to permit the reactivation of the branches closed down. (Bilad, Dec 22)

Rival Organization Active. The [anti-Communist] Republican Women's Organization (munazzamat nisa' al-jumhuriyah) (see MER 1960, p 256) continued its philanthropic activities, such as sewing clothes for infants in Karakh hospital. (Akhbar, Jan 20)

In May an organization called the Women's League of the Iraqi Republic (jum'iyat nisa' al-jumhuriyah al-irakiyah) was welcomed to join the Arab Women's Federation (al-ittihad an-nisa' al-arabi), headed by the Lebanese Ibtihaj Qadurah. (Zaman, May 20)

The Muslim Women's Club (muntada al-mar'ah al-muslimah) of Baghdad was licensed by the Minister of the Interior on April 20; the application had been signed by Najiyah Khidir (Akhbar, April 21). On July 9 elections for the committee took place, and Mrs Adwiyah ash-Shawwaf was elected president (Zaman, July 22). The club arranged charity bazaars, which the organizers described as highly successful. (Bayan, Oct 13)

THE GOVERNMENT AND ISLAM, MINORITIES

GOVERNMENT AND ISLAM

[The government took care to show its eagerness to promote the interests of Islam.]

Islam to Remain Official Religion. On July 18 Qasim said that the article in the provisional constitution of 1958, declaring Islam the state religion, would also be included in the permanent constitution. (IT, July 19)

Government Encourages Islam. The Muslim Youth Society received a ID7,000 government grant, "to erect a building and further its aims." (Ahali, Jan 30)

An official source stated that Qasim had agreed to grant teachers going on pilgrimage seventeen days paid leave instead of seven days as previously. (IT, April 25)

In July it was announced that the [Shi'i] holy shrines at Karbala would not be charged for electricity. (IT, July 26)

In Sept the Ministry of Finance allotted ID54,000 for the repair of various [Shi'i] holy shrines, in fulfilment of Qasim's desire. (IT, Sept 22)

In Oct the Awqaf Advisory Council allocated ID30,000 for the establishment of a public library in Mosul. (Zaman, Oct 24)

[At the same time the government stressed its positive attitude towards Islam by demonstrating hostility towards its detractors. The following are typical examples:] The authorities banned the book "Materialism and Idealism" by George Lohidzev, translated by Isma'il al-Mahdawi, for being anti-religious (IT, Aug 29). A labourer was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for blaspheming the Prophet and the Holy Qur'an. (Zaman, March 10)

Shi'i Leader Demands Repeal of Personal Status Law. [The response of at least one prominent Islamic personage to government overtures was lukewarm:] An Al-Hayat reporter interviewed the Shi'i divine, Muhsin al-Hakim of Najaf (see MER 1960, p 257), whom he described as "the strongest popular personality in Iraq... the most powerful man outside government circles," regarded by the Islamic party as "their spiritual father" and by anti-Communists as "their first protector in the had days of the past." When asked about his attitude to the government, Hakim replied that he had no personal attitude, but that Muslims in general wanted Qasim to abolish the personal status law enacted during "the red period" (Hayat, Jan 19). [This was, as reported, Muhsin al-Kakim's only reference to Iraqi affairs in an extensive interview.] [The Personal Status Law of Dec 30, 1959 sought to establish a unified legal basis in this matter while modernizing a number of traditional Muslim concepts. The law provided, i.e., for a minimum age for marriage (18 years; in special cases 16 years, by permission of a Qādi); prohibited polygamy on pain of a prison sentence, except if especially permitted by a Qādi for reasons laid down in the law; provided for a compulsory marriage contract allowing for divorce proceedings by the wife if broken by the husband, and made divorce subject to court decision. The law was designed with intent to give the least offence to the traditionally-minded; religious courts were not interfered with and in cases of doubt judges were instructed to rely upon precedents based on religious law. Nonetheless, religious circles resented the law as an intrusion of secularism.] [For text of the law see Al-Waqif al-Iraqiyyah, Dec 30, 1959.]

Anti-Communism Rampant among Shi'is. The reporter quoted above was struck by the spontaneous outbursts of hatred at Karbala against the Communists, who were held responsible for the anti-religious terror of 1959. He described a mass meeting at which Brig. Sayyid Hamid Sayyid Hussein, Commander of the 1st division, inveighed against the faithless. After the meeting, the mob dragged an effigy of Khrushchov through the streets. (Hayat, Jan 19)

Shari'ah College Attached to Baghdad University, Women Admitted. By order of Qasim the Shari'ah College was attached to Baghdad University as from April 1 (IT, April 6). In 1961 the College admitted thirty women secondary school graduates, to its first class, out of a total of 120 students. A separate class-room was provided for the girl students. Women graduates of the College might teach Arabic at government secondary schools, the dean said. (INA, Oct 24; Zaman, Oct 25)

NOMADIC TRIBES

Synopsis. No occurrences of particular significance were reported. The government continued its policy of assimilating Bedouin law and custom to state law. Steps were taken, within the framework of agrarian reform, to promote the settlement of nomad tribes. Measures were taken to alleviate distress, presumably due to years of drought.

The press reported declarations of loyalty to the regime by heads of the most important tribal groups.

Tribal Custom Reference Removed from Penal Code. A law was published on Feb 23 amending the Baghdad Penal Code by deleting Art 41, which gave judges discretion to refer to tribal custom and commute sentences accordingly. "Although the Judiciary never applied Art 41..., its inclusion in the code was inconsistent with the aims of the Revolution," INA commented. (INA, Feb 23; Zaman, Feb 24)

Bedouin Settlement. The Ministry of Agrarian Reform set up a special committee for the settlement of Bedouin (Sawt al-Ahali, April 20; Bayan, May 8). In June its chairman announced that 500,000 dunams would be distributed among the Shammar tribes in N.W. Iraq, in a concerted project to settle them on the land; reports showed the Shammar to be favourably inclined towards these plans. (IT, June 7)

Relief Measures. "By order of the Prime Minister," ID5,000 were allocated for the relief of Bedouin tribes in Mosul and Diwaniya provinces. A committee was appointed to purchase food and clothing for the needy. (Bilad, Jan 26; Zaman, Feb 12)

Tribes Pledge Loyalty to Qasim. On April 22 Qasim received a delegation from the Shammar tribes which assured him of their absolute support and especially for his stand vis-à-vis the IPC (IT, April 24). [In March 1959 the Shammar tribes participated in the Shawwaf rebellion and suffered heavily during and after its suppression.]

On Aug 5 delegations from the Shammar and Anaiza tribes were received by Qasim whom they thanked for the agricultural and medical projects undertaken in their interests. (IT, Aug 7)

Tribal Clashes. In March three people were reported killed in clashes "due to ancient enmity," between Shammar and Harsa bedouin on the one side, and Yazidis on the other. (Falastin, Jordan, March 10)

MINORITIES

[On the Kurdish rising and clashes between Turkomans and Kurds—see below. No other events or developments of particular significance were reported.]

THE KURDISH RISING

BACKGROUND AND SYNOPSIS

Background. The Kurds inhabit a compact mountainous area extending over the borders of Iran, Iraq and Turkey and smaller strips of Syria and the USSR. They number four to five million, according to informed neutral estimates; numbers given by interested parties vary widely—from three to 15 million.

The great majority are Sunni Muslims. The Kurdish language is Indo-European, split into branches practically unintelligible to each other. Written literature is of recent date; both Latin and Arabic scripts are employed.

As an identifiable ethnic group the Kurds are very ancient; there is little doubt that they are referred to in Sumerian records of not later than 2000 B.C. Though they are one of the oldest autochthonous peoples of the region, their political consciousness as a nation is comparatively recent, dating approximately from the Young Turks revolution. For many reasons Kurdish nationalism has been slow to take root. The geographical situation of their homeland as well as its topographical character make the Kurds turn outwards for economic and cultural contacts, rather than to each other; their politically more advanced neighbours, while adopting different attitudes at different times, were all hostile to Kurdish aspirations, and great power interests as well as the general diplomatic situation in the ME were almost always unfavourable. Yet the main reason is social. Isolated from the outer world, and with mountain barriers criss-crossing their own territory, the Kurds have maintained a primarily tribal organization, and in consequence put tribal loyalties—and animosities—above all others.

Nonetheless there has been a constant development of nationalist feeling amongst a slowly-growing urban (largely expatriated) intelligentsia which developed mutual links with the tribal society. Thus, traditional tribal uprisings against distant governments and local tax-collectors gradually acquired nationalist overtones. In one outstanding case, a permanent alliance was achieved between the Barazani tribe and the Democratic Party of Kurdistan (on which see below). In the aftermath of the two World Wars, when the great powers struggled for positions in the ME, Kurdish nationalist aspirations were encouraged for short periods. In 1920, the Treaty of Sèvres between the Allies and the Ottoman Empire provided for an autonomous Kurdish area in S.E. Anatolia and envisaged ultimate independence, but there was no trace of these provisions in the Treaty of Lausanne signed in 1923 by the Allies and the Kemalist government. This was due, on the one hand, to Kemalist hostility towards all separatist movements north of the Arah area, and on the other, to the close alignment of British and Iraq-Hashimite interests in the area. A Kurdish state was set up under Soviet protection in the aftermath of the Second World War, this time at the expense of Iran.

The Kurds of Iraq are estimated at about one million people. They speak mainly Kurmanji, the southern branch of the Kurdish language, though the differences in dialect are great. All levels of socio-economic development from the nomadic to the urban-industrialized are represented; the majority of the population is probably semi-nomadic, with a regular trend towards settlement, and some are urbanized. The Iraqi Kurds form the bulk of the population in the provinces of Arbil and Sulaymaniyah, and are strongly represented in the provinces of Mosul and Kirkuk. A considerable and politically important Kurdish community is also to be found in Baghdad. The traditional capital of Iraqi Kurdistan is Sulaymaniyah.

The attitude of the royal government of Iraq to its Kurdish subjects was conciliatory up to a point, mainly due to precedents set by the British military authorities immediately after the First World War, and to obligations incurred in international settlements, under the British mandate. In Dec 1925 the Council of the League of Nations awarded the Mosul vilayet to Iraq—over Turkish claims—subject to guarantees that regard would be paid to "the desires expressed by the Kurds that officials of Kurdish race should be appointed for the administration of their country, the dispensation of justice and teaching in the schools, and that Kurdish should be the language of all these services." In 1932, when the League Council considered Iraq's admission, it required and received from the Iraqi government a written Declaration, which was to rank as part of the Constitution, reaffirming its undertakings in regard to the minorities. A special law was enacted defining the areas within which Kurdish and Turkish should be the languages of the local administration, of the law courts, and of primary education.

Various promises concerning cultural autonomy and administration by Kurdish officials were made, and to some degree implemented. While Kurds not identified with Kurdish nationalism and society served in the highest government positions including the premiership, no prospects were held out for Kurdish autonomy and no all-Kurdish political parties or movements were permitted.

The Kurdish tribes as a whole were restive. While tribes could generally be found to cooperate with Baghdad, there was always a threat of major uprisings, which often did break out. During the years of the mandate, resistance to the central government was spearheaded by Shaykh Mahmud al-Barzani of Sulaymaniyah. When he was exiled in 1931, his place was taken by the brothers Ahmad and Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani, heads of the Barazani tribe, located north-west of Ruwanduz.

Ahmad, born about 1885, and Mulla Mustafa (called Mulla after a maternal uncle), born about 1903, belonged to a family that had led the Barazanis for 1,200 years, according to Mulla Mustafa. Their grandfather, father and a brother were executed by the Turks for rebellion. Shaykh Ahmad came eventually to believe that "his greatest duty was to spare his war-torn tribe from further suffering and to solve its problems by negotiation and compromise" (NYT, Sept 11, 1962). Mulla Mustafa, on the other hand, was convinced that the Barazanis, and the Kurds in general, must fight or be destroyed.

Since the Barazanis operated from a permanent territorial base which was remote and inaccessible, their subjection was extremely difficult. In 1932 an Iraqi ground force was saved only by RAF intervention. After intermittent risings and pacifications, a major Barazani rebellion broke out in 1943. In Oct 1943, Shaykh Ahmad and Mulla Mustafa, harassed by government forces and rival tribes, but attracted by promising developments in Iran, crossed the borders with hundreds of their armed followers, women and children. In Iran, Mulla Mustafa became the military commander of the "Kurdish People's Government" at Mahabad, established under Zaki Muhammad at the end of 1945 upon Soviet initiative. Mulla Mustafa later asserted that the "republic" tried to maintain its independence against Soviet attempts at interference. The political basis of this Kurdish "republic" was the Democratic Party of Kurdistan (DPK) which developed out of the "Rusdari Kurd," itself a "Popular Front" merger of various left-wing nationalist bodies, and Kurdish Communists. When the Soviet forces evacuated Azerbaijan in May 1946 and the Iranian government reasserted itself in the area, the Mahabad "government" disintegrated and Zaki Muhammad was put to death at Tehran in March 1947. Mulla Mustafa became the leader of what remained of its political and military forces. His attempt to return to Iraq was beaten back by the Iraqi army, and in the summer of 1947 he and his followers forced their way through Turkey and Iran to the USSR, where they were received with honour and settled down to wait for better days. Shaykh Ahmad surrendered to the Iraqi authorities and was imprisoned until 1958.

Meanwhile Iraqi Kurdistan remained relatively quiet. The DPK carried on underground activities among the Kurdish intellectuals of the north and Baghdad. A significant development was the secession from the party of the Communist wing, which did not or was not permitted to share the primary stress on the "national" struggle in contrast to the "anti-imperialist" one.

The revolution of July 14, 1958, brought the Barazani-DPK combination into prominence. The tribal rivals of the Barazanis—the Zibari, Baradost and Herki Kurds—who had collaborated with PM Nuri Sa'id, preferred to stay in Iran to await further developments. On the other hand, the Kurdish intelligentsia and especially DPK circles shared the widespread enthusiasm at the downfall of the old regime and were encouraged by the reference to the Kurds in the provisional constitution as "partners" of the Arabs in the Iraqi republic. For the first time, Kurdish parties were permitted to work openly in Iraq and the DPK naturally stepped on to the scene. Mulla Mustafa returned from the Soviet Union in Sept 1958 and was warmly welcomed by PM Qasim who kept him in Baghdad, either as his Kurdish adviser and intermediary, or as a pledge of good behaviour. Qasim stated in Sept 1961, after the Kurdish rising, that Mulla Mustafa received a monthly salary of ID500, while every bachelor or head of family among the repatriates received from ID35 to 50 monthly. A vigorous Kurdish press quickly developed.

The Iraqi Communists acclaimed Mulla Mustafa's return and continued afterwards to regard him as their ally; but he never adopted any other stance than that of a Kurdish nationalist, though his interests ran parallel with the Communists' against the Arab nationalists, and for a time Communist influence was strong in the DPK. During the Shawwaf rebellion in March 1959, the Barazani Kurds and the DPK—like the Communists—vigorously supported Qasim, and Mulla Mustafa left Baghdad for a time to assist in beating down nationalist influences in the north.

In Feb 1960, the DPK was legalized under the Associations Law, but by then relations between the regime and the DPK-Barazani combination had started to cool off. Even if he had wished—and of this he gave no sign—Qasim could not possibly fulfil the extravagant hopes which he had inspired in Kurdish nationalist circles. In practice, he applied his balancing tactics to the Kurdish question. The tribal rivals of the Barazanis gradually returned from Iran, and Qasim made it clear that the Barazanis had no monopoly of his affections or of government aid. As early as May 1959, inter-tribal violence started, mainly between the Barazanis and the Zibaris, each side accusing the other of aggression. By 1960, the Zibaris seemed likely to supplant the Barazanis as the favourites of Baghdad. At the same time, relations between the DPK and the regime deteriorated to a point of hostility. An anti-Communist purge of the party at about that time—initiated by Mulla Mustafa as he later claimed—did not cause the authorities to assume a more positive attitude. In Nov Mulla Mustafa left on an extended and ostensibly non-political visit to the USSR, but this was taken as a sign that relations between him and Qasim were at the breaking point.

Synopsis. Early in 1961, government harassment of the DPK continued. At the same time, PM Qasim and the government-inspired press endeavoured to deny, mostly by implication, the Kurdish claim to constitute a separate people or nation. This evoked angry retorts from Khebdî, the DPK-Barazani organ.

Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani returned from the USSR in Jan and went to Baghdad, but a month or two later he left for his mountain stronghold, the village of Barazan, where he started to collect men and arms for a rising.

There were differing versions as to his ultimate aims. It was claimed that he strove to set up an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq, but he and his followers said they aimed at Kurdish autonomy within Iraq and a fair share of the oil revenue for Kurdish needs.

The first stage of the rising took the form of inter-tribal warfare, with the Barazanis on the offensive. At the source of the conflict were ancient rivalries as well as new irritations including government interference. As mentioned, tribal fighting had taken place in 1959 and again towards the end of 1960. The Barazanis probably aimed at establishing their hegemony in the Kurdish area by overcoming their foes and the potential allies of the government before rising against the government itself.

The first incident to attract attention was the murder in Feb of Sadiq Miran, chief of the Khosh-Naw tribe, in which a prominent member of the DPK was suspected of being involved. In May or early June, hostilities broke out in Kurdistan and by July the Barazanis and their allies were launching full-scale attacks on their tribal rivals, forcing them to flee and looting and burning their villages.

The Barazanis, it was reported, were joined at various times by the Balik, the Duuki, the Nerva, the Mamash under Abbas Mamand-Agha, and the Ako tribes. The Barazanis' major rivals were the Zibari and Baradost tribes, joined by the Herki, Raika and Surhi. The Barazanis' rivals were apparently armed by the government when the army command decided on a major action against the insurgents.

In July or Aug, the insurgents began to take over government posts and police stations, mostly without open clashes, either by the use of various stratagems or simply by show of force. All through this period, government forces remained passive except for some minor interventions by local garrisons.

By the beginning of Sept several sizable towns in the mountain area were partly or wholly occupied by the insurgents who were on the offensive in the whole mountain crescent of Iraqi Kurdistan stretching for some 600 kms from the meeting-point of the borders of Iraq, Turkey and Syria in the N.W. to the Darbandi Khan area near the Iranian border in the S.E. Zakho, Iraq's northernmost town, familiarized by Qasim's Iraqi unity slogan: "From Zakho in the north to Kuwait in the south," was in the hands of the insurgents. They then attacked army units which were moving to the counteroffensive.

PM Qasim later spoke of a serious attack on an army column on Sept 12 which, he said, was the day the army action started. With the help of the Air Force which, by many accounts, ruthlessly harried rebel concentrations and bombed towns and villages, and the assistance of rival tribes, the Barazanis were gradually driven back towards their mountain stronghold. By mid-Oct, after some five weeks of the government offensive, Qasim claimed that Barazani itself had been occupied and the insurgents defeated. At the same time, the government purged the army and administration of Kurdish personnel of doubtful loyalty, dissolved the DPK, and closed down institutions which seemed to sympathize with the latter. The funds of these bodies and of their prominent members were confiscated. A committee of investigation was set up to inquire into the insurrection.

In the second half of Nov reports appeared which indicated that the government claims of victory had been premature. The mopping-up operations had never been fully effective and by the end of Dec heavy fighting was again reported. Qasim himself stated that the rebellion had broken out afresh.

There were no reliable reports on any foreign interference though Qasim accused the British and "their American partners" of having instigated the insurrection, while some Western and Arab papers reported that Barazani was receiving arms and other aid from the Communist bloc. (See also below under: Question of Foreign Interference.)

PRELUDE TO THE RISING (POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS)

(January-June)

Reasons for Kurdish Discontent. After the outbreak of the rising, The Economist summed up the background as follows: The Kurdish leaders had high hopes for General Qasim's Arab and Kurdish republic. But there had been a long series of disappointments, arising mainly from the procrastination and tactlessness of the central government. The Kurds were irritated by the inefficiency of the land reform scheme, by the order to stop tobacco growing in the area, by new tax laws and by the transfer of Kurdish officials to other parts of Iraq.

Their gradually increasing discontent showed itself at first in inter-tribal jealousies and warfare. (Economist, Sept 23)

Government Harasses DPK. [As already mentioned, the Democratic Party of Iraqi Kurdistan (DPK) was closely linked to the Barazani.] Khabat, organ of the DPK, asserted that members of the party were frequently arrested, deported or deprived of their livelihood, and in general handicapped in their freedom of action, and this despite the party's loyalty which had been recognized by Qasim himself. The paper also demanded the repeal of the emergency measures. (Quoted in Sa'at al-Ahrar, Jan 11, 24)

In March Khabat urged "patriotic forces" to show solidarity with "our ... party in the face of the campaign of vexation to which it is exposed." The paper listed examples. (IT, March 16)

On March 9 a warrant of arrest was reported issued against Ibrahim Ahmad, editor of Khabat, and SG of the DPK Central Committee, on suspicion of being privy to the murder of Shaykh Sadiq Miran, a leader of the Kurdish Khosh-Naw tribe at Shaqlawa (Arbil province) in Feb. The DPK vehemently denied the allegation and asked for a commission of enquiry into Miran's death (Ahali, Feb 26, March 14; Fajr al-Jadid, March 9). The warrant was reported withdrawn on March 10, but Ahmad went into hiding. (ANA, March 10 [13]; Fajr al-Jadid, March 30)

Owing to Ahmad's flight, it was reported, Khabat ceased to appear. (Fajr al-Jadid, March 30)

Earlier however, on March 4, a new Kurdish newspaper, Kurdistan, appeared; its owner was Ibrahim Ahmad, SG of the DPK. (Manar, Jordan, March 6)

In April, the authorities closed down the DPK branches in Mosul and Kirkuk "for deviating from the objectives for which they had been licensed" (Mustaqbal, April 18), and in June the branch at Darbandji Khan (IT, June 22). [For the banning of the party after the outbreak of the rising, see below: Government Counter Activities.]

Questions of National Status. In Jan, the Teachers' Association [then still under leftist leadership] called on the Minister of Education to encourage the development of Kurdish culture and expressed its regrets that the Directorate-General of Kurdish Education had not yet become active. Al-Ahali and Sa'at al-Ahrar associated themselves with this demand, which was repeated a fortnight later by the Arbil branch of the Teachers' Association. (IT, Jan 4; Ahali, Jan 5; Bilad, Jan 20 quot. Sa'at al-Ahrar)

On Feb 20, in a public speech, Qasim suggested by implication that the Kurds did not historically constitute a separate people but were basically "Iraqis". He made no mention in this speech of the "Kurdish nationality" (qawmiah), a term he used frequently in 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 119, 232) and infrequently also later in 1961. Qasim said that Iraq was a partnership between Arabs, Kurds and other minorities, but that this "partnership is indivisible." "I will tell you," Qasim continued, "why our brother Kurds are called by this name": The name derived from the Persian Kurdu, a title bestowed by the Kings of Assyria and Babylon on valiant warriors; with the advent of Islam these warriors fused with the Muslim army. Qasim went on to stress that the Kurds belonged to the oldest inhabitants of Iraq. "We are one nation," he said, and "whoever tries to disrupt our ranks is not of Iraq" (Zaman Feb 22: IT, Feb 23). [The Encyclopedia Britannica (edition of 1951, article Kurdistan) mentions "Gutü or Küti, later on called Kürti by the Assyrians" as peopling the region of the middle Tigris not later than 2000 BC; it does not give the origin of the name, beyond connecting it with "Jebel Judi" in that area.]

Shortly afterwards [the pro-government] Ath-Thawrah published an article headed "Our people—Undivided" which argued that Iraq was not a "conglomerate of peoples" (majma'at al-shu'ub) made up of Arabs, Kurds, Turkomans and others, but one indivisible nation (umma). (Thawrah, March 2)

Khabat protested in the strongest terms against this "attempt to melt down the Kurdish nation" and demanded that the government reiterate its determination to preserve the equality of status of Arabs and Kurds in the Iraqi state. (Khabat, March 6, 7)

Later, Khabat noted that Qasim had not disapproved of the statements made in Ath-Thawrah. (Quot. in IT, March 17)

Barazani's Aims: Autonomy Within Iraq. [Although non-Kurdish sources alleged that the rebels were out to establish an independent state, Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani himself did not go beyond autonomy within Iraq.]

[The following item from a UAR source was unconfirmed.] MENA reported that the insurrectionist movement began early in March when the Kurds set up a state in Arbil province, and hoisted the Kurdish flag—a dagger and a rope against a yellow background. (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19])

Towards the end of Sept it was reported in Iraq that the diary of Ibrahim Ahmad, SG of "the traitorous DPK," proved that his party had intended to set up a separate Kurdish state in northern Iraq. (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 27)

In contrast, Mulla Mustafa was quoted in a press interview a month after his return to Iraq as saying that he wanted "legitimate Kurdish aspirations realized" without harming "the existence and integrity of the Iraqi Republic." (Nahdah, Beirut, Feb 20, quot. by S.E. van Rooy, Survey, London, Aug 26)

A journalist who visited Kurdistan during the same period quoted a wealthy Kurd, and supporter of Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani—described by an official as "an important Kurdish nationalist" who could raise 200 armed men—as saying: "We may talk a lot about national sovereignty but all we realistically hope for is more control over local affairs and a fairer share of the oil revenue." He complained that not a single state or person had a word to say about the plight of the Kurds. "We are a people. We have rights." (Scotman, Feb 18)

[Eighteen months of mounting tension and open warfare appeared to effect little change in the Barazani's aims.] In Aug 1962 the American reporter Dana Adams Schmidt, who visited the rebellious area and interviewed Mulla Mustafa, defined the Kurds' aim as "to force Qasim to grant the Kurds an autonomous state of Kurdistan within Iraq." (NYT, Sept 13, 1962)

THE RISING—FIRST STAGE INTER-TRIBAL WARFARE

Earlier Tribal Clashes: As already mentioned, in autumn 1960, the Zibāri tribes under Shaykh Mahmūd and the Baradost tribes under Shaykh Rashīd Loīān were reported to have raided villages belonging to the followers of Mulla Mustafa Barazāni. Qasim, it was reported, had established contacts with these tribes and refrained from prosecuting those responsible for the raids. (NYT, Dec 28, 30, 1960; Monde, Sept 26; see also MER 1960, p 251.)

[Corrigendum: The names of these two tribes in MER 1960 should be corrected as spelled here.]

Barazāni Prepares Rising. Mulla Mustafa al-Barazāni returned from the USSR to Iraq on Jan 13. (Ahali, Jan 15)

Some time in the spring, probably in Feb or March, Mulla Mustafa left Baghdad for Barazān, where according to an account published later in Al-Hayāt he started his preparations for the rising. He had in his possession large sums of money which he used to buy arms, even at very high prices. Leaders of the Democratic Party of Kurdistan and Kurdish Communists from the towns joined Barazāni's ranks; the latter brought with them automatic weapons and mortars which had fallen into their hands at the time of the Shawwāf rising in March 1959. He also sent emissaries to Beirut to solicit the support of the Kurds there for the intended rising which was aimed at partial autonomy within Iraq, if not an independent Kurdish state in the north of the country. (Hayat, Sept 20)

A UAR source said Qasim himself had armed the Barazānis with 1,200 rifles "when they cooperated with the Communists after the Shawwāf revolt" in 1959.

This source also claimed that "Kurds in Arbil" had set up a Kurdish state early in March and hoisted the Kurdish flag. [This was not confirmed.] (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19])

The Barazāni Offensive. After full-scale insurrection had broken out, a UAR source, MENA, gave the following account: The disturbances took a violent turn at the beginning of May in the areas of Amadiya, Dohuk and Zakho in the northern area of the great Zab river. Led by Mulla Mustafa and supported by the Duskī and Nerva tribes, the Barazānis attacked the Zibāri tribes, led by Mahmūd az-Zibāri—and their supporters, the Raika and Surchi tribes—and burned their villages. Consequently, the Zibāris were forced to move to adjoining districts to seek the state's protection; others moved over to Turkish soil. The security forces intervened and many incidents occurred; by mid-Sept the security forces were not yet in control of the situation. (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19])

On May 17 Qasim received a delegation of Zibār Kurds and discussed with them their problems. Qasim assured the delegation that he was acting for the good of all, without discrimination, an official bulletin said. (IT; Sant al-Ahrar, May 19)

That there were already inter-tribal troubles in the area as early as May, or at the latest, the beginning of June, was also born out by Shaykh Ahmad, Mulla Mustafa's brother, who called on Qasim early in June, as he said, after he had "learned of some disputes between some Kurdish tribes." (IT, June 12)

According to a Le Monde correspondent "the Barazānis reacted on June 8." On that day Mulla Mustafa carried out an attack on the Zibāris which gave him most of the weapons with which the Zibāris had been armed "by the Baghdad authorities." At the same time Mulla Mustafa addressed a note to Qasim demanding the liberation of political prisoners, cessation of repressive measures, and "the fulfilment of promises for autonomy"; no reply was received. [A second note was dispatched on August 30. This time Qasim asked—through the governor of Arbil province—for a fortnight to reflect on the request. However, on September 10 the Iraqi army started its offensive against the insurgents (see below).] (Monde, Sept 26)]

A summary of events in Al-Hayāt placed the beginning of the Barazāni offensive in July when, after completing his preparations, Mulla Mustafa left Barazān and first attacked the tribe of Kalhi Agha in the Amadiya area. Though the tribe offered strong resistance, the Barazānis, with the advantage of modern weapons, defeated it and destroyed 25 villages. (Hayat, Sept 20)

According to Turkish sources, 83 families, counting 750 souls, of the Kalhi (spelled here Kelha) tribe (ashlrah) which belonged to the Baradost tribal federation (qabūlah), crossed into Turkey in mid-July. The tribe's chief, Kalhi Agha, said they had resisted the Barazānis for several days; only 60 soldiers had come to their assistance and "naturally" they were of no help (Cumhuriyet, July 23, 24, 27). The tribe returned in Oct, according to a Baghdad report. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 8)

Turkmen Attacked. During the same period it was reported that following upon clashes between Turkmen tribesmen and Kurdish followers of Mustafa al-Barazāni, 800 Turkmen had taken refuge in Turkey. (Times, July 24)

[There was no corroboration that Turkmen had crossed into Turkey, whereas on the same day the Turkish press reported that 750 Kurds had crossed the border—the Al-Hayāt report, quoted above, also made no mention of the involvement of Turkmen.]

MENA claimed, however, that the government had also armed Turkmen alongside Kurds to fight the Barazānis, but this report apparently referred to a later date. (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19])

Clashes between Kurds and Turkmen in Kirkuk were reported some six months earlier; three Turkmen had been killed and several wounded on March 6 (Hayat, March 25); [there was no indication whether this incident was related to the rising.]

The Barazāni Offensive—Continued. Having defeated the Kalhi Agha tribe, the Al-Hayāt report continued, the Barazānis attacked the Zibāris [apparently at the end of July or in Aug], overcame their resistance and burned their villages.

The chiefs of the affected tribes sent a delegation to the governor at Mosul and to Baghdad asking for government intervention, but to no avail.

Meanwhile, all through Aug, Barazāni steadily widened his field of operation, attacked police stations as far as the town of Shaqlawa, took policemen prisoners while others joined his ranks, exacted tribute and took hostages. He then occupied the towns of Zakho and Dohuk; the army units there withdrew to Mosul, since they had no orders to fight.

During the same period, another tribe, the Mamash under Abbas Mamand Agha of Raziya, joined the Barazanis in the rising. Eight Kurdish officers were reported to have deserted the Iraqi army and joined the Barazanis. (Monde, Sept 26; Hayat, Sept 20)

[Following are reports which would indicate that large-scale fighting started in July, as reported by Al-Hayat, though minor clashes may have started earlier. The earliest report on tribal fighting in 1961 available to the editor was that of July 27, quoted above, on the flight of the Kalhi tribe.]

At the end of July the [pro-UAR] Lebanese paper Al-Siyasah reported heavy fighting between the Barazanis and their Kurdish opponents headed by "Shaykh Ala ad-Din al-Uthmani, the head of the Naqshabandi sect" (Siyasah, July 30). Further reports in this paper at the beginning of Aug claimed that there had been 1,000 killed and 500 wounded, and that the Iraqi army had failed to separate the rival forces and had been completely forced out of the Dohuk-Agra-Amadiya area. (Siyasah, Aug 9). The next day, the paper claimed that the Iraqi air force had bombed the rebel area (Siyasah, Aug 10). [There were no other reports on bombing during this period.]

Later in the month, a Cairo source reported that 100 persons had been killed and 20 villages burnt in fighting between the Barazanis and the Zibaris. (Haq'a'iq, Aug 17)

The Iraqi government twice denied these reports as completely untrue. (Hayat, Aug 16, 24)

At the end of Aug, the [clandestine Communist] station, Our Radio, broadcasting in Turkish, spoke of "significant clashes... between popular Kurdish forces and reactionary Kurds." The Democratic Party of Kurdistan had enlisted about 11,000 fighters in the Barazan area, commanded by Mustafa Barazani. Feudal Kurdish leaders who had betrayed the Kurdish cause and some of their men, 170 in all, had been annihilated. The reactionaries had been armed by Qasim. The situation was tense. "Fighting may break out any minute between the progressive Kurdish forces and the Middle Eastern reactionaries." (Our Radio, Aug 29 [Sept 1])

Army Remains Passive. [All through the period recorded above and until approximately Sept 10, the Iraqi army apparently remained passive, save for some attempts at intervention by local garrisons. This state of affairs emerges quite clearly from the above reports and the fact acknowledged by PM Qasim himself that by the beginning of Sept the insurgents had attacked and at times occupied towns in the greater part of Iraqi Kurdistan.] Al-Hayat said that the government first treated the tribal fighting as an internal Kurdish conflict. When the Barazanis became active outside their own area and the situation worsened, army units commenced patrolling the main roads. Only the occupation of Zakho and Dohuk and the attack on an army unit on the "Darbandi Khan road" in the first week of Sept decided the army command to intervene in force. (Hayat, Sept 20)

[Apparently referring to these events] PM Qasim said in his press conference on Sept 23, after describing the attacks of the insurgents: "We were merciful towards them so as to bring them back to the track of reason..." (IT, Sept 28)

Reasons Behind Tribal Warfare. [The general picture emerging from the reports was that the tribal warfare was related to old tribal rivalries which had become identified to a certain extent with varying attitudes towards the government and Kurdish national aspirations. From the point of view of Mulla Mustafa, overpowering the anti-Barazani or pro-government tribes was a necessary preliminary to the anti-government struggle, aimed, as mentioned earlier, at Kurdish autonomy.]

A UAR source attributed the conflict between the Barazanis and the Zibaris to "old tribal reasons connected with leadership" but added that this took a violent turn in May after "the Communist Kurds, who are cultured Barazani Kurds known as Al-Bartiyân [i.e. party people—members of Al-Bart (The Party), the popular name of the DPK] incited the Kurdish youth to proclaim an independent Kurdish Republic. The armed Zibari, Raika and Surchi tribes did not support Barazani's separatist movement but, exploiting his dispute with Qasim, "they began struggling against atheism with a view to achieving the unity of Iraq and of the Arab nation" (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19]). [The MENA report is obviously garbled. The same source said that in May 1961 it was the Barazanis who took the offensive (quoted above). Perhaps the last sentence here should be read as referring to the Zibari attacks on the Barazanis in the autumn of 1960.]

A [clandestine Communist] station described the conflict as one between popular and progressive Kurdish forces—the Barazanis on the one hand, and reactionaries, armed by Qasim, on the other. (Our Radio in Turkish, Aug 29 [Sept 1])

Western papers, however, thought that the description of the background as an anti-Communist struggle against the allegedly pro-Communist Mulla Mustafa was an oversimplification. They did not regard Barazani as a pro-Communist but as a Kurdish nationalist who made use of Communist support for the nationalist cause and for serving his own interests and those of his tribe. It was thought that the Barazanis were trying to impose their will on less disaffected tribes. (Scottman, Sept 5, 20; Guardian, Sept 18; Economist, Sept 23; Observer, Sept 24)

The conflict between the major antagonists, the Barazanis and the Zibaris, reportedly went back to 1945, when the Zibaris, who had originally joined the Barazanis in the rising against the government, changed sides. When the Barazanis left the country, first for Iran and in 1946 for the USSR, the government gave their lands and houses to the Zibaris; but when the Zibaris crossed the border in 1958 for fear of the new regime while the Barazanis returned, the latter repossessed their lands. [Note: Mulla Mustafa's wife and mother of five of his sons was the daughter of Shaykh Mahmud, the Zibari chief.] (Hayat, Sept 20; Scottman, Sept 5; NYT, Sept 11, 1962; see also above: Background.)

Insurgents Aided by Kurdish Tribes from Iran and Turkey? Brig. Mahmud Abd ar-Razzaq, GOC 2nd Div. [Northern Iraq], related that during the rising 2,000 Kurds of the Covan tribes of Turkey, and 1,500 Kurds of the Mankur tribes of Iran, had crossed the frontiers into Iraq, "at the suggestion of well-known quarters which have been exposed by the Leader" [i.e. Britain and the USA]. CENTO was not pleased with the progress of Iraq, Abd ar-Razzaq said, and therefore resorted to conspiracies. (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 26)

THE RISING—SECOND STAGE THE BARAZANIS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT (September)

Position in the Barazani Camp. At the beginning of Sept, the Barazanis apparently turned what had hitherto been mainly tribal warfare into open insurrection against the government.

According to Mulla Mustafa, quoted by Dana Adams Schmidt, an American reporter who interviewed him a year later, Mulla Mustafa had withdrawn to his tribal area after Qassim, in July, had rejected a petition listing grievances from a Kurdish delegation. He felt then that the time was not ripe for revolt; younger [DPK] party leaders in Sulaymaniya and the Darbandi Khan area, who began a revolt against his advice, were quickly suppressed [apparently in Sept]. The government then bombed the village of Barazani, apparently on the assumption that the Barazanis must be involved in any trouble in Kurdistan. Shaykh Ahmad [Mulla Mustafa's brother] hurried to Baghdad to renew his pledges of loyalty to Qassim and proclaim the neutrality of the Barazani tribal area. Once more, Mulla Mustafa disagreed with his brother and decided to fight back. His call attracted 7,000 to 8,000 Barazanis (NYT, Sept 11, 1962). (The sequence of events listed by Barazani is contrary to all other reports; it is quoted here as an account of the origin of the rising as given by its leader.)

As far back as June, Shaykh Ahmad expressed his support for Qassim and his reservations regarding "tribal disputes" when he was received by Qassim. He later told the press that he had come to listen to Qassim's counsel after learning of "some disputes between some Kurdish tribes." As requested by Qassim, Shaykh Ahmad would call for the surrender of accused fugitives. He concluded by declaring his complete loyalty to Qassim and his desire to prevent the activity of divisive elements in the Kurdish area. (Zaman, June 11, 13; IT, June 12)

Later, he sent Qassim a message of support of his claims to Kuwait, in the name of "all sincere Barazanis." (IT, July 10)

Nonetheless, in an account of the rising on Sept 23 Qassim included Shakh Ahmad among the fugitive rebels. (IT, Oct 1)

The Barazani Offensive. According to MENA, on Sept 9 the Barazanis blocked the roads in the Dohuk-Zakho-Amadiya area. Within a day or two, police patrols had either been captured or forced off the roads, and by Sept 11 "the security forces had lost control." The insurgents occupied Zakho town, still in their possession at the time of the report (Sept 17), Barazani village, and a large number of police posts from the Zakho area to Halabja [about 100 kms NNE of Khanaqin]. On Sept 12 government buildings were occupied in the towns of Amadiya and Halabja, and further police posts were taken, particularly in the Ruwanduz and Penjin regions [near the Iranian frontier, north of Halabja]. Road and telephone communication in the entire region was at that time said to be at the mercy of the rebels. The Balik tribe was mentioned as a confederate of the Barazanis, active north of Sulaymaniya (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19]). The Ako tribe was also mentioned as allied to the Barazanis. (Times, Nov 1)

A similar report in a Jordanian paper [possibly relying on a common source] also giving Sept 9 as the date of the concerted attacks and announcing rebel occupation of Zakho, Amadiya and Dohuk, stated that large numbers of Kurdish army officers and other ranks had deserted to the rebels. (Jihadd, Jordan, Oct 11)

According to a reputed Iraqi army lieutenant who had deserted to Kuwait, the Kurds were besieging Kirkuk, Shaqlawa, Salah ad-Din and Sarsank on Sept 10. (R. Kuwait, Sept 16 [19])

A [sketchy] account of the events was also given by

PM. Qassim, in a five-hour-long press conference on Sept 23. He gave no date for the outbreak of hostilities but said that on Sept 12 the rebels had launched a "general attack on the army" near Baryan, while it was moving from Kirkuk to Sulaymaniya; there were 23 casualties "and a number of officers and NCO's became victims of treachery and tension." On the same day, Qassim said, "the army achieved full control." The area affected by the rising, he said, covered Zakho, Amadiya, Dohuk, Merga Sur, Rayat, Shaqlawa and Koy Sanjaq. Altogether 500 villages had been attacked, besides a large number of police posts and government offices and installations. Police posts had been shelled by mortars. At Merga Sur, the rebels had stolen ID11,000 from the Treasury and there had been looting and burning of houses in the villages.

A rise employed by these "highwaymen" was to call at government offices, ostensibly on official business, and take over control by surprise.

The "Darbandi Khan US company," Qassim said, had complained to him that "some local troops had stopped work there by force from Sept 6-10 and the tunnel had been damaged." [The huge Darbandi Khan dam was at the time in the final stages of construction.]

At one time Zakho, Swara Tuka and Sarsank were in rebel hands, and the senior officials at Zakho were imprisoned. Qassim indicated that the whole crescent between Zakho and Kirkuk was cut off by the rebels, until the army counterattacked. (IT, Sept 24-Oct 2; INA, Sept 26)

In Aug 1962 Mulla Mustafa told the American reporter Dana Adams Schmidt of the traditional guerrilla tactics used by his forces, which had cost them only one man to every forty lost by the enemy. He estimated that the rebels had killed 4,000 enemy soldiers "in the last year" and had taken the same number of prisoners. (NYT, Sept 10, 1962)

Hostile sources claimed that in order to compel recruits to join their movement, the "rebels" had shot and kidnapped people. (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 19)

GOVERNMENT COUNTER ACTIVITIES

(September-December)

The Counter Offensive. In his press conference on Sept 23 Qassim said that the army had moved in "and restored security about a week ago." Yet, he asserted that on Sept 12 the armed forces had "achieved complete control over the situation in no more than 24 hours." Since then all the strongholds occupied by the rebels had been retaken, the roads opened, and prisoners freed. The rebels had been reduced to "vagabonds pursued by the army," trying to escape to Iran and Turkey. Others had surrendered, including Ahbās Mamand Agha. At present, Qassim declared, "we are pursuing the masterminds of treason; the defeated evildoers are still in two small areas," and in a day or two they would be finally destroyed. (INA, Sept 26; IT, Sept 28)

Role of Air Force. The Iraqi air force apparently played a prominent role in the government offensive. The Barazani area and the approaches to Zakho and Dohuk were said to have been bombed on Sept 12; the next day rockets were used against targets in the Amadiya area, and rebel concentrations were strafed with machine-gun fire. (R. Damascus, Sept 17 [19])

In Dohuk, according to another source, the insurgents had entrenched themselves in the water and electricity works on the assumption that the government would not want to destroy them, but they were bombed and over 100 insurgents were killed. The survivors had to evacuate the town.

In Amadiya, some 140 policemen had entrenched themselves in the fortress, in the centre of the town. To evict them, the insurgents had positioned machineguns on a minaret of the mosque, which was consequently destroyed by the airforce. The fortress was supplied by parachute drops. (Hayat, Sept 20)

Ground forces too received close air support. (Jihad, Jordan, Oct 11)

There were numerous reports of indiscriminate air attacks on villages in the affected area, causing heavy loss of life among non-combatants. (Daily Telegraph, Oct 10; Times, Nov 1; World Marxist Review, March 1962)

In Oct, an Iraqi source reported that the rebels had suffered heavily from air attacks while crossing the Great Zab river during their withdrawal in the direction of Barazani. The air force was assisting in mopping-up operations in the Barazani area. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 8)

"Rebels Defeated" But Pockets Holding Out. At the beginning of Oct the Iraqi press reported that loyal Kurds "continued to chase the remnants of the insurrectionists... assisted by the patriotic authorities"; a rebel leader, Mustafa Wallah, had surrendered somewhere in the Ruwanduz district with 100 of his followers. (IT, Oct 3)

A few days later, it was reported that the rebels had withdrawn towards the Barazani area and the government forces were in pursuit. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 8)

On Oct 8 Qassim was reported to have stated that the army was now in control of Barazani and that the pursuit of the remnants of the rebel forces had been completed. (Fajr al-Jadid, Oct 9; see also Zaman, Oct 12)

[There were reports at the time—later proved untrue—that Mulla Mustafa was captured or killed.]

PM Qassim was reported "to be delighted and in high spirits over the results of his offensive which he has been personally directing." It was believed that the rebels had been counting on the defection of Kurds from the army but the latter had remained loyal. Suspected units had been transferred to other parts of Iraq. (Daily Telegraph, Oct 10)

During this time and again in Nov, Kurdish refugees were reported to have returned from Turkey. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 8; Ulus, Ankara, Nov 16)

At the beginning of Nov, an Iraqi source said that some rebel pockets were still holding out. (Bayan, Nov 8)

Later in the month reports indicated that although "the fire has been subdued, the embers have been scattered rather than stamped out." But, concluded a foreign observer, the movement had proved premature. "The Kurds, although capable of creating a major nuisance, are no match for the Iraqi army and air force." (Scotman, Nov 22)

[At this time however, there were already reports of a renewed flareup for which see below: Renewed Heavy Fighting.]

Kurdish Support for Regime. [Qassim in his press conference of Sept 23, quoted above, and the Iraqi press throughout the remaining months of the year, referred to "loyal Kurds" who continued to pursue the rebels in cooperation with the authorities.]

It was reported that the government had armed the Zibari tribes, the Turkomans and the "Black Arabs of Huwayjah" (R. Damaic, Sept 17 [19]). Al-Hayat said that the army command permitted the arming of a limited number of the Barazani's Kurdish foes only after it had decided to launch its offensive. (Jayat, Sept 20)

The press published many cables of support from Kurdish chiefs, prominently those of the Zibari and Baradost tribes, the Barazani's traditional rivals, whom the government had reportedly armed (see above). Cables were quoted from Mahmud Agha az-Zibari and Rashid Lolani "the chief of the Baradost tribe" (IT, Sept 22), dozens of other named Kurdish tribes, the mayor of Shaqlawa, a spokesman for the people of Ruwanduz, "the farmers of Arbil province" and others. (IT, Sept 17, 18, 19, 20, 25, 27, 29; Oct, 2, 5, 6, 8, 13, 16)

The government also claimed support from Barazani and released for publication on Oct 7 a cable sent to Qassim by Shaykh Ahmad al-Barazani, Mulla Mustafa's brother, in which he renewed his allegiance, denounced his brother's subversive activity and stated that he had sent his own son Muhammad Khalid to cooperate with the Iraqi army. (IT, Oct 8)

A few days later the support was announced of Muhammad Mahmud al-Barazani, Mukhtar of Andala village "and his group of fifty", as well as that of nine more Barazani notables with their followers. (IT, Oct 12)

Various Government Measures. [Apart from operational measures proper, the authorities reacted to the insurrection by dissolving the Democratic Party of Kurdistan (DPK), deporting persons of doubtful loyalty, ordering confiscations and closing down local clubs suspected of sympathy with the insurgents.]

[Qassim announced an amnesty for rebels surrendering to the authorities. Various news items released were evidently designed to show the regime's concern for Kurdish culture. At the same time, the authorities stressed the ingratitude which, they said, lay behind the Kurdish rising.]

Kurdish "Ingratitude." An official handout stressed that since the Revolution greater progress in various social and economic fields had been achieved in the predominantly Kurdish provinces of Ahil and Sulaymaniya than in the country at large. (INA, Sept 21)

In his press conference of Sept 23, Qassim detailed the benefits, which he said, the Barazani had obtained under his government. Every Barazani who had returned from exile had been paid until that very day a monthly salary. A total amount of ID522,183 had been spent on the development of the Barazani area. The government had intended to implement the "Rizan agricultural project" designed "to change the nature of the Barazani from that of aggressiveness (fajdah) to a civilized conduct"; the evildoers however had realized the danger to their designs in such a development and had therefore returned to their previous professions as highwaymen and agents of British imperialism. (Zaman, Sept 24; INA, Sept 26)

Higher Investigation Board. A Higher Investigation Board was set up to inquire into the Kurdish insurrection, with Brig. Hammudah Mahdi, 1st Division, as chairman. (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 27, Nov 6)

The DPK Dissolved. [As the DPK had had its fortunes linked with those of the Barazani at least since 1958 its dissolution by the authorities was a foregone conclusion.]

At his press conference on Sept 23, Qassim announced the dissolution of the DPK for contravening the Associations Law by not holding its annual conference, or even a single meeting for over a year. (IT, Sept 24; INA, Sept 26)

On Sept 26 the party headquarters at Sulaymaniya were closed. (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 27)

In Oct, the party was dissolved by court order and its entire property confiscated, in accordance with para. 4 of the Associations Law, "for having sown discord among the people" (Ahlal, Oct 10). Subsequently, the licence of Ahbab, the DPK's daily, was revoked. (Mustaqbal, Oct 30)

Confiscations, Deportations and Related Measures. A number of inhabitants of Arbil province, among them officials, were exiled from the area. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 26)

The property of persons implicated in the insurrection was confiscated (Ahd al-Jadid, Sept 19, Oct 8, 30; Hayat, Nov 8; Jihad, Jordan, Nov 21). Persons affected included the fugitive Umar Mustafa, called Umar Dabbab, member of the Political Bureau of the dissolved DPK, as well as five sons of Mulla Mustafa—Ubaydallah, Nu'man, Idris, Mas'ud and Sabir, and five daughters. (IT, Nov 27)

A headmaster and a teacher in the north were dismissed in connection with the rising. (Ahd al-Jadid, Nov 10)

Various clubs in Arbil and Sulaymaniya were closed by court order "for deviating from the purpose for which they were established." (Zaman, Dec 26)

Army Personnel Detained. Col. Taha Bamirri and Lieut. Ahmad Mulla Hussein were ordered to be detained until Nov 25. Col. Bamirri was once Commander of the People's Resistance Forces. (Zaman, Nov 15)

Amnesty. On Nov 23 Qassim announced a pardon to "the poor and the peasants who had been deceived into participating in the recent insurrection," once they had surrendered to the authorities. This announcement released a flood of messages thanking Qassim for his magnanimity. (Zaman, Nov 24, 25; IT, Nov 26, 27, 28, 29)

Kurdish Education Fostered. The Ministry of Education added two Kurdish lessons per week to the primary schools' curriculum [in which Kurdish was taught] (Bilad, Oct 6). The Kurdish language was made a compulsory subject of study in teachers' colleges (Akhbar, Oct 31). It was reported that Muhammad al-Khal Hachi, member of the Iraqi Academy of Sciences, was compiling the first commentary on the Qur'an in Kurdish, in the tradition of Muhammad Abduh. (Zaman, Oct 21)

RENEWED HEAVY FIGHTING

(December)

Already at the beginning of Nov foreign sources anticipated a renewal of the Kurdish rebellion, though heavy fighting was not expected during the winter. The Economist wrote: "The Kurdish revolt in the north was halted last month by ruthless bombing, and the sizable guerrilla force hiding in the mountains, still led by Mulla Mustafa Barazani, is unlikely to make much headway during the winter. Militarily effective as they were, General Qassim's brutal tactics will have done nothing to endear him to his Kurdish subjects. The danger of a better organized, more united Kurdish rebellion has been postponed, not ended; and General Qassim will probably find that having been brutal once, he has no alternative but to be brutal again." (Economist, Nov 4)

In mid-Nov it was reported that the insurrection had broken out again. (Hawadith, Beirut, Nov 17)

On Dec 18 an ultimatum scattered by aircraft called on "all those who evade until now justice after the crushing of the abortive imperialistic insurrection in the north—the outlaws, brigands and gangsters—to surrender forthwith unconditionally, in which case they would be included in the recent amnesty. (IT, Dec 19)

At the end of Dec, fierce fighting was reported from the northern frontier between rebellious tribes and Iraqi army units advancing from Mosul Command to subdue them.

Military operations supported by aircraft were estimated to have resulted in the death of 400 tribesmen and about 40 military.

Latest reports were that Kurdish nationalists had consolidated positions along the whole massif from Zakho to the Iranian border, and that Mulla Mustafa Barazani had retaken Mahdiya [Amadiya?], where he had established a Kurdish administration.

The Kurds between Zakho and Barazani had fallen back into the snowbound mountains where steep passes lead into Turkey. (Daily Telegraph, Dec 30)

A Turkish paper reported at the beginning of Jan 1962 that Kurdish tribes had crossed the border from Iraq, fighting among themselves, and had left 30 dead on Turkish soil. (Dunya, Istanbul, Jan 2, 1962)

PM Qassim himself affirmed that the rebellion had broken out again. The rebels had exploited the partial withdrawal of the army from the area to renew their attacks on government offices, police posts and villages; Mustafa al-Barazani had refused to surrender. Qassim added that these provocations were evidence of the alliance between the rebels and the imperialists; however, Iraq was prepared to stand fast. (Thaurah, Dec 31)

QUESTIONS OF FOREIGN ATTITUDES

AND INTERFERENCE

[PM Qassim accused the British and "their American partners" of having instigated the insurgents in order to place Iraq at a disadvantage in the oil negotiations and the Kuwait dispute; at the same time he explicitly exonerated the USSR. Some Western and Arab papers thought however that Moscow might be involved. No verifiable proof was offered either way and Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani denied any foreign assistance. The UK protested Qassim's charges.]

[Communist sources praised the insurgents as progressives fighting against reaction but expressed themselves forcefully against any intention to establish an independent Kurdish state; they called for a joint struggle of Kurds and progressive forces on behalf of "democracy and progress" inside the existing states and advocated local autonomy for the Kurds.]

Qassim Accuses UK, US, Exonerates USSR. At his press conference on Sept 23 PM Qassim accused the British of backing the Kurdish rebellion: "His entire statement was couched in terms of a denunciation of 'British imperialism.' Behind the rising are the British themselves and their stooges among the Americans; there are no other sides," Qassim said. The British embassy [in Baghdad] was "the mother" of the "mutinous movement, and the Americans its partners." Mustafa al-Barazani and his brother had cooperated with British imperialism as early as 1933 and again in 1945; Qassim quoted at length what he said were letters exchanged between Mulla Mustafa and the British and documents proving this claim. Now the British were aiming to distract Iraq from pursuing her oil rights and to tie up her army in the north while they schemed against her in Kuwait. The British believed that it would take no less than three years to quell the insurrection. Iraq might be forced to close the British embassy if it did not stop interfering, and "put an end to the disgraceful acts against the safety" of Iraq, Qasim warned.

In reply to a question Qasim said that it was definitely established that the USSR was not involved in the Kurdish rebellion. (IT, Sept 24, 27; INA Sept 26)

UK Protests Rejected, Britons Arrested. As reported in Baghdad, the Iraqi Foreign Ministry rejected a protest made by the British Ambassador on Sept 25 against accusations of British complicity in the Kurdish rising. (IT, Sept 28)

On Oct 16 it was officially announced that two British engineers working for the IPC had been arrested in connection with the Kurdish rising (IT, Oct 17, 18). On Nov 11 Iraq "strongly rejected" a British protest over the matter (IT, Nov 12). The two men were set free "as an act of clemency on the approach of Christmas" [together with the three British service men captured earlier near the Kuwait border] and they left Iraq for the UK on Dec 13. (IT, Dec 12, 14)

Soviet Interests Seen in Kurdish Rising. Western commentators were inclined to see a Soviet interest in an independent Kurdistan as a means of gaining a foothold inside the "northern tier"-CENTO countries or, at least, to keep the Kurdish question alive as an irritant to Turkey and Iran—the allies of the West. (See e.g. H.A.R. Philby in Scotsman, Nov 22; New Republic, NY, Oct 23)

Communist Financial Aid Alleged. After the insurrection had broken out, Lebanese newspapers alleged that the insurgents had bought weapons and ammunition with money obtained by Mulla Mustafa from the Communist bloc. (Kul Shay, Sept 16; Hayat, Sept 20)

Communists Demand Arab-Kurdish Joint Struggle for Progress, Support Local Autonomy, Oppose Independent Kurdistan. The Kurdish rising was not reported in the Soviet press. (Mizan, Nov)

Salām Adil (alias Hussein Radawi), first secretary of the Iraqi Communist party, stated at the CPSU Congress in Moscow in Oct that the Arabs and the Kurds—the "two main nationalities" which represent "our Iraqi people" —were "convinced of the necessity of strengthening their joint struggle for democracy against imperialist plots aimed at the disruption of the nationalist ranks, against the policy of repression and persecution of the Kurdish people of Iraq..." (Pravda, Oct 25; Mizan, Nov)

[Other Communist comment and statements not emanating directly from Moscow were more explicit on the themes included in Adil's statement.]

In Aug as quoted above (see The Barazāni Offensive Continued), Our Radio, the clandestine Communist station broadcasting in Turkish, hailed the Barazāni as progressives who were fighting reactionaries armed by Qasim.

In Oct, an article in a Communist publication detailing the policies and tactics of the Iraqi CP said it upheld "the right of self-determination for the Kurd nation (now divided between Iraq, Iran and Turkey)" but combated both "nationalist-extremist tendencies among the Kurds" and "Arab chauvinism." (W. Marx Rev., Oct)

During the same period a Communist broadcast in Persian said that the secession of Kurdistan from Iraq, Iran, Turkey and Syria and the creation of a Kurdish government was a scheme of Anglo-American imperialism and the Shah of Iran who was to head such a government. The DPK in Iraq had posed demands: to end the despotic one-man government and to honour para. 3 of the provisional constitution which said that the Iraqi republic was the common homeland of Arabs and Kurds. [The para. in question said they were "partners in the country".] The government, however, had rejected these legitimate demands, savagely attacked the Kurds and armed treacherous tribal chiefs. Granting democratic rights in Iraq should put an end to the civil war. The true freedom of the Kurds in Iraq, Iran and Turkey could only be achieved through a joint struggle with their "brother nationalists" to free these countries from the "slavery of reaction and imperialism." (Payk-e Iran, Berlin (GDR), Oct 21 [EE 30])

Turkey. Hürriyet reported from Ankara that Mulla Mustafa al-Barazāni would be arrested by Turkish authorities should he attempt to enter Turkey. Furthermore, an Iraqi-Turkish agreement provided for the return to Iraq of inhabitants of the north of that country who had sought asylum in Turkey (Hürriyet, Sept 27). (On crossings of the Turkish frontier by combatants and refugees from Iraq, see above under various headings.)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

The event that most influenced Iraq's international position in 1961 was the Kuwait crisis, which ensued when PM Abd al-Karim Qasim claimed the newly independent State of Kuwait as an Iraqi district. (For a detailed synopsis on the crisis, see pp. 117 ff)

In Arab affairs Iraq continued to advocate inter-Arab solidarity instead of the unification of Arab countries, for which the UAR strove. (Iraq did not regard her claim to Kuwait as contravening this policy for she regarded her an integral part of her territory.) The Baghdad conference of Arab foreign ministers (January) was in line with this policy. Iraq's efforts prior to the conference helped substantially in bringing Tunisia back into the League and thus strengthened the advocates of Arab solidarity. At the conference itself PM Qasim and FM Jawād exerted more efforts to strengthen the spirit of solidarity. During the year, the consistency of Iraq's policy was demonstrated in her attitude to various inter-Arab issues. Thus Iraq proposed to strengthen the League Charter while providing for more equality among its signatories (i.e. to make the League less dependent on Cairo.) On the other hand, Iraq opposed the UAR's scheme for economic union and recommended cooperation through the League's Economic Council. As regards the "Palestine Entity," Iraq continued to urge the former Palestinian Arabs to rely on their own efforts "like the Algerians" and to work towards the establishment of the "eternal Palestinian republic." Iraq continued to foster her "Palestinian Liberation Army"—a small unit attached to the Iraqi army—as well as maintaining good relations with Hajj Amin al-Husseini, the head of the Arab Higher Committee, who had fallen out with the UAR.

The crisis that ensued from Iraq's claim to Kuwait again isolated her in the Arab League. Relations between Iraq and individual Arab states, however, did not noticeably deteriorate over the crisis apart from those with Saudi Arabia, Kuwait's other neighbour.

Iraq demonstrated her sympathies with Syria soon after the latter's secession from the UAR though she delayed recognition until after President Abdel Nasser had lifted his diplomatic blockade on the new republic. In the breakup of the UAR Qasim found justification for his views on Arab unity; he remarked that Arab as well as other empires had always been doomed to failure. Iraq and Syria concluded an economic agreement which, they claimed, represented real Arab solidarity. Otherwise Iraq made no move to improve her inter-Arab position in the new situation where Cairo was isolated from most of the Arab countries.

As far as the world powers were concerned, Iraq continued to pursue her own brand of positive neutralism or non-alignment, (see MER 1960, p 258). In the second half of the year, however, Iraqi pronouncements became increasingly anti-Western and pro-USSR in the wake of three developments: the IPC refused to accede to Iraqi demands in the oil negotiations (see below); the regime professed to see the hands of Britain and the US in the Kurdish rising (p 287 h); and the Kuwait crisis found Iraq and the West, especially the UK, on opposite sides, whilst the USSR supported Iraq.

At both the 15th and 16th sessions of the UN General Assembly, Iraq was one of the Arab countries that had the lowest voting coincidence with the US and the highest with the Communist countries, (the others being Morocco, the UAR and Yemen.) At the 16th session, Iraq had the highest rate of coincidence with the Communist countries of any ME and North African country.

Iraq's anti-Western sentiments found expression at the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries where she was represented by Foreign Minister Hashim Jawād. Her attitude was especially conspicuous as the UAR was among the leading moderates at the conference. Unlike Abdel Nasser, Jawād made no mention of the USSR's resumption of nuclear tests, an issue that agitated the conference; he charged the Western powers with fraudulently justifying the cold war on the pretext of a Communist conspiracy and utilizing it to continue colonialist domination; Iraq was also the only ME country to demand recognition of the two German states.

At the Security Council, when the USSR vetoed Kuwait's admittance to the UN (November 30), Jawād praised the USSR as the "friend of the weak" and the only big power which used the veto to strengthen the UN, protect peace and justice in the world, and combat imperialism.

Iraq continued to be the only Arab country which received economic and technical assistance exclusively from the Communist countries.

Nonetheless, relations between Iraq and the Western countries were by no means as bad as the anti-Western pronouncements suggested.

The UK continued to be Iraq's most important trading partner and principal host to Iraqis studying abroad; in both respects she was followed by the US and West Germany. At the beginning of the year Iraq and the US concluded a cultural agreement—negotiated in 1960—which was the first formal agreement between the two countries since the 1958 revolution. For the first time since 1959, two senior Iraqi officers visited the US in the spring.

The closeness of the USSR and Iraq in international affairs was not reflected on the question of the Iraqi Communists. While the Iraqi government continued to persecute the local Communists (see Synopsis of Internal Affairs), Soviet and other Communist papers and organizations stigmatized these proceedings as unjust and an infringement of democracy, mainly in the first half of the year. Some Communist criticism was also voiced on other Iraqi internal affairs.

Soviet economic and technical aid continued in the framework of the 1959 and 1960 agreements. The first project to be completed was a radio station at Baghdad. Government farms and tractor stations were already reported to be operating. A number of contracts were signed for the establishment of industrial plants. It was thought that the Iraqis were somewhat dissatisfied with what was described as the slow pace and high cost of Soviet aid; (see also MER 1960, p 73). The USSR, it may be assumed, continued to supply Iraq with arms (though no reports on this topic were encountered).

The development credit extended in 1960 made Czechoslovakia the other Communist country with widely developed economic contacts with Iraq. Relations with the other Communist countries, including China, continued on friendly terms, and there were contacts in the economic and cultural fields.

In February Iraq resisted Iran's attempt to change the existing oil arrangements in the Shatt al-Arab. As a result oil exports from Abadan practically ceased until the end of April when Iran agreed to return to the earlier arrangement. The two countries gave the affair next to no publicity. Otherwise relations between Iraq and her GENTO neighbours seem to have been uneventful; and they were not reported to have been affected by the Kurdish rising (Kurds reside in the adjacent border areas of Iran, Iraq and Turkey.)

Iraq, like other Arab countries, endeavoured to strengthen her relations with African countries; however, only a few new contacts were reported and these mainly in the sphere of Islam and teaching of Arabic. An embassy was opened in Lagos.

Routine relations continued with other countries.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE IPC

Synopsis. The negotiations between the Iraqi government and the IPC, which had been conducted on and off since 1958, broke finally down in November.

The first round of the year's negotiations took place in Baghdad at the beginning of April. The IPC delegation was presented with a formidable list of Iraqi demands. Iraq's main claims were for participation in the company's share capital, an increase in the share of net profits and relinquishment by IPC of the unexploited part of its concession area. The talks broke down on a comparatively minor issue, the refund of "dead rents"—the sums paid to Iraq during the period before oil production commenced on a commercial scale.

The second round opened in Aug, after the concessionaires had yielded on the "dead rents" issue and a new delegation had been appointed, on which the IPC share-holding companies were strongly represented. The first phase of this round terminated with the oil companies asking for time to consider Iraq's insistence on participation in the IPC's share capital, although not much hope of agreement was held out. The talks were resumed at the end of Sept, but concluded in total deadlock, without agreement being reached on any issue. A last-minute proposal by Qassim, which did not include participation in the IPC's capital, was not even seriously considered.

On Dec 11 the Iraqi government unilaterally terminated the concession of the IPC and its subsidiaries in all areas not actually under exploitation, i.e. over 99% of the concession. The companies protested, but it was clear that neither side to the dispute would interfere with actual oil production.

From March and throughout the year the Iraqi government and press conducted a vigorous publicity campaign on this issue.

Iraqi Demands. On April 10 an Iraqi statement enumerated the following demands:

1. a new calculation of oil production to secure the rights of Iraq;
2. a new calculation of the prices on which Iraqi oil revenues were based;
3. abolition of the discount received by the oil companies [amounting to 1% of posted price on account of "sales expenses"];
4. appointment of Iraqi directors to the Board in London;
5. gradual Iraqization of personnel;
6. relinquishment by the companies of unexploited territories, as a preliminary to their exploitation by Iraq;
7. companies to relinquish the natural gas surplus for utilization by Iraq;
8. guarantee to use Iraqi tankers [there were none throughout the year];
9. Iraqi participation of at least 20% in the companies' share capital;
10. increase of Iraqi share in oil revenues [above the present 50% of net profits];
11. payment of revenues in convertible currency;
12. removal of ambiguous provisions in former agreements, which were harmful to Iraq [not specified]. (IT, April 11; compare also MER 1960, p 264.)

Negotiations: The First Round. The IPC delegation was again led by G.H. Herridge, the company's managing director; the Iraqi delegation by Qassim himself.

Meetings took place on April 2 and 6, after which talks were suspended. (Financial Times, April 11; IT, April 12)

The talks broke down over the comparatively minor question of "dead rents"—the sums totalling nearly ID10 million which the Mosul and Basra Oil Companies had paid Iraq before commercial exploitation of their concession area had started. The companies were deducting this total from the royalties at the rate of 5% annually, in spite of Iraq's protest that the "dead rents" were an unrecoverable bonus. The IPC delegation did not agree to the Iraqi request that deductions be stopped forthwith, with no time limit set for eventual arbitration. (IT, April 18; Financial Times, May 1, June 20)

Following the breakdown of talks, Qasim forbade the companies to continue explorations outside the actual drilling areas, as he had threatened at the second meeting. The companies complied. Oil production went on unimpaired. (IT, April 11, 17; Financial Times, May 30)

[For examples of Iraqi publicity given to the negotiations during this period, see Ministry of Oil handouts in IT, April 18, 21, 23, 24, 25; editorials—in Thawrah, April 17; Bayan, April 10; Saut al-Ahrar, April 13; Mustaqbal, April 11.]

IPC Initiative to Renew Talks. On April 28 Viscount Monckton, IPC chairman, asked Qasim by cable to consider favourably a request by IPC shareholders for resumption of negotiations. Qasim replied that first "a clear written reply" must be given to the Iraqi demands. (IT; Financial Times, May 1)

On June 9 the concessionaires conceded two points in order to facilitate resumption of talks:

1. IPC agreed, pending arbitration, to stop deduction of "dead rents" from royalties retroactively from Jan 1, 1960;

2. a new negotiating team was set up, drawn chiefly from the IPC shareholding companies and led by H.W. Fisher, a director of Standard Oil of New Jersey. (IT, Financial Times, June 20)

The Second Round. On Aug 24 the talks were renewed but at the oil companies' request they were suspended on Aug 30. This time the crisis came over Iraq's demand for at least 20% participation in the IPC's capital. The companies' attitude prima facie was negative, but they asked for a few weeks' break for further consideration and the preparation of a reasoned memorandum. General expectation in London was that the companies would definitely reject the Iraqi request because of the difficulty in calculating a realistic price [since the shares were not on the market]. (IT, Aug 25, 27, 29, 31, Oct 18; Financial Times, Sept 1, 2; Petroleum Times, Sept 22)

On Sept 28 talks reopened in Baghdad. The companies declared their inability to increase Iraq's share of net profits above the present 50% or to allow Iraqi participation in the IPC's capital. On the other hand, they offered to relinquish 90% of the concession area—75% immediately—but they would make the choice. The offer was rejected by Iraq as utterly inadequate.

On Oct 11, after many hours of discussion, Qasim made a "final suggestion":

1. the IPC should relinquish 90% of the concession area immediately;

2. existing wells should remain the oil companies' exclusive property, but Iraq's share in profits should be increased;

3. the Iraqi government should participate in the exploitation of wells to be drilled in the remaining 10% of the concession area, on a basis to be determined later.

[The claim to participation in the IPC's share capital was inferentially dropped.]

The companies' chief negotiator gave an unenthusiastic and non-committal reply, whereupon Qasim instantly stated that he considered the talks finally to have broken down. His parting statement was that IPC would not be disturbed in the exploitation of existing wells, but that legislation had been prepared for the taking over of all reserve areas. (Minutes of negotiations—IT, Sept 29, Oct 4, 9, 11, 12, 15, 19, 20, 22-27, 30, 31, Nov 1; Iraqi official statement—INA, Oct 17; IT, Oct 18; British comments—Financial Times, Oct 13, 14)

Oil Legislation—Concession Area Cut. On Dec 11 the Iraqi government promulgated Law No. 80/1961 incorporating the measures forecast by Qasim (see above). IPC and its two subsidiaries, MPC and BPC, had their combined concession area curtailed to about 1,938 sq.kms.; the law authorized the government to allocate additional areas totalling about 1,950 sq.kms., if necessary, as reserves to the companies. The remaining areas, i.e. over 99% of the original concessions, reverted to the Iraqi government.

The law also ordered the companies to make available to the Iraqi government without payment within three months all data concerning the relinquished areas. (IT, Dec 13, 15, 17, 18; Times, Dec 13, 14)

In London an IPC spokesman said that Iraq's action "confronted with the rights of the three companies and we are urgently considering the position." (Times, Dec 13)

[No further major developments were reported as having occurred by the end of the year.]

OPEC Supports Iraqi Stand. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, it was reported, reiterated its full support for Iraq. (Financial Times, Nov 16)

NON-ARAB ME COUNTRIES

Cyprus. An official committee was set up to examine the possibilities of strengthening economic cooperation with Cyprus; the Foreign Ministry and the Baghdad Chamber of Commerce appealed to Iraqi merchants to increase their purchases from Cyprus. (Zaman, Dec 23, 27)

Ethiopia. On Dec 21, 1960, the Deputy PM and FM of Ethiopia cabled his thanks to Gen. Qasim for his declaration after the attempted coup d'état in Ethiopia in Dec 1960 (see MER 1960, p 263). (Akhbar, Baghdad, Jan 13; R. Baghdad, Jan 12 [14])

Iran: The Shatt al-Arab Issue. On Feb 16 Iranian oil exports from Abadan refineries through the Shatt al-Arab stopped because of an Iranian decision affecting the status quo. The facts were not entirely clear, as both Iran and Iraq imposed a strict new black-out over the affair. (For an earlier dispute over rights in the Shatt al-Arab, see MER 1960, p 262.)

The Shatt al-Arab waterway was under Iraqi sovereignty, except for a five km. strip on the eastern shore at Abadan where the frontier ran in mid-channel. The piloting of tankers between Abadan and the Persian Gulf had been the responsibility of the Basra Port Authority, which had lately replaced its British pilots with Iraqis. These pilots had also fulfilled the duties of berthing masters in Abadan Port.

In Feb the Iranian government gave orders that only Iranian staff should handle shipping within Abadan waters. The Basra Port Authority promptly announced that any change of the status quo at Abadan would cause stoppage of piloting services along the Shatt. Accordingly,

International Boundary ——— Road ——— Principal Towns

Width of Shatt al Arab has been exaggerated to show boundary clearly on Feb 16, tankers ceased moving between Abadan and the Gulf. The refinery tanks filled up rapidly and by the end of the month, refining at Abadan had to be cut down to the comparatively insignificant amount of oil absorbed by the local market. (Economist, Feb 25, March 25; MEED, March 3; Petroleum Press Service, April)

Intense diplomatic activity followed between Baghdad and Tehran. (INA, Feb 21, 23, 26; March 5, 11; Peygham-e Emruz, Tehran, Feb 23, 26 quot. in Iran Presse, Tehran, Feb 24, 27; Ettela'at, Tehran, March 27 quot. in Iran Presse, Tehran, March 28)

Since Iraq refused to compromise, and Iran would not risk trespass into Iraqi territorial waters, a deadlock ensued, which was of great cost to Iran. The latter attempted to ease the situation by pumping refined oil to the Persian Gulf port of Bandar Mahshur. (MEED, March 10)

[Finally, Iran agreed to the status quo ante pending negotiations, and shipping between Abadan and the Persian Gulf was resumed on April 23.] On April 22 an Iraqi source quoted "circles close to the Foreign Ministry" as saying that "high-level talks for the settlement of the conflict between Iraq and Iran regarding piloting rights on the Shatt al-Arab would be transferred from Baghdad to Tehran as a sign of Iraqi goodwill." The talks had been taking place in Baghdad for several weeks (Zaman, April 22). The following day the Iranian Foreign Minister announced that an Iraqi delegation would leave for Tehran in the second half of May to negotiate the settlement of differences. The dispute concerning the Shatt al-Arab had been resolved, and shipping resumed as from that day. The newspaper publishing the statement added that the difficulties had arisen after the promulgation of an Iranian decree concerning piloting on the Shatt al-Arab which involved the exclusion of Iraqi pilots from Abadan port. It had now been decided to resume shipping according to the previous arrangement, while talks aiming at a permanent solution would commence in Tehran, "probably before May 21." (Kayhan, Tehran, April 23 quot. in Iran Presse, Tehran, April 24)

[The talks did not take place.] On May 14 AFP reported from Tehran that the departure of the Iraqi delegation for Tehran had been postponed owing to continued disagreement between Iraq and Iran. (Ha'aretz, May 15)

On June 18 "reliable sources" were quoted as saying in Tehran that "talks between Iran and Iraq on the Shatt al-Arab dispute have been suspended and are not expected to be resumed in the near future" (Kayhan, Tehran, June 19). [No more was heard of the dispute in 1961.]

The stoppage was calculated as having caused Iran a loss of £2 million a month. (MEED, April 28)

Iran—Miscellaneous. In May, Iran and Iraq set up a committee to work out an agreement on grazing rights in the border region. (INA, May 15)

In Dec, an Iraqi military delegation took part in Iran's Army Day celebrations and visited military installations there. (INA, Dec 25)

Somalia. In April the Iraqi cabinet approved the acceptance of Somali students in Iraqi institutes of learning. (Thawrah, April 12)

On April 17, in a speech at the military college, Qasim said he was happy to see among the cadets "our brothers from Somalia" (Mustaqbal, April 18). In Nov, five Somalis arrived in Baghdad to enroll at the military college at the expense of Iraq. (Akhbar, Nov 25)

In April it was reported in Baghdad that the government would shortly approve a plan for medical aid to Somalia. [There were no further reports on this topic.] (Zaman, April 12)

Turkey. In Sept, Talib Mushtaq, Iraqi ambassador to Turkey, denied any intentions of amending the 1946 Iraqi-Turkish treaty of friendship. Since the (Turkish) May revolution relations between the two countries had become close, and were expected to improve still further. The two sides were ready to renew trade relations which had been frozen under the old regime and to draft a trade agreement. Four hundred Iraqi students were then studying at Turkish universities. (Zaman, Sept 9)

It was reported that from Jan 1 to Sept 15 the unprecedented number of 3,111 tourist and student visas had been granted to Iraqi citizens to enter Turkey. (Zaman, Sept 23)

AFRICAN COUNTRIES

Plans to Strengthen Relations. The Iraqi government was reportedly preparing plans for strengthening relations with African countries. The embassy in Lagos (opened in Sept, see below), together with the embassy in Accra, were seen as the nucleus of Iraq's representation in Africa, to be developed in the future. (Zaman, Sept 23)

On the basis of reports submitted by the Iraqi members of an Arab League commercial delegation to Africa (Zaman, Jan 12, 20; Ahali, Sept 24), a committee was set up by the Foreign Ministry to recommend measures for strengthening relations with Africa. Its recommendations included the dispatch of teachers and the opening of schools on the continent, an increase in the number of African students in Iraqi institutions and a special "Voice of Africa" radio programme. (Akhbar, Iraq, Oct 14)

Iraq appointed Lebanese emigrants living in Conakry and Dakar as honorary consuls; more such appointments were to be made in African countries. (Anwar, Beirut, Oct 5)

Educational Assistance. The Iraqi authorities reportedly decided to set up two elementary schools, one each in Ghana and in Senegal, in which Arabic and Islamic subjects would be taught, in addition to the regular curriculum. The establishment of more such schools was under consideration. (Ahd al-Jadid, Oct 8)

[Iraq granted 95 scholarships to African countries as follows: Sudan—20; Somalia—10; Guinea—10; Ghana—10; Mali—15; Senegal—10; Uganda—5; Chad—3; Congo (L)—5; Nigeria—3; Ethiopia—2.] (See also below, under countries.)

Imam declared that joint Arab-Muslim efforts should be made "to contain Israeli penetrations." He also asked for the opening of schools in Nigeria to spread Islam and teach Arabic. (Bilad, Oct 5; Mustangal, Oct 9; Zaman, Oct 10)

Senegal. In a conference of Arabic teachers held on Dec 23-25, 1960 in Senegal, it was mentioned that Iraq as well as several other Arab states had presented scholarships to Senegalese students. (Zaman, Jan 14)

At the end of March, a five-man Islamic delegation from Senegal led by Shaykh Ibrahim Niyasse visited Iraq for six days after visiting the U.S. Niyasse praised Gen. Qasim's work in the service of Islam, and declared Israel "my enemy, as I am a Muslim." The delegation was received by Qasim. (R. Baghdad, March 30 [April 5]; R. Baghdad, March 27, April 1-IMB, March 28, April 2)

Following the visit PM Qasim donated ID10,000 towards the cost of building a school of Islamic studies and/or a mosque in Senegal. (IT, April 20; Bayan, Aug 22)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

COMMUNIST VIEWS ON INTERNAL DEVELOPMENTS IN IRAQ

Statement by Iraqi Communist Leader. [The increasingly critical position assumed in 1961 by Communist countries towards the internal policies of the Iraqi government is reflected in the following passage from the speech of Salim Adil (the pseudonym of Hussein Radawi), first secretary of the Iraqi Communist party, delivered at the 22nd congress of the CPSU in Oct:] "For no reason at all state-of-war conditions still exist in the country. Every kind of party activity is persecuted and the legitimate activities of the Communist party are forbidden above all. Time and again sweeping campaigns of arrest are carried out. Several thousand persons are constantly in prison. At the present time over 50 fighters, sentenced to death by a military tribunal for displaying heroism in the struggle against reactionary forces at the time of the imperialist intrigues, are languishing in prisons. And 286 valiant fighters—Communists and democrats—were killed in broad daylight. The country's economic situation is deteriorating, the standard of living is falling, unemployment is on the increase and feudal domination is once again rising in the countryside. The government avoids implementation of the law on land reform and has not worked out any programme of industrialization, while state funds are being spent on secondary objectives." (Pravda, Oct 25)

"Persecutions" of Communists and Other "Patriots." On Feb 8 Pravda reported from Baghdad that a group of Iraqi journalists, lawyers and "peace defenders" had asked Col. Mahdawi, President of the Higher Military Tribunal, to intervene for the release of prisoners held without charge, and had secured his promise to bring the matter to FM Qasim's attention.

On Feb 10 Pravda printed the text of a telegram sent to Qasim by the Soviet-Asian Solidarity Committee, under the heading "We cannot keep silent." The telegram referred to the Soviet public's "profound alarm and indignation" at the sentences passed on "dozens of the best sons of the brotherly Iraqi people" and characterized them as "unjust repressions" which could only benefit the designs of imperialist agents. The Committee called on Qasim to release the imprisoned "fighters of the national liberation movement, and not to allow the shining ideals of the Iraqi revolution to be stained by the blood of its most loyal and staunchest defenders."

Other telegrams, similar in tone, were addressed to

Qasim by a number of Soviet "social" organizations, and their texts reported in the Soviet press and radio. (Komsomolskaya Pravda, Feb 8; Pravda, Feb 8, 10; Trud, Feb 12, 15; R. Moscow in English, Feb 7 [SU, 9]; R. Moscow, Feb 8 [SU, 10]; R. Moscow, Tass in English, Feb 14 [SU, 16]; Mizan, March)

Protests were also sent by Chinese lawyers (R. Peking in Arabic, March 6 [FE 11]) and Bulgarian organizations. (R. Sofia in Arabic, March 8 [EE, 10])

In April an article in New Times headed "Persecution of Patriots in Iraq," quoted varied sources which alleged repressive measures of the Iraqi authorities against trade unionists, Communists and other "patriotic elements" who had defended the republic at the time of the Mosul "counter-revolution" and cited protest from several countries. (New Times, No. 14, April)

In May Trud accused the Iraqi authorities of the falsification of trade union elections and the arrest and imprisonment of the organizers of a May Day demonstration (see p 268b), describing the conduct of the Iraqi authorities as "another outrage against the working class." (Trud, May 16; for a Bulgarian protest, see R. Sofia, May 20 [EE, 23])

In July, the Soviet journal for Afro-Asian affairs described the suppression of demonstrations, held in sympathy with a strike of Baghdad "bus and taxi-drivers" (see p 264 b) thus: "The streets of Baghdad became red with the blood of workers." Referring to the internal situation in Iraq in general, the report asserted: "The position of the patriots becomes more complicated with every day that passes. The wave of reactionary poison has spread throughout the country. Inveterate reactionaries and the dregs of society... have crawled out from dark corners and gateways." (Asiya i Afrika Segodnya, July)

The Suppression of the "Democratic Press." The "fate of the Iraqi democratic press" in general, and that of Communist party publications in particular, formed the subject of two articles in Asiya i Afrika Segodnya by P. Donskoy. After outlining the growth of the "progressive" press which followed the 1958 revolution, the author stated: "However, in the beginning of 1960 the reaction, supported by imperialist circles, was able to pass over to the offensive. Around ten different right-wing, Black Hundred-type newspapers made their appearance. Some of them were patently financed by Western propaganda centres... In Oct and Nov a series of brutal blows descended upon the progressive press. And as always happens in such cases, the Communists were the first targets." The author then relates the proscription of the Communist party organ Ittihad ash-Sha'ab and the arrest of its editor, Abd al-Qadir Isma'il al-Bustani (see MER 1960, p 243), as well as the suppression of several other "progressive" papers, including the organ of the trade union movement, Ittihad al-Ummal. As a result, "the democratic forces are deprived of all publications" and the Kurdish papers were also disappearing. What remained of the Iraqi press were "Al-Ahd al-Jadid, Al-Fajr al-Jadid, Al-Mustaqbal and Ath-Thawrah, which specialize in the baiting of patriots and are not above concocting slander against the Soviet Union; some bourgeois information sheets and periodicals; and Al-Bayān, the organ of the bourgeois National Progressive party." (Asiya i Afrika Segodnya, March, July)

(Two of the above-mentioned papers had earlier attacked Soviet intervention in Iraq's internal affairs. An article in Al-Fajr al-Jadid of May 19 stated inter alia: "We are not the enemies of imperialism in order to become the slaves of international Communism..." A similar attack in Al-Mustaqbal called forth a sharp rejoinder by Moscow Radio which accused the paper of slanderous fabrications "aimed at harming friendly relations between Iraq and the Soviet Union." (R. Moscow, March 9 [SU, 11]))

Iraq's Oil Policy. The Iraq government's oil policy was critically examined by Yu. N. Andreyev in Problemy Vostokovedeniya. In contrast to earlier Soviet accounts which were generally commendatory and, in particular, laid stress on Iraq's efforts to engage in independent exploitation of its oil resources, Andreyev took issue with Iraqi policy on the ground that it was not sufficiently radical towards the oil companies. "The ruling circles of the country," wrote Andreyev, "under pressure from both democratic and reactionary forces, do not always pursue a consistent and resolute policy towards the imperialist oil monopolies." "Reaction began to raise its head" from the second half of 1959 onwards. "In Iraq it did not pass unnoticed that the persecution of democratic elements was intensified at the time of the government's negotiations with the oil company.... Not a few officials who had served under Nuri as-Sa'id returned to the administration; some of them re-established their links with the oil monopolies and prevented the implementation of progressive measures by the government." The author did not challenge the "progressive" character of the Iraqi government's policy objectives. The burden of his strictures was rather that "the opportunities created by the July revolution" were not being exploited with sufficient vigour, and that the "enslaving" concession agreement of 1952, "concluded with a feudal and semi-colonial Iraq" was still in force. (Problemy Vostokovedeniya, Jan; Mizon, May)

Agrarian Reform. Soviet appraisals of Iraq's land reform measures were similarly concerned with the slow rate of implementation. One account noted that at the current rate of progress only a third of all needy peasants would receive land by Sept 1963, when the re-distribution of land must be completed under the existing law. (Sovremennyy Vostok, Jan)

The reform was also criticized on the ground that it did not provide for the confiscation of lands belonging to "traitors who previously collaborated actively with the imperialists." Also "many officials who earlier collaborated with the imperialists" were still serving in the state apparatus and in a number of cases deliberately impeded the implementation of the reform. (Voprosy Istorii, May; Mizon, Dec)

USSR-IRAQ: POLITICAL AND TRADE RELATIONS

Political Relations. The Kurdish leader Mulla Mustafa al-Barazani, whose arrival in the USSR was reported in Nov 1960 (MER 1960, p 72), returned to Iraq in Jan. (Ahali, Jan 15)

An Iraqi military delegation led by Brig. Jalal Ja'far al-Awqati was received by Khrushchov on Sept 16. The USSR Minister of Defence was present, among others. (Pravda, Sept 17; IT, Sept 18)

In a message to Khrushchov on the occasion of the 44th anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution Qasim stressed the influence of the revolution on "the spiritual and material life of many peoples" and lauded the Soviet Union's "realistic policy" in the "strengthening of peace and the struggle against imperialism." (Pravda, Nov 10)

On Nov 26 the head of the Near East Department in the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs, E. Kisseliev, arrived in Baghdad for a three-day visit. (INA, Nov 27)

Trade with the USSR and the Communist Bloc. The volume of Iraq-USSR trade in 1961 was: Iraqi exports $2.1 million, imports $21.2 million, as compared with $1.1 million and $7.3 million respectively in 1960.

Iraqi trade with all Communist Bloc countries, excluding Yugoslavia, in 1961 amounted to 12.3% of her total imports and 0.7% of her total exports (including oil exports) as compared with 9.7% and 0.6% respectively in 1960.

If oil exports are excluded, the share of Communist Bloc countries in Iraq's exports trade were 21.4% in 1961 as against 17.5% in 1960. (See tables: The ME Foreign Trade.)

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE USSR-IRAQ ECONOMIC AID AGREEMENT

Soviet Statement on Progress. On April 4, the second anniversary of the signing of the Economic and Technical Cooperation Agreement between Iraq and the Soviet Union, a member of the Soviet embassy in Baghdad reported progress under the agreement as follows:

The first stage of the implementation of the agreement involved mainly the drawing up of plans and estimates and was currently nearing completion. A comprehensive survey of the Euphrates and Tigris river basins and the construction of large water reservoirs constituted essential preliminaries in an irrigation project which would "exceed the cost and size of the Aswan Dam in the UAR." Mineral surveys so far completed indicated the existence of natural resources necessary for the construction of an industrial base. Sand suitable for the manufacture of glass had been discovered in sufficient quantities for the operation of a glass factory at Ramadi. A successful survey of phosphorous mines was being carried out in the vicinity of Rutbah. Several thick strata containing sulphur had been discovered near Mosul; deposits of lead and zinc had been found in the north of the country, while manganese, copper, lead and iron ore had been discovered in other mountainous areas.

The Iraqi government had so far approved ten out of the 14 projects for which plans had been drawn up by Soviet experts. Work had begun on two projects, the central broadcasting station at Salman Pak and the Baghdad-Basra railway line. The former would be the first project to be completed under the aid agreement. (R. Baghdad, April 4 [6])

Iraq Reported Dissatisfied With High Cost, Slow Pace of Soviet Aid. In Jan, a Western observer adduced Iraqi dissatisfaction with the implementation of its aid agreement with the USSR from the scant publicity given in Iraq to the exchange of the instruments of ratification of the aid agreement on Aug 18, 1960, which took place in Moscow on Jan 9. (See below: Baghdad-Basra Railway.) Nor had PM Qasim referred to Soviet aid in his speech on Army Day, Jan 6, in which he had reviewed the state of the country at some length. It was believed that Iraqi reticence on the subject of Soviet aid might have been due to difficulties experienced with the Soviet experts, some 700 in number. The few Iraqi interpreters available lacked the necessary technical qualifications for negotiations with the Soviet side, while those Soviet experts who spoke Arabic were suspected of being spies and agitators in disguise. On the other hand, the observer noted that the reason for Iraqi silence could simply have been that anything else would have contrasted strangely with current measures against local Communists (Scotsman, Jan 13, 17). [See also the NYT report on the speeding up of work on the Salman Pak radio station—below.]

On Feb 11 M. Malakhov, the Soviet Deputy Chairman of the State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations, left Baghdad after a stay of several weeks, during which he was received by PM Qasim. His purpose was, in his words, to "study the implementation" of the aid agreement (INA, Feb 11; R. Moscow, March 23 [SU 24]). According to Iraqi sources the discussions between Malakhov and the Iraqi authorities had centred among others on the cost of Soviet aid projects. Iraqi studies of the final reports on factories to be constructed under the agreement had shown that it was possible to reduce cost by 8-12%. As a result of the discussions it had been decided to adopt the views of the Iraqi experts. (INA, Feb 11; R. Baghdad, Feb 11 [14])

Later Qasim was reported to have stated at a press conference that Soviet machinery and equipment was being sold to Iraq "at the lowest international prices." (ANA, Feb 27 [March 1])

Baghdad-Basra Railway. On Jan 9 instruments of ratification of the economic agreement of Aug 18, 1960, were exchanged in Moscow (see MER 1960, p 73). Under this agreement the Soviet Union was to provide Iraq with a loan of R180 million for the construction of the Baghdad-Basra standard gauge railway line (INA, Jan 11). The Director-General of Iraqi Railways said that an agreement had been concluded with Tekhnosport, for the supply of rails and earth works equipment to the value of ID4 million. Negotiations were in progress with the Soviet Union for the construction of a concrete sleepers factory in Iraq. (INA, Jan 11; R. Baghdad, Jan 11 [13])

In Aug A. Osipov, the chief Soviet engineer of the Baghdad-Basra railway project, described the construction of the line as the "biggest project" undertaken in Iraq with the help of the Soviet Union. Work was proceeding along the entire line; materials so far supplied from the USSR included 20,000 rails, equipment for the construction of a railway depot, signalling and communications apparatus and two track-layers. Forty-two Soviet engineers were engaged in the project and another 60 were expected to arrive in Iraq within the next few months. (R. Moscow, Aug 29 [SU, 31])

Kirkuk-Sulaymaniya Railway Survey. In Jan twelve Soviet experts arrived in Baghdad to carry out surveys for the construction of a new railway line to link the Kirkuk oilfields with the town of Sulaymaniya. (IT, Jan 11)

Atomic Reactor. On May 17 a contract was signed in Baghdad between the USSR and Iraq for the construction of and the supply of equipment for a 2,000 kw. atomic reactor and attached isotope laboratory. (INA, May 18)

[Plans for the erection of the reactor and laboratory, the so-called "July 14 Project" at Tawatha, had been approved in 1960—see MER 1960, p 73.]

Contracts Signed For Construction of Factories. Contracts were signed during the first half of the year for the construction of several factories most of which had been authorized by the Iraqi Economic Planning Board in the course of 1960. (See MER 1960, p 73.)

In Feb representatives of Tekhnosport and the Iraqi Ministry of Industry signed contracts for the construction of a cotton mill and a knitwear/hosiery factory at Kut and a textile mill at Baghdad (Ivestia, Feb 10; INA, Feb 11). Work on the cotton mill was due to begin in mid-1961 and to be completed in 1963. The mill was to employ a total of 2,400 workers and to produce over 30 million sq. metres of fabric and over 630 tons of yarn per annum. Sixteen Iraqis were currently training in Soviet textile plants and a further 36 were to be trained later (R. Baghdad, March 6 [W, 9]). Soviet equipment for the mill was to include 60,000 spindles and 1,200 looms. (R. Moscow in English, May 10 [SU, 12])

On April 22 representatives of Prommashexport signed contracts with the Iraqi Ministry of Industry for the erection of an electrical equipment factory at Waziriya in Baghdad. Construction was due to begin in 1961 and to be completed in 1963. Annual output was scheduled to include 42,000 transformers, 40,000 electric motors with capacities of up to 67 HP, coils, starters and various kinds of switches, plugs and cables. Iraqi technicians were to be trained in the USSR. (R. Baghdad, April 23 [25]; R. Moscow, April 24 [SU, 26]; see also INA, Jan 16)

Contracts were also signed for the construction of a factory of agricultural implements at Iskandariya, planned for an annual output of 30,000 units of tilling and harvesting equipment for use with tractors. Forty Iraqi engineers and technicians were to be trained in the USSR; the total labour force was anticipated to number 3,000. (R. Moscow, April 24 [SU, 26]; R. Moscow, May 6 [SU, 9]; Krasnaya Zvezda, April 25)

Other contracts signed in the first half of 1961 provided for Soviet aid in the construction of a canning factory at Karbala with an annual output of three million tins, a pharmaceutical factory at Samarra and an artificial limbs and medical footwear factory in Baghdad. (INA, Feb 11; R. Baghdad, March 12 [W, 30]; R. Moscow in Arabic, May 28 [SU, 30])

Planned Industrial Projects. In Jan it was announced that an electric bulb factory would be established near Dawra, to begin production in 1963 with a labour force of close on 800. Initial output was set at 15 million bulbs per annum and was expected to meet Iraq's home consumption (R. Baghdad, Jan 24 [W, Feb 2]; R. Moscow, May 6 [SU, 9]). The USSR was also to take part in the construction at Basra of a petrochemical plant for the production of nitrogenous fertilizers from natural gas. The undertaking was projected to lay the foundation for Iraq's petrochemical industry. (Problemy Vostokovedeniya, Jan)

Opening of Salman Pak Radio Station. The first project to be completed under the aid agreement was the Freedom (al-hurriyah) radio station in the Baghdad suburb of Salman Pak. The construction of the station was completed according to schedule (see MER 1960, p 73) and the inauguration ceremony took place on July 16 in the presence of PM Qasim and S.G. Lapin, Foreign Minister of the RSFSR, who headed the Soviet delegation to the anniversary celebrations of the Iraqi revolution. (Pravda, July 18, 19)

The New York Times reported that work on the station had been speeded up in the last weeks and equipment flown from the USSR in an effort to fulfil the original time-schedule to meet Iraqi criticisms as regards tardiness in the implementation of the Soviet aid programme generally. (NYT, July 17)

The station's eight 50-watt short-wave transmitters were supplied by the USSR and assembled under the supervision of 60 Soviet specialists. (R. Moscow in English, July 17 [SU, 18])

Contracts for Grain Silos. In Feb contracts were signed under the USSR-Iraq aid agreement for the erection of two grain silos, at Baghdad and at Kut, with a capacity of 12,000 tons each. (See also MER 1960, p 74.) Equipment was to be supplied by the USSR at a cost of over ID190,000 for the Baghdad silo and of close on ID268,000 for the Kut silo. The silos were scheduled to come into operation in the first half of 1963. (IT, Feb 16; R. Baghdad, Feb 15 [W, 23])

Government Farms and Agricultural Machine Stations in Operation. In March it was reported from Moscow that five government farms established under the aid agreement (see MER 1960, p 74) were in operation and growing rice, grain, cotton, sugar beet and medical herbs (R. Moscow, March 4 [SU, 9]). Deliveries of Soviet farm machinery were due to be completed by Oct. (R. Moscow, April 7 [SU, 10])

Also in operation were the four agricultural machinery for hire stations authorized in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 74). Deliveries of Soviet harvester combines and tractors were reported in April; further deliveries were expected in May. (Mizan, April; R. Moscow, April 7 [SU, 10])

Oil Prospecting and Mineral Surveys. Under an agreement between the Iraqi government and Tekhnookisport, Soviet geologists were to prospect for oil on the territory of the Khanaqin Oil Company's former concession [now nationalized]. (Problemy Vostokovedeniya, Jan)

In June PM Qasim was reported to have stated that deposits of gold, silver and uranium had been discovered in Iraq with the aid of Soviet prospectors (Hayat, June 16). [There was no confirmation of such discoveries.] (On prospecting see also above: Soviet Statement on Progress.)

The contract for the first of these projects, the power station, was signed on June 18 with the Prague Tekhnosport which was to submit preliminary plans for the project within four months. Tenders for engineering works would be examined by Czechoslovak experts. Tekhnosport was to have the first option on the supply of equipment. The Czechoslovaks would train Iraqi engineers and technicians for work on the project. The station was to consist of three to four generators, each of approx. 25,000 kw. capacity. THE STATE OF ISRAEL

(Medinat Ysrael)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

The objectives of Israel's foreign policy and the pattern of relations remained the same as in 1960; (see MER 1960, p 265 ff.). Israel's chief concern was the security problem which derived from her conflict with the Arabs. She continued to regard the maintenance of adequate military power and the strengthening of her international ties both as a deterrent to the Arab threat to her existence and as a means of paving the way to peace by ultimately convincing the Arabs of the futility of their aspirations to destroy Israel. (See: The Arab-Israel Conflict)

Technical and economic cooperation continued to be regarded by Israel as a most important means of her foreign policy, especially in Africa, and Asia. 1,250 trainees from 71 countries studied in Israel in 1961, and 256 Israel experts served abroad. In the words of her Foreign Minister, Israel, in extending aid, did not seek to establish vested interests but to give a practical expression of her friendship.

Despite her expanding ties with individual countries, including the great majority of the newly-independent African countries, Israel remained isolated from the world groupings and camps, because of the weight the Arab countries exercised in international councils (pp 43-5).

In Israel's relations with the two world blocs there was no change: she enjoyed support in the West, while Soviet Russia rejected her bids to improve relations. PM Ben-Gurion, however, reiterated his views that an understanding between the world powers was a vital prerequisite for peace in the ME, and he reiterated his suggestion for a joint East-West guarantee of ME borders.

Israel obtained arms and economic aid in the West only. Her trade was overwhelmingly with the West but a slow growth of trade with the Communist countries could be noted.

Israel's international position emerged quite clearly in her voting record at the UN General Assembly. Her vote coincided most often with the votes of the US and other Western countries, as well as with non-Arab Middle East and Latin American countries; it coincided least often with the vote of the Communist countries (less even than with that of the Arab countries). On questions of colonialism, however, Israel voted considerably more often with the Afro-Asian countries and the Communist countries than with the West.

The USSR, in much the same vein as the Arabs, denounced Israel as an aggressor in the ME and a tool of neo-imperialism in Africa. Communist propaganda put special emphasis on Israel-West-German ties and alleged collusion between the two governments to prevent the exposure of Nazi criminals in West Germany during the Eichmann trial. The USSR continued to supply arms to the Arab countries, including the UAR, Israel's principal antagonist. The Communist countries supported the Arab case against Israel in practically every instance, at the UN and elsewhere. There was, however, no Soviet expression of support for the Arab aim of eliminating Israel.

Israel continued to be concerned with the fate of Jewry in the USSR. The USSR, on the other hand, accused Israeli diplomats of disseminating hostile propaganda among Jews in the Soviet Union and of espionage, and she expelled one diplomat on these grounds (which Israel termed a tissue of falsehoods).

Relations with the other Communist countries continued on the pattern of the previous years; Czechoslovakia followed the USSR's policy towards Israel most closely; on the other end of the scale, friendly relations continued between Israel and Poland.

Friendly ties were maintained between Israel and Yugoslavia (though the latter cooperated closely with the UAR), and the volume of trade between the two countries grew considerably.

Israel's friendly ties with the Western powers were underlined by visits of PM Ben-Gurion to Canada, and France (official), and to the US and Britain (unofficial) in May-June. The visit to Canada was primarily an affirmation of the existing friendship between the two countries and there was no Israeli request for military or economic assistance.

In the US, PM Ben-Gurion met President Kennedy. Their talk was concerned with the situation in the ME in general and, reportedly, with the Arab refugee question and the balance of armaments in particular. In his election campaign President Kennedy had pledged an effort to seek a solution to the Arab-Israel conflict, and the US had also made it clear that she wished to probe the possibilities of a solution to the refugee problem. Consequently Israel, like the Arab countries, had demonstrated apprehensions lest she be pressed into accepting solutions which she considered disadvantageous. After his talk with the President, PM Ben-Gurion stated that they had found a large measure of agreement, whereupon the State Department declared that no agreement on any particular solution had been reached. In the field of armaments, Israel reportedly felt that she had gained US understanding and that, if the US preferred not to supply arms herself, she would be prepared to consider economic means that might help Israel to meet her defence needs from other sources. An Israeli bid for the purchase of anti-aircraft rockets in the US—the only Western country making them—was rejected. Israel, on her part, showed understanding for the US policy of maintaining friendly relations with both sides in the Arab-Israel conflict, though not for all the practical steps which derived from this policy, (see: The Arab-Israel Conflict). US economic assistance to Israel was further reduced, pari passu with the growth of Israel's economy. The two countries maintained close and varied cooperation in the fields of trade—the US being Israel's most important trading partner—investments, science and culture. American Jewry, the largest Jewish community in the world, continued to be of considerable assistance to Israel in many fields.

In PM Ben-Gurion's visit to France and his talk with President de Gaulle the "unwritten alliance" between the two countries was reaffirmed. France remained Israel's major source of arms, especially as regards aircraft. Ties with France in the economic, cultural and scientific fields steadily expanded. The friendship between the two countries, it was noted, was not limited to the government; it was deepened and made more secure by encompassing a great many personalities on both sides, in various fields of endeavour and of different political outlooks.

The United Kingdom sold Israel Centurion tanks, while she also continued to supply arms to Arab states. There were many friendly contacts between the two countries. Economic ties expanded, with Britain maintaining her position as the second-best customer of Israeli goods; British investments in Israel also grew.

The German Federal Republic maintained her policy of not establishing diplomatic relations with Israel, in response to Arab pressure. Otherwise, the ties between the two countries grew closer, a fact which aroused much opposition in Israel. The Knesset (Israel Parliament) debated cultural relations with Germany and a detailed ruling on this issue was issued by the government. PM Ben-Gurion, on his part, reiterated his view that "Adenauer's Germany is not Hitler's Germany." There were further contradictory reports as to whether the GFR would grant Israel a DM500 million loan after the completion of German reparations in 1963; meanwhile Israel's income in foreign currency from German restitution payments to individuals markedly increased. It was also reported that the GFR would supply arms to Israel.

Israel's friendly relations with the Scandinavian countries were underlined by the visit of Mrs. Golda Meir, the Israel Foreign Minister, to Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, and the visit of PM Gerhardsen of Norway to Israel.

Relations with the Benelux countries and Italy were marked by the expansion of economic ties. Austria enacted new laws for the indemnifications of Nazi victims which were, however, strongly criticized by the Association of former Austrian Jews in Israel. There were still no diplomatic relations between Israel and Portugal and Spain. Relations with Portugal were affected by the war in Angola; at the UN Israel took a stand against Portugal on the issue, and she rejected a Portuguese request for the sale of sub-machine guns.

Israel's desire for an arrangement with the European Common Market played an increasing role in her European diplomacy. She asked for French support, while encountering Italian and West German opposition. By the end of the year, no progress had been registered.

There was a further growth of friendly ties between Israel and the non-Arab countries in the Middle East. Diplomatic relations were established with Cyprus, Israel's nearest non-Arab neighbour. Several Cypriot ministers visited Israel, trade and technical cooperation expanded, and Israeli tourists flowed into Cyprus in large numbers. Ethiopia extended Israel de jure recognition which was regarded as particularly significant because of the strong Arab pressure exerted on her to refrain from this step. It was the consequence of the close and many-faceted ties between the two countries in the economic, technical assistance and other fields. The Shah of Iran defined his country's relations with Israel as "true love" though for political reasons Iran could not recognise Israel de jure. Ties between Israel and Iran as well as Israel and Turkey grew steadily in various fields.

In Africa, Israel's ties expanded considerably. At the same time she suffered a diplomatic setback at the Casablanca conference in which three sub-Saharan countries—Ghana, Guinea and Mali—joined three Arab countries—the UAR, Morocco and the Algerian Provisional Government—in condemning Israel as an imperialist bridgehead. The resolution, however, had been adopted only after strong prodding by the UAR. Israel's ties with Ghana were maintained in a variety of fields, particularly in technical cooperation. Israel continued to extend technical aid also to Mali.

On the other hand, Israel's relations with the great majority of African countries grew ever closer. At the UN General Assembly nine African nations co-sponsored an Israel-backed resolution calling for Arab-Israel negotiations. Three Presidents and two Prime Ministers were among the many African leaders visiting Israel during the year: Presidents Maurice Yamengo of Upper Volta, Philibert Tsiranana of the Malagasy Republic and Herbert Maga of Dahomey, and Prime Ministers Dr. Okpara of Eastern Nigeria and Chief Akintola of Western Nigeria. In joint communiqués with their Israeli hosts the African Presidents declared their support for a peaceful settlement in the ME and the principle of direct negotiations; they signed treaties of friendship with Israel.

Israel opened embassies in the Central African Republic, Chad, Gabon, Sierra Leone and Tanganyika; signed new technical agreements with Dahomey, the Malagasy Republic, Togo and Upper Volta, and new trade agreements with the Ivory Coast and Togo. The Entente countries—Dahomey, the Ivory Coast, Niger and Upper Volta—opened their embassy in Jerusalem. Israel continued to supply technical assistance to Congo (L) under the auspices of the UN agencies; she supported the UN resolution on the Congo, and its activities there.

Israel's economic cooperation with and technical assistance to African countries expanded steadily. 876 trainees from 36 African countries and territories studied in Israel during the year, and 195 Israel experts worked in the continent.

In Asia Israel maintained friendly relations with the majority of the non-Muslim and non-Communist countries. Technical cooperation continued to expand. 267 trainees from 11 Asian countries studied in Israel and 46 Israeli experts worked in Asian countries. Relations remained especially close with Burma. PM Ben-Gurion visited the country, and at the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries PM U Nu's stand was reported to have been decisive in defeating an Arab proposal for the condemnation of Israel as imperialist. PM Nehru of India, on the other hand, reaffirmed his policy of not establishing diplomatic relations with Israel, giving the Suez campaign of 1956 as his reason.

In Latin America Israel continued to strengthen her friendly ties. There was an expansion of technical cooperation; nine countries sent trainees to Israel, and a number of Israeli experts worked in Latin America. An agreement on technical cooperation was signed with Bolivia, and a number of other countries showed interest in similar agreements. Cultural agreements were signed with Bolivia and Guatemala. Chile and Colombia appointed their first ambassadors to Israel. The level of Israel's diplomatic representation with Bolivia and Panama was raised from legation to embassy. The PM of British Guiana, Cheddi Jagan, and a considerable number of Latin American public figures visited Israel.

Israel applied for membership to GATT on March 26, 1959 and on May 30, 1959 became an associate member on a provisional basis. (Ha'aretz, May 31, 1959; Jer. Post, Dec 10; Israel Digest, Dec 22; Kitzur Amanah, 449)

NATO, WESTERN EUROPEAN AND COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

THE EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

[Israel's desire for an arrangement with the EEC played a growing role during the year in her European diplomacy. She asked for French support, while encountering Italian and West German opposition. By the end of the year, however, no progress had been registered.]

Trade with the EEC countries in 1960 and 1961 amounted to approximately 30% of Israel's imports ($145 million in 1960 and $180 million in 1961) and 28% of her exports ($62 million in 1960 and $69 million in 1961). (IFT, 1961)

Association or Agreement with EEC Considered Vital in Israel. On June 14 Mrs Golda Meir, the Foreign Minister, told the press in Jerusalem that "joining" the Common Market was absolutely essential for Israel's economic future. Complex problems stood in the way, but the nations concerned understood the importance of the Market for Israel, and she was optimistic that a way would be found to overcome the remaining obstacles. (Jer. Post, June 15)

The press was gravely concerned lest, if Israel remained outside the EEC while the UK and Spain came in, she might lose her citrus export market in the UK, which would have to give preference to Spanish citrus. (Jer. Post, June 11)

On Dec 3 Pinhas Sapiro, Minister of Commerce and Industry, stated in the Knesset, in answer to Communist and Liberal motions for a debate on the issue: "It would seem to me that we have not said that we wished to become a member-state of the Common Market... If they were prepared to admit us today we would have been unable to meet the conditions... Greece has been admitted as an associate member... We have said, and are saying, that what we want is not to be discriminated against by the fact of the establishment of the Common Market." Israel's representatives, Sapir continued, pose only this one demand: "a mutual trade arrangement... This could be an arrangement as in the case of Greece or some other arrangement." Israel was not devoid of bargaining power, Sapir added, because of her considerable imports from the EEC countries. The Knesset decided not to hold a debate. (Dirrei Haknesset, Dec 11-13, pp 644-7)

European Attitudes; No Association? (On the attitude of France, see p 307; of the GFR—p 309 b; of Italy—MER 1960, p 294.) In Oct Robert Lemaigen, member of the Commission of the EEC and Chairman of its Fund for Overseas Development, visited Israel in connection with plans for Israel's cooperation in overseas development. He told the press that since Israel's citrus and other exports might be adversely affected by the establishment of a common tariff in Europe, it was reasonable for the Israel government to raise this point for discussion with the EEC authorities. Application for associate membership would "raise a host of problems," including the EEC members' desire to preserve the specifically European and regional character of the Community, and he appeared confident that a better solution could be found. (Jer. Post, Oct 13, 17)

Socialist members of the European Parliamentary Assembly said in a communiqué in Dec that negotiations should be started "without delay" to reach an agreement "solving economic problems existing between the European Community and Israel." The communiqué made no mention of a possible association of Israel with the EEC and gave no details of the agreement envisaged. (Jer. Post, Dec 20, quoting Reuter, from Strasbourg)

AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND

Australia. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israeli-Australian trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $885,000 and imports $246,000, compared with $1,177,000 and $397,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

In Sept goods from Australia were shown at the International Exhibition of Applied Arts in Tel Aviv. (Jer. Post, Sept 14)

New Zealand. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israeli-New Zealand trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $34,000 and imports $102,000, compared with $71,000 and $79,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961) (For New Zealand's stand on the Arab refugee issue, see p 238 a.)

AUSTRIA

Compensation for Victims of Nazis. (See also MER 1960, p 294.) At the beginning of 1961 Israel and Jewish organizations continued to press the Austrian government for a speedy settlement of the restitution question.

Jewish losses in Austria under the Nazis were estimated by Jewish survivors at $1,000-1,200 million. Of the 200,000 Austrian Jews at the time of the Anschluss, 75,000 survived, 20,000 of them in Israel.

At the beginning of Jan Israel asked Austria, in a note handed to the Austrian Ambassador, for "speedy and sufficient restitution" to all victims of Nazi persecution in Austria. It was disclosed that an Israeli note on the subject in May 1960 had remained unanswered (Jer. Post, Jan 11). [A reply was received in Jerusalem on Aug 14.]

On March 20 Mrs Golda Meir, the Israeli FM, speaking in the Knesset, expressed the hope for speedy restitution. (Ha'aretz, March 21; Dirrei Haknesset, March 20-23, p 1363)

On March 22 Austrian indemnification laws were supplemented and amended by Parliament, providing for compensation for loss of livelihood, property and education by Jews who had escaped from the Austrian part of the Nazi Reich. These laws were not to come into force, however, before ratification of an agreement on a West German contribution. (Text in Bundesgesetzblatt No. 23 of April 21) On Nov 27, Austria and West Germany agreed on a German contribution of DM321 million to Austrian restitution payments (Jer. Post, Dec 26). The agreement was ratified by the German Bundestag on May 11, 1962. (Deutscher Bundestag, 4 Wahlperiode; Drucksache IV/392)

The indemnification laws met with sharp criticism from the World Association of Former Austrian Jews, Israel branch. They rejected the Austrian argument that Austria herself had been a victim of the Nazis (see below) alleging, inter alia, that 30% of the SS had been Austrians, though the latter were only 10% of the Reich's population. They claimed that the rate of compensation for loss of livelihood was only 7% per head of that paid by the GFR, "a discrimination for which there is no legal or moral justification."

They also criticized the ceiling on restitution payable through a special Austrian fund for the loss of bank accounts, cash, securities, mortgages and valuables etc. This was set, it was claimed, at 20,000 Austrian schillings (£11,600), which was "nothing short of cynical." (Ha'aretz, May 8; Jer. Post, July 26, Dec 26)

[No official reaction to the indemnification laws by Israeli authorities was reported.]

In a letter to Ha'aretz, an Austrian embassy official stated that, in the Austrian government's view, Austria was not capable of acting as an independent state between the Anschluss in March 1938 and the end of the war in Europe in May 1945. In the Austrian State Treaty, he argued, the Allies had recognized this by declaring Austria to have been forcibly occupied by Hitler's Germany, and completely exempted Austria from paying compensation to the Allies, thus "absolving her from legal responsibility for the events of the war and its consequences." There must be a clear differentiation between return of property and compensation, the writer stated; the State Treaty, as well as "exemplary Austrian legislation," obliged Austria to restore property still in Austria, but compensation was only a question of free Austrian choice and "should be recognized as a gesture of goodwill." The writer declared that the figure of $1000 million for Jewish losses was unsubstantiated, and that Austria had already refunded, by return of property and various payments, "hundreds of millions of dollars." (Ha'aretz, May 8)

War Criminals. Survivors from Vilna (Lithuania) in Israel hooded the Austrian Ambassador a memorandum demanding the arrest and trial of Franz Murer, "the murderer of 80,000 Vilna Jews." He was said to have been sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment but was reported to be free and serving as a bank director. (Ha'aretz March 20, April 11)

At a press conference in Vienna on May 17, Dr Hans Christian Broda, the Austrian Minister of Justice, said that the Austrian courts had convicted 14,000 ex-Nazis, and had sentenced 439 to death.

On May 18 he denied that the arrest of Eichmann's "assistants," Franz Murer and two others, was a result of Eichmann's trial; six others suspected as Nazi criminals were also under arrest. (Ha'aretz, May 19)

Various Contacts. In April the first organized group of 56 Austrian tourists arrived in Israel. (Ha'aretz, April 24)

On Oct 10, an extradition agreement was signed between Israel and Austria in Vienna. (Kivrei Amnash, 454)

Trade. The volume of Israeli-Austrian trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $1,692,000; imports $3,376,000, compared with $1,487,000 and $3,825,000 in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

BELGIUM

Trade. According to Israeli statistics, the volume of Israel-Belgium trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $15,047,000 and imports $11,249,000, compared with $13,364,000 and $11,383,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

In Aug the first shop for the sale of Israeli products, called Sabra, was opened in Brussels. (L'Information, Tel Aviv, Aug 14)

On Oct 12 an Israel-Belgium Chamber of Commerce was established in Tel Aviv. (L'Information, Tel Aviv, Oct 13)

Belgian Investments. At the end of April Jean Poncelet, Director-General of Fabri-Metal (a trade association of metal factories), visited Israel as guest of the government. He said he hoped to interest Belgian metal industrialists in the establishment of factories in Israel, geared for export, in cooperation with local capital. A textile machinery plant had been constructed in Ashdod by Metapic (mistakenly described as a textile factory in MER 1960, p 224), in partnership with a Belgian firm. A Belgian shipyard was negotiating for participation in the Haifa shipyard project. A Belgian engineer would study the possibility of producing railway carriages and equipment in Israel. (Jer. Post, May 4, 5)

Restitution for Israelis. The Foreign Ministry was conducting negotiations with the Belgian authorities on behalf of Israelis who during World War II were citizens of Nazi-occupied countries and were eligible for restitution under the 1960 agreement between Germany and Belgium. Germany had made a lump-sum payment to be distributed at Belgium's discretion. An Israel Foreign Ministry source said there were no difficulties in this case with regard to Belgian citizens in Israel, since Belgium allowed dual citizenship. (Jer. Post, June 22)

Cooperation in Arms Manufacture. During a discussion in the Knesset on the alleged appearance of Israeli-designed Uzi submachine guns in the hands of Portuguese soldiers in Angola (see: Portugal), Shimon Peres, the Deputy Minister of Defence, disclosed that much of the Israeli army's light arms were manufactured by the Belgian Fabrique Nationale. There was an agreement for the exchange of know-how in the manufacture of parts for the automatic [FN] rifle in Israel and the Uzi machine gun in Belgium. Consultation was required before sales to a third party. (Diivri Haknesset, Nov 27-29, p 509)

Gestures of Friendship; Visitors. In Jan the Israel-Belgium Association announced the planting of the Boudouin Forest in Israel and congratulated King Baudouin on his marriage (which took place on Dec 15, 1960). The Belgian Court thanked the Association in the name of the King and Queen. (Ha'aretz, Jan 20)

In Feb Brig. Yitzhak Rabin, Israeli Deputy Chief of Staff, visited Belgium and met the Army Quartermaster General. (Ha'aretz, Feb 20)

In Aug the Israel government sent a letter of condolence on the death of Cardinal Van Roey, who had courageously resisted Nazi persecution of the Jews. (ICPO/PR, Aug 16)

In Aug a delegation of 30 Belgian scouts toured Israel. (Jer. Post, Aug 2)

CANADA

Israeli PM Cordially Received on Visit to Canada. PM David Ben-Gurion visited Canada from May 24 to 28 on the invitation of PM John George Diefenbaker; the first two days constituted an official visit.

The visit was officially announced in Jerusalem and Ottawa on May 11. In the Canadian Parliament the PM, Lester B. Pearson, leader of the opposition, and Hazen Argue, the Socialist leader, hailed Ben-Gurion as the distinguished leader of a young democratic state in the ME which had achieved rapid progress.

PM Ben-Gurion said he was confident that the visit would strengthen the bonds of friendship between the two countries and their determination to make their contribution towards world peace. (Jer. Post, May 12). [Ben-Gurion had not been to Canada since he trained there during the First World War as a soldier in the Jewish battalion of the British army. Diefenbaker, then leader of the opposition, had visited Israel in 1954.]

On May 24 Ben-Gurion was welcomed at Ottawa airport by the Canadian PM. The two statesmen stressed the affinity and the close ties between the two countries in history, democracy, culture, faith and pioneering.

Ben-Gurion had a private lunch with the Governor-General, George Vanier, and a series of talks with the Canadian PM. He was also received by the Canadian Parliament. (For sources, see below.)

Joint Communiqué. A joint communiqué, issued on May 25, stated: "The two PMs reviewed a wide range of international problems, including the pressing need for controlled world disarmament, the Congo, tensions in various areas and the general situation in the Middle East."

"Mr Ben-Gurion outlined his views on the Middle Eastern problems and the particular difficulties for his country which have resulted from the failure to reach a peaceful solution of Arab-Israeli differences in accordance with the principles of the UN Charter. At the same time Mr Ben-Gurion expressed his conviction that peace ultimately will be achieved. The two Prime Ministers agreed that an eventual solution to the problem would have to envisage the right of all countries in the area to live in peace and security. Both agreed that a relaxation of tension would improve prospects of peace in the world including the Middle East."

"The Prime Ministers agreed on the vital necessity for economic and technical assistance to under-developed countries in all parts of the world. Mr Ben-Gurion took the opportunity to explain the nature and scope of the technical assistance Israel had been able to provide to other countries." (Israel Digest, June 9)

Ben-Gurion Advocates East-West Accord on ME. Ben-Gurion told the press in Montreal on May 26 that a joint declaration by the Soviet Union and the West in favour of the integrity and independence of the ME countries would ease tension in the area. (For sources, see below.)

No Israeli Requests for Military or Economic Aid. Ben-Gurion stated at the same time that Canada could help Israel by sending pioneering Jewish youth to Israel and using its "moral power to bring peace to the world."

PM Diefenbaker told Parliament on May 26 that Ben-Gurion had made no request for military assistance, "either directly or indirectly." The same point was made by the Israeli PM at press conferences in Ottawa and Montreal. He said that some years previously Israel had asked for fighter aircraft from Canada but had later withdrawn the request, preferring to rely on one country [France] as a source of supply.

On May 26 Ben-Gurion visited Quebec City and Montreal, where he was warmly welcomed by the mayors and the Jewish communities.

Following the official visit, Ben-Gurion stayed in Montreal, and left for New York on May 28.

On his return to Israel Ben-Gurion paid tribute to the exceptionally warm welcome he had received in Canada and Canadian Jewry's devotion to Israel.

Ben-Gurion was accompanied by Pinhas Sapir, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, who held talks with the Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, George Hees. An Israeli spokesman stated that there had been no discussion of a Canadian loan or economic aid to Israel. The objective of the talks had been to strengthen trade ties; Israel had purchased $6.5 million worth of Canadian food and goods in 1960 and exported to Canada only $2.5 million worth. Sapir proposed the exchange of trade study missions. (Jer. Post, May 12, 28; June 9; Ha'aretz, May 28, 29; Israel Digest, June 9; External Affairs, Canada, July; Presse Montreal; Montreal Star, May 24, 25, 26, 27)

Various Contacts. Israel opened a consulate in Toronto on April 13. (Jer. Post, April 18)

On Jan 24 PM Diefenbaker was awarded the Canada-Israel Friendship award for 1960. (Jer. Post, Jan 26)

In April a delegation from the National Defence College of Canada visited Israel, and was received by PM Ben-Gurion and Maj.-Gen. Tzur, the Chief of Staff. (Jer. Post, April 12, 13)

In June it was announced that scientists from Canada were to engage in research at the Weizmann Institute during the coming academic year. (Jer. Post, June 20)

On Oct 31 an exhibition of Israeli paintings was opened in Ottawa. (Ottawa Citizen, Ontario, Nov 1)

In Nov the Israeli Minister of the Interior and Health, Haim Moshe Shapiro, visited Canada. (Jer. Post, Nov 22)

Economic Ties. According to Israeli statistics, the volume of Israeli-Canadian trade in 1961 was: exports $3,324,000; imports $9,206,000. In 1960 the figures were $2,634,000 and $6,738,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

In 1961 investments in Israel to the amount of $12 million were promoted in Canada by the Israel Investment Authority. (Ha'aretz, Dec 10)

An Israeli trade mission toured Canada in the autumn and was received by PM Diefenbaker. Members said that Israel's development plans might provide an important market for Canadian construction equipment. (Ha'aretz, Sept 22, Nov 16, 19, 29, 30; Telegram, Toronto, Nov 27)

On Dec 7 George Hees, the Canadian Trade Minister, announced that the Canadian Trade Commissioner Services would open a post in Tel Aviv in Jan 1962. (Canadian Weekly Bulletin, Dec 13)

FRANCE

Premier Ben-Gurion Visits France; Friendship Reaffirmed. PM David Ben-Gurion visited France between June 5-8, after visiting Canada, the US and the UK, almost exactly a year after his previous visit (June 13-20, 1960; see MER 1960, pp 292-3).

In the Elysée Palace communiqué the visit was described as official but without public ceremonies. It was indicated that Ben-Gurion did not intend raising any particular request or question, as there were no hitches whatever in Franco-Israeli relations. (Jer. Post, May 30)

On his arrival in Paris Ben-Gurion said that he was convinced that his talks with Gen. de Gaulle and the French PM would be "useful and fruitful." He continued: "I rejoice at the close bonds uniting our two peoples and I congratulate myself on the full understanding which we have always met with the leaders of this great country."

Mrs Golda Meir, the Israeli FM, and Shimon Peres, the Deputy Defence Minister, joined Ben-Gurion in Paris, together with the Ambassador to Brussels and the EEC. (Peres had conducted talks in Paris in Jan—Ma'ariv, Feb 1.)

De Gaulle: "Israel, Our Friend and Ally." The talks between the PM and President de Gaulle, on June 6, lasted an hour instead of the half-hour allotted. At a luncheon at the Elysée on June 6, President de Gaulle said: "At this juncture of world affairs it is always good for men of goodwill to see each other and reach agreement... This is true in all respects, and particularly in respect of Israel, whose merits and grandeur we know and whose difficulties and preoccupations we understand. We wish to assure you of our solidarity and our friendship. I raise my glass to Israel, our friend and ally."

PM Ben-Gurion replied: "We are grateful to France for the message of liberty and equality which she has given the world and for the aid which she extended us before the creation of the State, and afterwards." He emphasized the "gratitude of the people and government of Israel and my personal admiration for France and President de Gaulle, the man who today leads France and dedicates all his strength to her grandeur. He strives for the peace of the entire world in developing the noble sentiments which are inherent in the French people. Vive la France!" (IGPO/WNB, No. 11, June)

Ben-Gurion dined with PM Michel Debré. Leading French public men attended a banquet in his honour, including Guy Mollet and Pierre Mendès-France, former PMs; Couve de Murville, the FM; Lucien Paye, Minister of Education; Edmond Michelet, the Minister of Justice; Pierre Gorce, Secretary of State for African Affairs; Maurice Schumann, President of the Parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committee; General Martin, Chief of the General Staff; General Lavaud, Director of Armament Supplies, and Prof. Francis Perrin, High Commissioner for Atomic Energy. (IGPO/WNB, No. 11, June; Jer. Post, June 7)

Topics of Talks. A despatch from Paris said "it was to be assumed" that PM Ben-Gurion would emphasize that two conditions were vital for progress towards peace, or at least for the avoidance of war, in the ME, so that the Arabs might realize that Israel could not be eliminated: the balance of power must be safeguarded and Israel must achieve economic independence. The despatch added that it might be assumed that the French appreciated the importance of Israel as "the only bastion of democracy and friendship in the ME." (Ha'aretz, June 4)

Le Monde wrote on June 6 that the talks would concern supply matters, atomic research and the strengthening of the cultural agreement. (Talks on the implementation of this agreement were conducted in Paris on the eve of Ben-Gurion's visit. See below: Cultural Relations.) (Ha'aretz, June 7)

The question of Israel's relations with the EEC was a main topic of discussion in Ben-Gurion's meetings with PM Debré and Guy Mollet (with whom he had an hour's talk on June 7) and in Mrs. Meir's meeting with FM Couve de Murville on June 8. (Jer. Post, June 8, 9)

On June 5 Peres had an hour's meeting with Pierre Messmer, the Defence Minister, who reportedly showed full understanding for Israel's needs and anxieties. (Ha'aretz, June 7)

(Additional sources on the visit: Figaro, June 6, 7, 9; Monde, June 7, 8)

Evaluation of Visit: Continued French Assistance to Israel "Assured." On leaving Paris on June 8 for Israel, Ben-Gurion stated that he had "found a very great understanding of Israel's problems and needs and a great appreciation of her achievements" in Canada, the US, Britain and France. "But nowhere was this understanding and sympathy more clearly expressed than at my meeting with General de Gaulle and those who work with him." Ben-Gurion stressed that in the countries he had visited he had found a deep admiration for General de Gaulle and a great appreciation of France's important position in the international field. "I am leaving your country with the deep feeling that France is Israel's faithful friend and the champion of man's liberty and of world peace." (IGPO/WNB, No. 11, June)

"Responsible observers" in Paris thought, as the visit ended, that Israel's vital needs would be met by France as far as possible. (Jer. Post, June 8)

Summing up his visit on June 13 in Jerusalem, Ben-Gurion said: "If France achieves a solution of the Algerian problem, a thing that I wish with all my heart, there will be no change in Franco-Israel relations." (Ha'aretz, June 14)

Peres said: "The future of several issues vital to the State of Israel has been assured" (Jer. Post, June 16). On a later occasion he said that Franco-Israel relations were further strengthened by the visit. France was unconditionally extending to Israel much vital assistance. She had twice helped Israel to maintain her liberty and existence—not because of French interests in the area, but because of common values and identity of aspirations. (Ha'aretz, July 14)

Israel Asks French Support in Negotiations with Common Market. On several occasions during the year Israeli representatives asked for French support in her negotiations for a form of association with the Common Market. (See also pp 303-4.) The matter was raised by Ben-Gurion and Mrs. Meir during their visit to France in June. (Jer. Post, June 6, 7)

In Nov the Israeli parliamentary delegation (see below) repeatedly raised the issue. FM de Murville replied [non-committally] that he was "convinced that Israel, with her splendid human capital, will surmount all obstacles." (Jer. Post, Nov 11)

On Nov 22 Raymond Schmittlein, President of the Gaullist UNR, addressing a meeting of the Committee for Franco-Israel Alliance (of which he and PM Michel Debré, among others, were founding members), urged his government to "stretch out a hand to Israel and bring her into the European Common Market." (Jer. Post, Nov 23)

On Nov 15, while on a visit to Paris, Pinhas Sapir, Israeli Minister of Commerce and Industry, met Jean Marcel Jeanneney, the French Minister of Trade, in a bid to secure French support. Jeanneney expressed understanding for Israel difficulties, it was reported, but dwelt on the wider aspects of the problem and the need for consultations with other Common Market member-countries and French economic leaders.

At a press conference in Paris, Sapir said: "Actually, though not intentionally, the Common Market Organization applies a quasi-boycott to Israel. This is an injustice that I am convinced France will wish to correct." (Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, Nov 16, 17)

"Algérie Française" Organ's Anti-Jewish and Anti-Israel Allegations. In March Rivoire, leading organ of "Algérie Française," devoted a whole page to allegations that Algerian Jews were fighting together with Israelis on the side of European extremists against the authorities and the FLN (Jer. Post, March 23). The Jerusalem Post commented that the aim was to plant suspicions that Israel was engaged in a conspiracy to undermine the Gaullist regime, prevent peace in Algeria and prolong the strife indefinitely. Such a suspicion, even if only a fragment of it stuck, might do irreparable harm to Franco-Israel relations, and at the same time irritate Muslim Algerians. "This peril requires immediate and earnest attention" (Jer. Post, March 23). On March 24 Daniel Mayer, president of the French League of Human Rights, described the allegations as a "deliberate provocation designed to poison the relations between Jews and Muslims." (Jer. Post, March 26)

Following the arrest of Jean Ghnassia, an Algerian Jew described as a top leader of the anti-Gaullist Secret Army Organization (OAS), France Soir reported that the police were investigating a rumour that Ghnassia had been in touch with Israeli agents. (Jer. Post, May 18)

Israel and North-Africa. On Aug 25, at the third UN special session on the Bizerta question, Israel abstained in the vote on the Afro-Asian motion, in accordance with a Cabinet decision. (Ha'aretz, July 14, 23, 24, Aug 28; A/PV, 1006, Aug 25; see also text of resolution, p 24.)

On Oct 24 it was learned in Paris that France and Israel had opened negotiations to secure the indemnification rights of Jews who were leaving Algeria and wished to settle in Israel instead of France. It was reported that the French showed understanding of Israel's wishes and agreement was envisaged soon. (Ha'aretz, Oct 25)

At a meeting in Tel Aviv with African leaders in Nov, PM Ben-Gurion declared that Israel supported the right of the Algerians, like that of every other people, to self-determination. This did not mean, however, that Israel supported any particular demands of the Algerian nationalists. The right of the Algerian people to self-determination, he added, was part of French policy as stated by General de Gaulle. (Ha'aretz, Nov 6)

Knesset Delegation's Visit to France. On Nov 6 a nine-member Knesset delegation, headed by David Hacohen (Mapai), left for a two-week visit to France at the in-vation of Chaban-Delmas, Speaker of the National Assembly.

On Nov 9, Louis Terrenoire, Minister of State, told the delegation that friendship with Israel was one of the fundamentals of French policy, "which we shall never give up, no matter what happens." This was interpreted as an allusion to the situation that would arise after the solution of the Algerian problem. In his reply, Hacothen called on France to help Israel become associated with the Common Market.

The delegation also met Pierre Pflimlin, Mayor of Strasbourg and former PM, and Raymond Schmittlein, chairman of the Gaullist UNR and president of the Parliamentary Franco-Israel Friendship Committee.

PM Debré told the delegation on Nov 16: "Israel is the living symbol of liberty and devotion to the cause of peace and democracy, and serves these great ideals in the spirit of the highest dedication." Hacothen replied that nowhere else in the world had he met such warm, unreserved and deep friendship towards Israel. (Ha'aretz, Oct 5, Nov 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 15, 20; Jer. Post, Nov 7, 8, 10, 12, 15, 17)

Negotiations on Restitution. Israel negotiated with France on the eligibility of Israelis who had been French citizens under Nazi occupation to restitution payments under a French-German agreement in 1960. Germany had made a lump-sum payment, to be distributed at French discretion. As France allowed dual citizenship, no difficulties were envisaged. (Jer. Post, June 22)

Economic Relations; Trade. According to Israeli statistics, the volume of Israel-French trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $4,677,000; imports $46,803,000. In 1960 the figures were $4,479,000 and $25,425,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

[The increasing trade gap had been the subject of prolonged negotiations in 1960, which continued throughout 1961.] The trade protocol signed at the end of the year lifted most French restrictions, however.

On Dec 29, 1960, the 1961 protocol of the 1953 trade agreement was signed in Paris. It renewed the terms of the previous protocol; France and the French Community were to import $10 million worth of Israel produce during the year, while French exports to Israel were to be largely unrestricted. The protocol was made out in the name of all member-states of the French Community except Mauritania, and was also signed by representatives of the Central African Republic, Gabon, Malagasy Republic and Chad. (Kitvei Amanah, 417; Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, Jan 2)

In March the Assistant Director-General of the Israeli Foreign Ministry said that if no agreement was reached during the forthcoming GATT consultations, a complaint against France for maintaining quantitative restrictions on Israel imports, in contradiction to GATT's policy of trade liberalization, would be addressed to GATT. (Jer. Post, March 12). [Apparently, no such complaint was raised.]

In mid-Nov, Pinbas Sapir, Israeli Minister of Commerce and Industry, discussed trade relations in Paris. A complaint about discrimination against Israeli industrial products, which did not benefit from the preferential quotas extended by France to certain countries outside the Common Market, and double taxation were also discussed. M. Jeanneney, the French Minister of Trade, was reported to be sympathetic to Israel's case. Prominent French businessmen also promised a joint effort to make larger purchases in Israel. (Ha'aretz, Nov 16, 17)

On Dec 5 Israel, France and the countries of the French Community (except Mauritania, Senegal and the Ivory Coast—the latter concluded a separate agreement with Israel) signed the trade protocol for 1962, according to which Israel for the first time became free to sell industrial products in France without administrative restrictions, while France retained a similar right in Israel. Quotas were established for Israeli citrus fruit and for certain categories of Israeli farm produce till then excluded from the French market. (Jer. Post, Dec 6; Kitvei Amanah, 424)

On March 6 the French Minister of Finance opened the Israel pavilion at the Lyons fair. (Ha'aretz, March 7)

A number of ships were built in French shipyards for Israeli firms. In April, and again in May, the French Deputy Minister for Merchant Marine visited Israel for talks on Israel shipbuilding orders. Shalom, Zim Israel Navigation Co.'s 23,000-ton transatlantic passenger liner, was to be built at the Atlantique shipyard in St. Nazaire at a cost of about $16 million. (Jer. Post, April 24, May 4, 15). A 13,000-ton freighter for Israel was launched in France in March. (Jer. Post, March 21). In Aug Zim reached an agreement for the building of two freighters for $2.5 million—80% of which was to be covered by a five-year loan at 5% interest. (Ha'aretz, Aug 13). On Aug 11 the 7,300-ton liner Moladet was delivered to Zim at Nantes. (Ha'aretz, Aug 11, Sept 8)

Negotiations on El Al's transatlantic flights through Paris were started in May and successfully concluded in Sept. (Ha'aretz, May 15, June 19, Sept 19)

On Sept 24 six members of the French Centre for the Advancement of Business arrived in Israel for a week's stay as guests of the Foreign and Defence Ministries on their first organized trip outside France. (IGPO/WNB, No. 26, Sept)

In Oct the Israeli Transport Ministry rejected the application of an import agency for permission to sell Renault-Dauphine cars. The reason, it was thought, was that in 1959 Renault had unilaterally terminated, under Arab pressure, the assembly of vehicles in Israel. (Ha'aretz, Oct 3)

Cultural Relations. In a survey on the implementation of the 1959 Franco-Israel cultural agreement, published on May 19, the Cultural Advisor of the French embassy in Tel Aviv stated that the exchange of visits by scientists was continuing, a chair of French studies was to be established at the University of Tel Aviv, and French was taught as a second foreign language in most Israeli secondary schools. (Ha'aretz, May 19)

On May 29-30 the Franco-Israel joint committee for the application of the cultural agreement met in Paris for the second time (see MER 1960, p 296). It was agreed that France and Israel would encourage the study of each other's language and culture throughout the school system. In addition to Israeli measures to this end (the same as detailed in MER 1960, p 296), French secondary school students would be able to choose Hebrew as the first foreign language; the Sorbonne would establish a chair for Jewish studies and Hebrew culture; lectureships in Hebrew and Hebrew culture would be established at the universities of Rennes, Lyons, Toulouse and Montpellier, and a chair in Hebrew at Lille; the University of Strasbourg would train Hebrew teachers for French secondary schools. Joint French-Israel research enterprises and symposiums were to be established in physics, chemistry and mathematics. The exchange of students was to be encouraged. (Ha'aretz, June 4, 7)

French Visitors to Israel included: Edouard Bonnefous, member of the Senate (Jer. Post, March 6); Senator Edgar Faure (March) (Jer. Post, March 26, 27, 28, April 5); Henri Michel, Inspector-General of Public Education, to lecture under the auspices of the Israel-France Friendship League (May-June) (Jer. Post, May 31); Paul Minot, the Mayor of Paris (Nov) (Jer. Post, Oct 30, 31, Nov 2, 3); René Mayer, ex-PM and vice-president of the Alliance Israélite Universelle and of the Jewish Colonization Association (JCA) (Jer. Post, Oct 16, 18, 20, 25); [a number of French scholars, especially in Jewish studies, and scientists] and 50 French students of the "Know Israel" organization, for a month's stay under the auspices of the Histadrut (July). (Jer. Post, June 30; Ha'aretz, July 17)

Israeli Visitors to France included: Brig. Ezer Weizmann, Commander of the Air Force (March), who met his French counterpart and officials of the Foreign and Defence Ministries (Ha'aretz, March 5); Shimon Peres, the Deputy Defence Minister, to visit (with Brig. Weizmann) the International Air Exhibition (May-June) (Jer. Post, Ha'aretz, June 2); Yohai Bin-Nun, C-in-C. Navy (July), to meet the French Navy Commander (for an exchange of views) (Jer. Post, July 4); a delegation from the town of Holon for the declaration of Holon and Suresnes as twin cities (May) (see MER 1960, p 296). (Ha'aretz, May 8, 12, 16)

Gestures of Friendship. French and Israel warships exchanged courtesy visits. (Ha'aretz, Jan 20; Jer. Post, Sept 6)

In May a memorial plaque was unveiled on the front of the Hotel de Castille, in Paris, where Theodor Herzl, founder of the Zionist movement, wrote his novel Altneuland. Dr Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Zionist Organization, the Israeli Ambassador and the Mayor of Paris were present. (Ha'aretz, May 16)

In Sept President Ben-Zvi and PM Ben-Gurion congratulated President de Gaulle on the failure of the attempt on his life. De Gaulle thanked them for their good wishes. (Ha'aretz, Sept 13, 14)

In Oct Israel Friendship Days were held in France — with lectures, performances by dance troupes, an Israeli section in the second biennale of young painters, sales exhibitions in nine cities and the premiere of the film "Exodus." (Ha'aretz, Oct 12)

THE GERMAN FEDERAL REPUBLIC

Unfavourable GFR Attitude Reported on Diplomatic Relations and Israeli Ties with EEC. [During 1961, in response to Arab pressure, the GFR maintained its policy of not establishing diplomatic relations with Israel. See also MER 1960, pp 180-1.]

On Sept 3 the London Sunday Telegraph reported from Tel Aviv that relations with Bonn had cooled after the rejection in July of Israel's application for association with the Common Market on the same terms as Greece owing to West Germany's proposal to refer it for further consideration. Bonn was turning a deaf ear to Israel's approaches for diplomatic relations. Israel, for whose goodwill Dr Adenauer would have been prepared to pay a high price only a few years ago, was now of only secondary importance to Bonn, the report concluded. (Sunday Telegraph, London, Sept 3)

An Israel Foreign Ministry spokesman said that, "if somewhat exaggerated, the report also contains some truth." Germany's attitude on both these issues was "not overly friendly", and this had not been received with "complete understanding" on Israel's part. (Jer. Post, Sept 4)

In Sept Dr Yahlil, Director-General of the Israel Foreign Ministry, stated that West Germany's attitude to Israel had been "disappointing" recently, but he described the British press reports as "greatly exaggerated." He said that, according to unofficial information, the GFR had raised political objections to Israel's request. "We must assume that Bonn's attitude is dictated by real or presumed interests in the Arab countries," he added. "It is known to us that the Arabs are exerting strong pressure against any positive relationship between Israel and the Market." However, Israel's trade relations with West Germany were "very satisfactory," Dr Yahlil said. (Süddeutsche Zeitung, München, Sept 16)

A German press report said that in the official GFR view the Reparations Agreement was adequate compensation to Israel, and establishment of diplomatic relations could be postponed indefinitely; the leaders of the opposition German Social Democrats favoured them in the near future, it was reported (Ha'aretz, Sept 8). [However, the reported attitude of Willy Brandt, Mayor of West Berlin, the party's candidate for the Premiership, was somewhat equivocal.] He was reported to have told an Israeli correspondent: "The Social Democratic Party is interested in the development of the best possible relations between Germany and Israel, and will act accordingly when it achieves power. I am sure we can find a formula for the normalization of relations between our countries in accordance with the special interests of both." (Davar, Aug 21)

On Nov 30 Dr Eliezer F. Shinnar, head of the Israel mission in the GFR, said he would continue to represent Israel in West Germany "until normal diplomatic relations are established," though the Reparations Mission would wind up its affairs in the next six months. (See below, Reparations). (Jer. Post, Dec 1)

Contradictory Reports on $300 million Loan. [In March 1960, following PM Ben-Gurion's meeting with Chancellor Adenauer in New York, reports not confirmed in Israel stated that the latter had promised Israel a $300 million loan. They were also denied by German official sources, especially by German representatives in the Arab countries (MER 1960, pp 180-1, 290). During 1961 there were new reports that such a loan would be granted when reparations ended; these were also denied.]

On Jan 2 the Israeli press reported that in principle the West German government had agreed to the loan to finance development projects as a continuation of reparations. It would be financed by banks and companies, with a government guarantee, and be granted in ten-year $30-million instalments, mainly for buying industrial equipment. (Ha'aretz, Jan 2)

This report was immediately denied by Israeli and GFR official sources. (Ha'aretz, Jan 3, 4, 5)

However, in Aug Israeli government circles were reported to be "disappointed" with the GFR government's intention to grant the loan not in 1961 or 1962, but only after the completion of reparations in 1963. (Ha'aretz, Aug 20)

Earlier, on July 13, Chancellor Adenauer was reported to have told the press that GFR aid to the UAR "will not be used for attack against Israel," adding that after the last reparations had been paid in 1963, "the situation will have to be looked into once again. We will stand by our moral obligations towards Israel." (Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, July 14)

Reparations Agreement Nearing End; Growing Income from Personal Restitution. [The GFR-Israel Reparations Agreement signed on Sept 10, 1952, was due to expire in 1965. Israel was granted some DM3450 million ($850 million) as compensation for material damage suffered by Jews at Nazi hands.] At the end of the year it was reported that orders had been placed for most of the $150 million still to Israel's credit. Only a skeleton staff would remain at the Israel mission in Cologne. (Jer. Post, Dec 1)

Earlier, Israeli and West German official sources declared that the agreement would not be extended. On March 2, Dr Shinnar, the head of the Israel mission, said there would be no new purchase under it after the end of 1962, except for some $90 million for fuel in $18.7-million yearly instalments. (Ha'aretz, March 3)

Heinrich von Brentano, the GFR Foreign Minister, said in a television interview on June 30: "I believe that nobody thinks of extending the Reparations Agreement. It attempted—certainly not to a sufficient extent, because it is impossible to make good with money what happened during the Third Reich—to make a certain compensation and help start the State of Israel." After the treaty expired relations with Israel would be like those with other countries, he added. "Naturally it will then be decided in each individual case how much we will invest there, how far we encourage private investments and how far we are going to guarantee them," he said. (Jer. Post, July 2)

Meanwhile, Israel's income in foreign currency from German restitution payments to individuals markedly increased: from $70.8 million in 1959 to $100.6 million in 1960 and $111.5 million in 1961. (Bank of Israel, Annual Report 1960, May 1961; Report 1961, May 1962)

Commercial Relations, Investments and Tourism. The volume of Israeli-West German trade in 1961 was Israeli exports $24,800,000 and imports $84,808,000, compared with $21,107,000 and $71,934,000 respectively in 1960 (IFT, 1961). [This made the GFR Israel's second largest supplier—after the US and before the UK—and its third largest customer after the US and the UK. Israeli imports were largely financed by German reparations.]

It was noted in Israel that reports of the export of vehicles from Germany did not include numbers of Volkswagens and Opels sold to Israel. [These makes were prominent in Israeli car imports.] It was assumed that the companies feared the Arab boycott. (Ha'aretz, Aug 11)

On Jan 14 it was announced in Stuttgart that certain German cities would grant Israel a loan of DM1.5 million ($275,000) as a token of goodwill. (Ha'aretz, Jan 15)

On May 17 it was learnt that municipal councils in Bavaria would buy $255,000 worth of Israeli bonds. (Ha'aretz, May 17)

An agreement between Israel and the GFR to abolish dual taxation was initiated in Sept in Jerusalem. It included other fiscal provisions designed to encourage investments.

West German banks and financial institutions, it was reported, had acquired stock in Israeli companies. Legislation granting investment allowances for enterprises in developing countries had also been enacted in the GFR. Israeli Treasury circles expected an increased flow of private capital from the GFR as a result. (Jer. Post, Sept 3; Ha'aretz, Sept 4)

According to a German tourist industry source, about 5000 West German tourists visited Israel in 1960. (Ha'aretz, July 20)

Visits: German Youth Groups. [A growing number of West German youth groups visited Israel during the year.] In March a visiting group of the Christian Democratic party's youth movement, headed by a member of Parliament, brought a message from Dr Adenauer, asking Israeli youth to regard the group as messengers of goodwill. It expressed the hope that meetings between German and Israeli youth would contribute towards "the conciliation to which German youth aspires." (Ha'aretz, March 5)

Youth hostels in Israel were being built by West German municipalities to "facilitate the visit of German youth and to establish cultural ties with Israeli youth." The Deputy Minister of Education stated in the Knesset on March 22. The Anna Frank House at Tel Hay was the first. (Ha'aretz, March 23)

Dr Heinrich Gruber, the Lutheran Surrogate Bishop of Berlin, who appeared for the prosecution in the Eichmann trial, visited Israel in Oct. His stay and his views on Germany were widely reported in the Israel press. On Oct 18, he was received by the President, and the first saplings in a 15,000-tree wood in his name, sponsored by his friends, were planted in the Jerusalem Forest by Dr Gruber and his family. (Jer. Post, Oct 19)

Ben-Gurion's Attitude. On April 4, in an interview with a German correspondent, PM Ben-Gurion was quoted as saying that the Eichmann trial would cause no deterioration in relations with the GFR. Dr Adenauer, Willy Brandt and other contemporary German leaders, had nothing in common with the leaders of the Third Reich. "We want the German youth of our days to know what happened; that is why Eichmann should be tried." On April 10, Dr Adenauer said in Bonn that he was thankful for Ben-Gurion's pronouncement. (Ha'aretz, April 5, 11)

Arms Sales to GFR Opposed in Knesset. (See also MER 1960, pp 296-7.) At the end of May the London Observer reported that West Germany had sold Portugal large quantities of Israeli sten guns for use in Angola.

An Israeli spokesman said that Israel did not manufacture sten guns, nor did she sell them to any country. Ha'aretz added that the GFR had bought Israel-made Uzi machine guns.

Shimon Peres, the Deputy Defence Minister who was abroad at the time, said that the sales agreement with Israel allowed the GFR to dispose of the arms as she wished. But, he added, he did not believe the Observer report. (Ha'aretz, June 1, 2, 4, 5)

The report was officially denied in Bonn. (Ha'aretz, June 7, 8)

In Nov, during a debate in the UN Trusteeship Committee, a Czechoslovakian delegate quoted a New York Times despatch saying that the West German government had supplied Portugal with 10,000 Israel-made machine guns. The Israeli representative denied the charge. (Jer. Post, Nov 8)

On Nov 29 the Communist, Herut and Mapam parties presented motions for a debate in the Knesset protesting against arms sales to Germany (the Communist motion spoke of sales "to Hitler's generals"). The Knesset decided not to debate the issue. Achdut Ha'avodah, which belonged to the coalition, abstained. Its spokesman explained that it opposed the sale of arms to Germany and reserved the right (under the coalition agreement) to abstain in the Knesset on this issue. (Diorei Haknesset, Nov 27-29, pp 496-500)

Israel's Security and East-West Tension Over Germany. Relations with Germany were also debated after the formation of the new Israeli government on Nov 2. Menachem Begin, the Herut leader, argued that as there was serious tension between the GFR and Eastern Europe, especially the USSR, who suspected the GFR's intentions and her renewed military power, Israel should not be involved in this delicate situation. Since Soviet Russia's policy in the ME was inimical to Israel she should be extremely careful not to increase this hostility. The Knesset had been assured, Begin continued, that Israel's security was involved, as Germany would supply arms "of a third dimension, which cannot be seen on the surface." Everybody had taken this to mean submarines but Germany had not delivered any. Begin said that even in the US a reappraisal was taking place, the GFR being regarded as a main factor in world tension and Nazism as deeply rooted in the German spirit. Why, therefore, he asked, should Israel be the only country to have no apprehensions regarding Germany?

In answer, PM Ben-Gurion reiterated his stand of 1959 and 1960 (MER 1960, p 291), namely, that "this is not the same Germany: Adenauer's Germany is not Hitler's Germany." Moreover, he added, Germany, like Britain and France, was no longer a world power. "I do not believe the anti-German propaganda emanating from the Eastern bloc," he declared. "I wish to tell the people who assume that there is only one country prepared to sell us arms [France] that this country is an ally of Germany," he said. President de Gaulle certainly remembered the past, but he knew "that France, Germany, Italy, the UK and the US must stand together to safeguard peace." Begin's arguments were those of East Germany and her allies, while "I may be permitted to take care of Israel's needs and interests and true peace in the world." (Diorei Haknesset, Oct 30, Nov 2, pp 207-8, 249)

Opposition to Cultural Relations with Germany. On June 22 it was learned that the Ministry of Education had sent a teachers' delegation to West Germany, among other countries, to study vocational training methods. (Ha'aretz, June 22, 23)

On June 25 the matter was discussed in the Cabinet: FM Golda Meir reportedly admitted that the timing might have been inopportune. The majority of ministers, it was reported, opposed the despatch of the delegation, but PM Ben-Gurion argued that relations with Germany must not differ from relations with other countries. At a press conference, Abba Eban, the Minister of Education, maintained that Israeli government policy was to foster contacts with the GFR. (Ha'aretz, June 26, July 2)

There were adverse reactions in the Israeli press. Hatzofeh deplored the sending of the delegation during the Eichmann trial, "to imbibe the pedagogical theories of the people of murderers" (June 26). Ha'aretz castigated the government for "this harsh assault on the feelings and memories of the people" (July 3). Lamer-Aav called the step "a grave mistake" (July 2).

On Nov 28 Eban said, in reply to a Knesset question, that the decision to include West Germany in the delegation's itinerary was taken on the recommendation of the Foreign Ministry in response to an invitation in the name of the President of the GFR. (Diorei Haknesset Nov 27-29, p 494)

On Oct 10 Dr Dickman, a German pastor, visited a class in a Jerusalem high school. The matter was raised in the Knesset on Oct 18 by a Herut spokesman who argued against cultural ties with Germany. Eban then replied that German visitors were not banned from Israeli educational, scientific and cultural institutions. His Ministry had agreed to the school visit of Dr Dickman who had been warmly recommended by the Foreign Ministry, as he had been active in anti-Nazi efforts in Germany.

The Knesset decided by 28 votes (Herut, Mapam, Achdut Ha'avodah and the Communists against Mapai), with many abstentions, to hold a debate on the subject of German visitors to Israeli schools. (Ier. Post, Oct 19)

Knesset Debate on Cultural Relations with Germany. The debate took place on Jan 2, 3 and 9, 1962; most speakers dealt with Israeli-German relations in general. Herut, Communists, Agudat Israel and Poalei Agudat Israel members, and an NRP member, declared that the German people had no changed since Nazi times and that there should be no cultural relations at all with Germany. Mapai supported relations, while the Liberals, Mapam and Achdut Ha'avodah took positions between these two views. Following are some views expressed:

Avraham Drori (Herut) declared that "another Germany exists only in the imagination of one man in this house" and quoted the Attorney-General in the Eichmann trial, who stated that the Jews would never forget or forgive the murderers. He asked how the schools could explain the Holocaust to the pupils if they were faced with a German telling them of "the good children in Germany."

Menachem Begin, the Herut leader, quoting from Luther among others, argued that the German people as a whole, not just the Nazis, was responsible for the Holocaust, and there must be no cultural relations with them.

Mordechai Nurock (NRP) who made the same point, added that the German teachers were among those who bore the prime responsibility.

Moshe Sneh (Communist) quoted from German textbooks to show that West-German schools treated the Nazi period sympathetically and slurred over its horrors.

Ya'acov Katz (Poalei Agudat Israel) said that even if for "political, security and economic reasons" relations with Germany were necessary, there must be no cultural ties; "the people cannot accept this."

Jona Kesne (Mapai) argued that, though strong Nazi tendencies existed in Germany, there were also weaker anti-Nazi trends, and suggested that Israel should encourage the latter, both for humanitarian reasons and because of Israel's specific and vital interests in relations with Germany "which cannot be detailed here." Why should Israel assume, he asked, that the Israelis would be influenced by the Germans and not vice-versa?

Another Mapai speaker, Meir Argov, argued that while trying to impress knowledge of the Holocaust on the youth, Israel must be very careful not to foster racial hate. To guard against this danger there should be personal contact with such Germans as Pastor Dickman.

Both Kesne and Moshe Kol (Liberal) called for a distinction in relations between states and relations between peoples. Kol said that there could be no normal relations between the generation responsible for the Holocaust and the generation that was its victim, though he did not argue that there was collective responsibility and that present-day Germany was "the continuation of Nazi Germany." However, there was as yet no "new Germany"; for instance, many thousands of Nazis were still in official positions. Israel should therefore act "naturally" according to the circumstances; if German youth wished to visit Israel and see Yad Vashem, the memorial to the Holocaust, this should be permitted, but there was no need to grant Germany a "certificate of purity."

Emma Talmi (Mapam), who similarly opposed both "the Israel policy of wholesale forgiveness" and "collective punishment," advocated a policy of "no arms sales, no teacher delegations, no cultural ties" but formal relations only. She also said that the commandment "to remember everything and to forget nothing" included those Germans who opposed Hitler and were friendly to the Jews. These should be invited to Israeli schools.

Similar views were expressed by Israel Bar-Yehuda (Achdut Ha'avodah).

Herut, the Communists and Agudat Israel submitted resolutions to terminate all cultural relations with Germany (the Communist proposal read: the German Federal Republic). The Liberal's resolution followed the lines of Kol's speech (above). All these proposals were rejected and the Knesset adopted a government resolution, given below. (Divrei Hakeseset, Jan 1-3, 1962, pp 850-64; Jan 8-10, pp 902-12)

Ruling on Cultural Relations. On Jan 9, at the end of the debate, the Knesset "took note of" the following rulings on cultural relations with Germany, presented by the Minister of Education:

Israel may participate in international events in Germany and vice versa. "Suitable" visits by Germans, particularly young persons, would be permitted.

An inter-ministerial committee would choose suitable representatives to disseminate information in Germany. No Germans would be allowed to perform in Israel or Israelis in Germany, insofar as the government was responsible. The inter-ministerial committee would decide on Israeli participation in artistic events in Germany to which an Israeli body was invited.

Study in Germany would not be encouraged and no foreign currency would be allocated for the purpose. German scholarships would not be accepted. Advanced study in Germany would be permitted only where it was vital to the state; technicians would be allowed to study in German plants only in connection with the operation of equipment bought in Germany.

The establishment of branches of German institutions, companies or organizations in Israel would not be permitted but contributions to philanthropic institutions where the contributors took no part in management would be allowed.

Public organizations and institutions invited to send delegations to Germany or wishing to invite Germans, would receive government guidance according to these rulings. (Divrei Hakeseset, Jan 8-10, 1962, pp 907, 911-2)

Israeli Stand on West New Guinea. On Nov 27, during the UN General Assembly discussion of the West New Guinea problem, Michael Comay, the Israeli representative, said that though Israel supported direct negotiations in any dispute, the government of Israel did not believe that two countries could decide by bargaining the fate of a third country. The principle of self-determination must be respected, he added, and the final say must rest with the inhabitants of West New Guinea (A/PV 1066, Nov 27). (For Israel's voting on the issue, see p 29.)

PORTUGAL

Portugal Criticizes Israel's Stand on Angola. On Jan 3, 1962 the Portuguese FM, Dr Alberto Franco Nogueira, was reported to have told an Israeli correspondent that Portugal was very disappointed with Israel's attitude on the Angola question in the UN (Israel voted for the Afro-Asian draft resolution on the subject—see p 14). Israel, together with the Afro-Asian and Soviet blocs, he said, "accused us of genocide and endangering the peace. The Israeli delegation alone charged us with racial discrimination... I do not criticize the Israel government, but your African policy is aimed at gaining the sympathy of young states." Israel needed Western, not African, support in case of an Arab attack, he declared. The Arab countries, he added, had also adopted an unsympathetic attitude to Portugal, but they disclosed a certain understanding and usually kept silent, "while Israel also speaks against us."

Portugal did not recognize Israel de jure, he said, according to the correspondent, because "Portuguese public opinion would not agree to our recognizing those who vote against us; politics is not philanthropy, my dear friend, it is give and take." (Lamherav; Yediot Aharonot, Jan 4, 1962)

[There was an Israel Consulate-General in Lisbon; Portugal had never established any representation in Israel.]

Israel Refuses to Sell Arms to Portugal. The Angola issue came up in Israel also in connection with the reported appearance of Israeli Uzzi submachine guns in the possession of Portuguese soldiers in Angola.

In Sept it was officially denied that there were any Israel arms in Angola. (Ha'aretz, Sept 21)

On Nov 28 Shimon Peres, Deputy Defence Minister, stated in the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee that Israel had not supplied Portugal with arms, directly or indirectly, and that the government had taken steps to ensure that Israel-made arms were not supplied to Portugal by a third party.

The next day, Peres stated in the Knesset, in reply to questions, that the Belgian Fabrique Nationale (FN) which was producing Uzzi guns on licence, had applied for permission to sell them to Portugal, and he read a letter to the company saying that "the Israel Foreign Ministry categorically objects, in accordance with the policy of the Israel government, to the supply of these arms to Portugal... Israel does not wish arms to be supplied to areas of international tension or to colonialist states engaged in suppressing national movements fighting for freedom." FN had stated, Peres continued, that it had supplied no Uzzi guns to Portugal, and experience had shown that the company's communications were completely trustworthy. He also said that Israel had earlier categorically rejected a direct Portuguese request for the sale of these arms. (Divrei Haknesset, Nov 27-29, p 508-10)

(There were also allegations that the arms had been supplied to Portugal by Western Germany. See above: German Federal Republic.)

Trade: According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israeli-Portuguese trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $291,000 and imports $4,708,000, compared with $740,000 and $3,547,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

She recalled the evidence given at the Eichmann trial on the Danish underground's aid to the Jews during the Nazi occupation.

At an earlier news conference, Mrs Meir said that Israel was anxious to have some kind of association with any European market group, as most of her trade was

On Feb 17 a Finnish delegation signed a trade agreement in Jerusalem providing for mutual most-favoured-nation treatment and listing the goods to be exchanged. Payments were to be settled in convertible currency. The Israel government ratified the agreement on March 26. (Ha'aretz, March 27; Kivvi Amana, 418)

According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israel-Finland trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $3,344,000; imports $10,455,000, compared with $3,120,000 and $8,752,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

NORWAY

Visit of Israel FM. From May 12 to 17 Mrs Meir, the Israel FM, visited Norway. The Norwegian FM, Halvard Lange, said at a dinner on May 12: "We feel convinced that the modern and democratic State of Israel has an important part to play on the world scene, a part which in the long run can be successfully performed only in cooperation with the neighbouring states."

Mrs Meir met Mrs Aase Bjerkholt, Minister of Family and Consumer Affairs, held talks with FM Lange, and was received by PM Einar Gerhardsen. The talks, described by Mrs Meir at a press conference as "highly satisfactory," touched on the general international situation, UN problems and relations with developing countries. "I was extremely fortunate to be the recipient of all the goodwill which there is among the people of Norway towards the people of Israel," Mrs Meir said. An official communiqué was released on May 16.

In her public appearances, Mrs Meir dwelt mostly on Israel's wish for peace with the Arabs and her cooperation with the African countries.

She was received on May 15 by King Olav, and was the dinner guest of the Speaker of Parliament, N. Langhale. On the following day she was the guest of honour at the Royal Palace, when King Olav took the salute at the National Day parade, and attended a luncheon given by Arne Skaug, Minister of Foreign Trade. (IGPO/WNB, No. 10, May; Ha'aretz, May 14, 16; Jer. Post, May 17)

Norwegian Premier Visits Israel. PM Einar Gerhardsen officially visited Israel on Nov 15-22 (Ha'aretz, Oct 2, Nov 16). He had talks with President Ben-Zvi, FM Ben-Gurion and the FM, and toured the country, being welcomed by the mayors of the principal cities, and leaders of the Histadrut and Mapai (the Israel Labour party). He attended a session of the Knesset and planted a tree in the King Haakon Forest, established in memory of Norway's late king. (Ha'aretz, Nov 17, 20, 22; Jer. Post, Nov 19, 21)

At a dinner on Nov 16, PM Ben-Gurion called him a "worthy representative and leader of a people that loves peace and the liberties of men and nations... a people that has always shown sincere friendship not only in word, but also in deed, to our people and our country." PM Gerhardsen said: "The prominent place which the idea of cooperation has gained [in Israel] indicates a more comprehensive democracy than the one which has materialized in most of the democratic countries." Norway and Israel were both interested in "a state of international justice and security, which will enable us to unite our resources in constructive work for peace. This would also serve the interests of the developing countries, which both Israel and Norway consider it important to help." (IGPO/WNB, No. 34, Nov)

At a farewell dinner given in Jerusalem by Gerhardsen on Nov 21, Ben-Gurion paid a warm tribute to the visitors. PM Gerhardsen replied: "We are particularly grateful for the human contact which we feel we have obtained with the people of Israel, who met us with spontaneous sympathy. A deep impression we carry with us is the national melting-pot process... The fact that a process of this kind can succeed is of extreme importance, not only for Israel but also for the rest of the world, because it demonstrates that language obstacles and social inequality can be overcome provided that there are faith and the will to succeed. It is assuring to know that the democratic labour movement is presented in such a manner in this part of the world." (IGPO/WNB, No. 34, Nov; Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, Nov 22)

Talks: "No Problems." At a press conference on Nov 21, PM Gerhardsen described his talks with Israel government leaders as "general"; there were no problems in the relations between the two countries, he added.

A suggestion by Israel officials for Israeli seamen to be trained in Norway would be taken up by the maritime organizations of the two nations. The efforts of Israel and Norway to cooperate with the emerging nations had been discussed in a general way, and more concrete talks on the subject might take place soon. He declined to comment on ME affairs and the Suez blockade. He invited PM Ben-Gurion to visit Norway. (Ha'aretz, Nov 22, 23; IGPO/WNB, No. 34, Nov)

Lecturing in Oslo in Dec, PM Gerhardsen said it would be good if the Arab nations adopted a realistic attitude towards Israel, for she was a living, positive fact and would continue to exist and develop. Arab-Israel peace would be a blessing to both parties and the whole area. Israel was an example of a free democratic state and could help the Arab nations solve their problems. (Ha'aretz, Dec 14)

Economic Ties: Proposed Cooperation in Aid to New Countries. According to Israeli statistics, the volume of Israel-Norway trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $1,985,000; imports $3,400,000. In 1960 the figures were $1,573,000 and $2,235,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

On March 14 Arne Skaug, the Norwegian Minister of Commerce and Shipping, arrived in Israel for a week's official visit at the head of an economic delegation. A joint communiqué issued on March 21 said that there was room to enlarge mutual trade, and it was agreed to hold formal negotiations in June for the renewal of the trade agreement. Economic and technical aid to developing countries was discussed and possibilities of Norwegian-Israeli cooperation—especially exchange of information—in these fields noted. Further study was to follow FM Golda Meir's visit to Norway (see above).

The problem of Israel's relations with the European Free Trade Area was also discussed.

Skaug told the press that Norway insisted that ships of all countries must be allowed to pass through the Suez Canal. He had told the press the same thing in Cairo before leaving for Israel. (Jer. Post, March 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 22; Ha'aretz, March 22, 23)

On June 15 a commercial and payments agreement was signed in Oslo, superseding the agreements of 1953 and 1955. Trade restrictions and the clearing agreement were abolished; payments would be made in free and convertible currency. A joint economic committee was established. (Kitvei Amanah, 421)

On March 26 a 600 ton deep-sea trawler, Az-Gud, to be operated by Israeli fishermen under a Norwegian master, was delivered by a Norwegian yard to a Canadian-Israeli group. (Jer. Post, March 13; Ha'aretz, March 26)

In Sept goods from Norway were exhibited at the International Exhibition of Applied Arts in Tel Aviv. (Jer. Post, Sept 14)

SWEDEN

Israel Foreign Minister Visits Sweden. FM Golda Meir visited Sweden from May 7 to 12. Her official programme included an audience with King Gustav Adolf, and talks with PM Erlander and FM Uden. She also was a guest of the Stockholm Municipality, the Cooperative Federation and the Trade Union Federation. (Jer. Post; Ha'aretz, May 8, 10, 11)

Visits, Gestures of Friendship. In May it was reported that the Swedish Fund for Israeli Children had raised hundreds of thousands of dollars and established youth hostels in Youth Aliya villages in Israel. The Israel-Swedish Friendship Association maintained links between Sweden and these hostels. (Jer. Post, May 7)

In June an exhibition of Swedish industrial arts was held at the International Cultural Centre for Youth in Jerusalem. (IGPO/WNB, No. 13, June)

Starting on July 1, Swedish citizens were exempted from the need for prior entry visas to Israel. (IGPO/WNB, No. 10, May)

Abba Eban, the Minister of Education, represented Israel at Dag Hammarskjöld's funeral at Uppsala and discussed scientific cooperation with Swedish institutions. (Ha'aretz, Oct 9; Jer. Post, Oct 15)

Arne Geijer, president of the Swedish Trade Union Confederation and the ICFTU, was a guest of the Histadrut in April. He explained the Swedish Transport Workers' Union's reversal of its decision to boycott Egyptian shipping in connection with the Egyptian closure of the Suez Canal to Israeli trade (see MER 1960, p 41, 298) as due to its discovery that such a boycott was against the law, and the shippers would have brought the matter before the labour court. Dag Hammarskjöld had nothing to do with it, he declared. (Jer. Post, April 6)

Other visitors from Sweden included: Mrs Inge Thorsson of the Stockholm Municipality, to study Israel's educational programmes for students from developing countries (Jan) (Ma'ariv, Jan 27); a six-man delegation of the Swedish Wood Workers' Union (Sept) (Jer. Post, Sept 22, Oct 6) and a five-man delegation of the Swedish Cooperative Federation (Oct), both groups as guest of the Histadrut. (Jer. Post, Oct 6)

Trade. According to Israeli statistics, the volume of Israel-Sweden trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $4,267,000; imports $7,740,000. In 1960 the figures were $4,663,000 and $7,442,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

SPAIN

[Israel and Spain had no diplomatic or consular relations, although Spain had a consulate in Jerusalem to look after the interests of Spanish institutions and citizens.] The Israeli writer Natan Bialitzky was named correspondent of the Barcelona Academy of Literature for his Hebrew translation of Don Quixote. The translation was studied by Prof. Milas Valeriusa, an authority on Hebrew literature, who had translated the Hebrew poetry of Bialik into Spanish. (Jer. Post, June 18)

A radio-telephone service was opened between Spain and Israel. (Ha'aretz, Oct 4)

Trade. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israeli-Spanish trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $147,000; imports $178,000. In 1960 the figures were $528,000 and $90,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

SWITZERLAND

Question of Heirless Assets in Swiss Banks. (Background Note.) The following is the background to this issue, which was not solved during the year, as given in the Israeli press.

During the Hitler period European Jews managed to transfer some of their funds and valuables to Swiss banks and safe deposits. Since this was illegal, and involved great risk, the owners used fictitious names and addresses, in many cases only code numbers.

After the war the Allies held a conference on reparations in Paris. The "Final Act" of the conference stipulated that the unclaimed assets, in neutral countries, of victims of Nazi persecution should be made available for the rehabilitation of non-repatriable survivors. An Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees was empowered to administer the funds thus collected and was directed to work through "appropriate public and private field organizations."

On June 14, 1946, an agreement for the distribution of the funds was signed. It recognized that a majority of the survivors referred to in the "Final Act" were Jews and provided that 95 per cent of the heirless funds were to be allocated for their resettlement.

Shortly afterwards, the American Joint Distribution Committee (which was set up after World War I to meet Jewish needs in war-devastated Eastern Europe) and the Jewish Agency were designated as the appropriate field organizations to administer the rehabilitation of the Jewish victims.

In May 1946 the head of the Swiss delegation negotiating with the Allies stated in a letter to the Allied governments that his government would "examine sympathetically" the question of how to put the heirless property at their disposal. However, all approaches to the Swiss government proved fruitless; it explained that the Swiss banks were opposed to any step that might undermine their traditional policy of strict secrecy.

Following requests by the two Jewish organizations, the government of Israel intervened with the Swiss government in March 1954. (In the summer of 1950, the Director of the International Refugee Organization—the successor to the Inter-Government Committee—in a letter to the Five Powers, noted that the Israel government had undertaken to resettle many of the survivors and that it had a moral right to claim the heirless property.)

The Israel approaches had no noticeable result until March 16, 1959, when the Federal Minister for Justice made a statement in the Swiss Bundestag to the effect that a law was being drafted providing for the ascertainment of heirless property in Switzerland. (Jer. Post, May 4, Sept 6)

Bill on Heirless Property Drafted. In June, 1961 the Swiss Ministry circulated a draft bill on the matter among various parties concerned. (Jer. Post, Sept 6)

On July 5 Dr Nahum Goldmann, President of the World Jewish Congress, the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency, suggested amendments to the bill in meetings with Friedrich Wahlen, the Swiss President, and Ludwig von Moos, head of the Ministry of Justice and Police (Ha'aretz, July 6, Sept 10). An Israel Foreign Ministry official went to Switzerland to study the bill there. (Ha'aretz, July 11)

The Israeli press commented that the draft bill left responsibility to the banks, which were to decide which of their accounts were affected. Even if the banks could be relied upon to act according to the highest motives, it was argued, how could they decide whether in fact a deposit belonged to a "foreign national or stateless person who suffered religious or racial persecution?"

It was also pointed out that the draft bill made no reference to the 1946 Allied arrangement, but called upon the Federal Assembly, once all the property was collected, to "regulate" its use, "taking account of the origin of the monies." The latter phrase was described as rather vague. (Ha'aretz, Aug 27; Jer. Post, Sept 6)

[No reports on further developments were received during the year.]

Various Contacts, Visa Agreement. From Nov 2 Swiss nationals were not required to present entry visas to Israel. (Ha'aretz, Nov 5). [There was no reciprocity.]

In April a study group of the Swiss List Society visited Israel. They met Ministers [and agreed with Israel banks and research institutions on cooperation in economic and social research, and showed interest in investment opportunities.] (Jer. Post, April 21)

In April it was announced that the Swiss Government would help to finance the training of 17 Israeli foremen in Switzerland under the patronage of the Israel government, the ILO and ORT, within the Swiss government's technical assistance programme. (Jer. Post, April 21, 23)

In Nov three professors from Basel University were declared Honorary Fellows of the Weizmann Institute, Rehovot. (Basler Nachrichten, Basel, Nov 17)

Trade. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israeli-Swiss trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $13,734,000; imports $19,660,000. In 1960 the figures were $12,045,000 and $21,126,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

UNITED KINGDOM

Supply of Centurion Tanks. On Feb 2 the British Foreign Office announced that Centurion tanks were being supplied to Israel. (Ha'aretz, Feb 3)

Earlier, Reuter stated, quoting informed sources in London, that this was a fulfilment of a 1958 decision to sell Israel a limited number of tanks, in accordance with Britain's policy of supplying reasonable quantities of arms to Middle East states for legitimate defence needs. The three-year delay in fulfilling the contract was normal. The British government was still in favour of great restraint in the delivery of arms to the Middle East area. (Jer. Post, Feb 1). [For Arab reaction see Eg. Gaz., Feb 1; see also p 191 a.]

On Feb 10, 14 Centurion tanks from England reached Haifa (Ha'aretz, Feb 12). In May a Centurion tank formation took part in manoeuvres in Israel (Jer. Post, May 19). In Dec A.P. quoted a UN report of Dec 4 that in the previous year the UK had sold $896,000 worth of arms to Israel and $772,000 worth to Jordan. (Ma'ariv, Dec 4; UN Commodity Trade Statistics, Jan-Dec 1960, Part II, Exports, p 709)

Visa Concession to British Travellers. On Feb 27 it was announced that British subjects residents of the UK, Northern Ireland and the Channel Islands no longer required visas to enter Israel. [Israelis visiting the UK still needed visas. There were similar arrangements with certain other countries.] (Jer. Post, Feb 28)

PM Ben-Gurion's Visit to England. Talks on ME, Africa. PM Ben-Gurion visited England on June 2-4 on his way to France after his visits to Canada and the US. The visit was described as a private family week-end, which also enabled him to meet British statesmen. On June 2, Ben-Gurion met the Earl of Home, the Foreign Secretary, for half an hour, and then PM Macmillan. (Jer. Post; Ha'aretz, June 4)

At both meetings, it was reported, Ben-Gurion spoke mainly about current political tension in the ME and the need to cooperate with the new nations of Africa. He expressed concern at the growing military power of the UAR and drew attention to the stream of Soviet arms still pouring into that country. Diplomatic sources suggested that the two PMs had discussed the possibility of further Israeli arms contracts with Britain, and that Ben-Gurion might also have raised the question of a declaration on the integrity of the present borders (Jer. Post, June 4). (According to press reports Ben-Gurion had discussed this issue also with President Kennedy.)

On June 2 a Foreign Office spokesman said that Ben-Gurion and Lord Home had had a "talk on matters of common interest for half an hour." The following day Foreign Office sources stressed Lord Home's non-committal attitude on the refugee question; the British had not given up hope of a settlement of this issue, which would be jeopardized by taking sides now. In view of Abdel Nasser's tiff with the Soviet Union over the arrests of Communists in Syria, the Foreign Office was being especially careful not to antagonize him. (Jer. Post, June 4)

The talk with Macmillan was described by Ben-Gurion's aides as truly cordial; the Israeli PM told reporters that he was "more or less satisfied" with the discussion. However, the Jerusalem Post correspondent thought Ben-Gurion had apparently elicited less response than in his earlier conversations in the US and Canada. (Jer. Post; Ha'aretz, June 4)

Ben-Gurion Meets Churchill. On June 2 Ben-Gurion met Sir Winston Churchill for the first time, although they had long corresponded. They conversed for 25 minutes, surveying milestones of Jewish and British history and Zionism.

After the meeting PM Ben-Gurion expressed his admiration for Sir Winston, "the greatest man of our time." The Times wrote: "It was a sentimental journey and an historical occasion: The Israeli Premier paying homage to the greatest living Englishman, who describes himself as a life-long Zionist." (Jer. Post; Ha'aretz, June 4)

On June 2 Ben-Gurion met British Zionist leaders. He spent the week-end at Oxford. (IGPO/WNB, No. 11, 12 June; Jer. Post; Ha'aretz, June 6)

Status of Jerusalem in British Court. On Sept 29 the question of Jerusalem's status as part of the State of Israel was raised before the Bow Street magistrate's court in the hearing of the Israel government's request for the extradition of Shalom Shtarkes, wanted in a kidnapping case. As the alleged crime had been committed in Jerusalem, Shtarkes' counsel inquired whether the extradition treaty between Israel and Britain (see MER 1960, p 298) covered crimes committed in that city. Counsel for Israel pleaded that in the case of The Arab Bank vs. Barclays Bank, in 1955, the House of Lords had ruled that the British government had accorded Israel de jure recognition, and had recognized its hold on its part of Jerusalem de facto. He argued that for the purpose of extradition de facto recognition was sufficient.

On Nov 13, the Chief Magistrate, reportedly following Foreign Office advice, rejected the defence claims that Jerusalem was not covered by the extradition treaty. (Jer. Post, Oct 1, 6, Nov 14)

Trade. According to Israeli statistics, Israel's exports to the UK in 1961 totalled $35,756,000; imports were $80,090,000. In 1960 the figures were $36,079,000 and $59,344,000 respectively. (IFT, 1961)

(The UK held third place in imports to Israel and was the second-best customer for her exports.)

On May 22 a British trade delegation arrived in Israel for a ten-day study tour of Israeli fashions. (Jer. Post, May 23)

Investments, Loan, Joint Enterprises. On Jan 17 the cornerstone of Carmel Forge, a joint investment of two British firms and an Israel government company, was laid at Tirat Hacarmel. The British partners, B.S. Massey of Manchester and Forging and Presswork Ltd., of Birmingham, hold 12½% of the shares each and were to provide know-how and training. The plant was to produce tractor and vehicle parts and tools. (Jer. Post, Jan 18)

Another joint enterprise was the Scottish-Israel Machine Tools Co. in Holon. (Ha'aretz, May 19)

British financiers lent El Al Israel Airlines close to $1 million for over seven years at 6½% interest for the purchase of a third Boeing 707 passenger aircraft. (Jer. Post, Jan 24)

In Feb B.A. Henderson of the British Railways Advisory Service, visited Israel in connection with a preliminary survey of a project to extend the railway from Beersheba to Eilat (about 150 miles) and to link the Dead Sea Works at Sodom with the Eilat line. There was a British offer (among others) for a 25-year credit for half of the estimated £14 million required for equipment and materials, the other half to be provided by the Israel government. (Financial Times, May 2)

In June Pinhas Sapir, the Israel Minister of Commerce and Industry, visited Britain, meeting businessmen and prospective investors. (Ha'aretz, June 9)

On July 25 the director-general of Bank Leumi le-Israel stated that during the first half of 1961 the Israel Investment Authority had approved investments of more than $10 million from the UK. (Ha'aretz, July 26)

In Oct it was learned that the Leyland Motor Company had agreed in principle to the assembly and progressive manufacture in Israel of its 1,200-c.c. Standard-Triumph passenger cars. The vehicles could be exported; the same applied to trucks and buses to be assembled at the Leyland plant in Ashdod. (Jer. Post, Oct 5)

Various Contacts. On June 18 the establishment of the "Bridge" project, for closer relations between British and Israeli youth, was reported. A public committee was set up in Britain, with Col. R. Henriques as Honorary President; it was affiliated to a British committee for youth service headed by the Duke of Edinburgh. An Israeli committee would work in cooperation with the Ministry of Education and the Gadna youth corps. (Ha'aretz, June 18)

On Nov 9 England's "under-23" eleven trounced the Israel national youth team in Leeds by 7-1, avenging their 4-0 defeat at Ramat-Gan in May 1960. (Jer. Post, Nov 10)

On Nov 20 an exhibition of British books was opened at Tel Aviv, later moving to Haifa. (Jer. Post, Nov 21, Dec 12)

British Visitors. British visitors to Israel included: George Brown MP, Deputy Leader of the Labour party (Jan); Sir Myer Galpern, Labour MP (Feb); Lord Henderson and Lord Inman, Labour Peers (March); M.I. Michaels, Under Secretary, Atomic Energy in the Ministry for Science and British Representative on the Board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (May); Lt-Gen. In May a British parliamentary delegation headed by Sir Douglas Glover (Conservative) visited Israel for a week, returning the UK visit of a Knesset delegation in 1960 (MER 1960, p 298). (Jer. Post, May 7, 8, 9, 10, 15) scout jamboree on Mount Carmel (Aug.). (Jer. Post, Feb 21, April 23, Aug 2; Ha'aretz, July 21)

On 14 and 15 Sept five ships of the British Mediterranean Fleet arrived at Haifa on a six-day courtesy call. (Jer. Post, Sept 15, 16, 21)

THE UNITED STATES

Note: All developments primarily related to the Arab-Israeli Conflict have been recorded under that heading, (pp 193 ff, 228 ff).

BEN-GURION'S US VISIT AND MEETING WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY (May)

The announcement on May 11 that PM Ben-Gurion would pay an official visit to Canada on May 24 prompted the immediate assumption that he would also wish to meet President Kennedy.

In Israel it was thought that the date for the visit was chosen to enable Ben-Gurion to meet the President, presumably in New York, on May 29 or 30, before the latter's scheduled departure for France.

The US announced the forthcoming meeting on May 22. Until then US official spokesmen had refused to comment, and even on May 21 the White House spokesman declared he could say nothing on the subject. (Jer. Post, May 14, 22, 23)

Speculation followed on the issues Ben-Gurion intended to raise with the President (e.g. Jer. Post, May 22, 24; NYT, May 23, 29); those suggested were in general identical with the subjects later reported to have been discussed.

PM Ben-Gurion himself commented, on his return from Canada, the US, the UK and France on June 8, that, with the formation of the new US administration, changes in international relations were to be expected. His objects had been, he said, to explain Israel's attitude on the world situation, the position in the ME, and her own problems, to clarify as far as possible the attitudes of the various government leaders on these questions, and to contact representatives of Jewry. (IGPO/WNB, No. 12, June)

PM's Activities in the US. Ben-Gurion arrived in New York from Montreal on May 28, and met Dag Hammarskjöld, the UN SG, for a two-hour off-the-record review of international problems, including the ME. On May 29 he conferred with Mayor Wagner of New York and Senator Jacob Javits, and later spoke in Philadelphia on the tenth anniversary of the Israel Bond Drive. As official guest of the state of Pennsylvania, he met Governor David Lawrence and received the honorary citizenship of Philadelphia.

The following day he conferred with American Jewish leaders, had a telephone conversation with former President Eisenhower, and spoke at a luncheon at the UN, given by Michael Comay, the Israel representative, and attended by leaders of 50 delegations headed by Frederick Boland, President of the General Assembly. In reply to Boland's wishes for Israel's peace and progress, Ben-Gurion expressed his regret that her closest neighbours were not represented. History and geography had linked Israel with the Arabs, and it was his deep conviction that peace would come, he said. He called for a joint Arab-Israel effort to conquer "the real enemies of the ME"—the deserts and wasted water resources.

On June 1 the PM met George Meany, President of the AFL-CIO, and other labour leaders; Nelson Rockefeller, Governor of New York; Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson; Arthur Goldberg, US Secretary of Labour; Ogden Reid, former US Ambassador in Israel; Adlai Stevenson, permanent US delegate to the UN; Mrs Eleanor Roosevelt; Louis J. Lefkowitz, Attorney-General of New York State; and Prof. Enrique Rodriguez Fabregat, Uruguay's permanent representative at the UN. He lunched with Harry Truman, the former US President. (IGPO/WNB No. 12, June; Israel Digest, June 9)

Talk with President Kennedy. PM Ben-Gurion conferred with the President in New York on May 30, a few hours before the latter's departure for Europe for talks with President de Gaulle and PM Khrushchev.

Ben-Gurion presented the President with the book A Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, by Count Nicolai Radzivil (an ancestor of the President's brother-in-law), published in 1614.

Also present were Avraham Harman, Israel Ambassador to the US, Phillips Talbot, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, and Myer Feldman, Deputy Counsel to the President. The talk lasted for an hour and a half.

The separate official statements made no mention of ME problems. The American statement said the President was happy to have had the opportunity again to get the views of the Israeli PM. The Israeli statement spoke of a constructive exchange of views on problems affecting the two countries and a review of a number of world problems.

The Arab refugee problem was a main topic of the talks. A statement by PM Ben-Gurion, at a press conference on June 1, that he had found a large measure of agreement with President Kennedy on the problem, evoked a State Department reaction to the effect that, though the issue had been raised, no agreement on any particular solution had been reached. (NYT, June 2; Ha'aretz, June 4; for details see: The Arab-Israel Conflict, p 197.)

On other topics, the following picture emerged from press reports quoting highly-placed sources:

The two statesmen had agreed that the relative quiet prevailing in the ME at the time must be preserved. Ben-Gurion had said that this tranquillity might prove deceptive and that to preserve it the balance of armaments in the area must not be upset. He had expressed concern over continued Arab intransigence toward Israel, and the continued flow of modern Soviet heavy arms to the Arab states, and called attention to President Abdel Nasser's ambitions to expand his power. He made no request for arms, however.

It was reported that the Israeli side felt that the President, though not making any commitments, understood Israel's armament difficulties, and that even if the US preferred not to supply arms herself, she would be prepared to consider economic measures that might help Israel to meet her defence needs from other sources.

The PM had also spoken of Israel's assistance to the new nations of Asia and Africa, and had touched on the financial burden involved in the aid activities.

Ben-Gurion had expressed Israel's support for Western economic aid for the economic, social and cultural progress of the Arab countries.

The question of Israel's second atomic reactor was not raised.

Israel sources said the PM was impressed by the President's detailed knowledge and intimate understanding of ME problems in general and of Israel's situation in particular.

The President was said to have been generally satisfied with the conversation and impressed by the PM's moderation, and to have discovered a greater similarity of approach to some subjects than he had expected. (NYT, May 31, June 2; Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, June 1, 2)

US Assured Arabs on Meeting? When the possibility of the meeting was first publicly mentioned, President Kennedy sent letters of goodwill to five Arab heads of state touching on US relations with their countries and the Arab-Israel conflict (see p 197 h). A New York Times correspondent, reporting from Beirut immediately after the meeting, said the letters were meant to reassure the Arabs that it would not impair US-Arab relations. The paper later wrote that the letters had been sent "ten days before Ben-Gurion's visit" (NYT, June 3, 5). The Kennedy letter to President Abdel Nasser, as quoted in Al-Hayit and, a year later, in the Cairo press and radio, was, however, dated May 11. (Eg. Mail, Sept 22, 1962; R. Cairo, Sept 21 [24] 1962), [i.e., the date of the announcement of Ben-Gurion's visit to Canada].

ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, LOANS

New agreements on US economic assistance to Israel concluded during the calendar year 1961 amounted to $67.2 million. (For details, see pp 74-5 and compare with aid in 1960—MER 1960, pp 48-9.)

Loans by the Export-Import Bank totalling $25 million were announced by President Kennedy at a press conference on March 15. He said they were to be used to purchase agricultural machinery, to help consolidate Israel's agricultural settlements and to provide electrical power and construction equipment for the expansion of Israel's seaports. "This decision, I think, will help speed the development of Israel's economy," President Kennedy said. (NYT, March 16)

US Grants Terminated, Farm Surplus Allocation Reduced. Israel expected a gradual reduction of US economic assistance. The US grant of $7.5 million for the US financial year 1960/61, given in the form of surplus grain, was to be the last grant-in-aid (NE Report, June 15), and the allocation to Israel of US agricultural surplus under P.L. 480 was reduced to $25.9 million in 1961 as against $30.2 million in 1960 and $37.7 million in 1959.

These reductions were seen in Israel as prompted by a reallocation of priorities in the US to meet urgent needs in Africa and Asia, and also by Israel's improved economic situation.

An official Israeli source stated that the reduction in farm surplus allocations as envisaged in the agreement signed on May 10, was due to three specific causes: The stockpiling of agricultural commodities had reached the limit of Israel's storage capacity; Israel had become self-sufficient in cotton; the Israeli government had chosen to dispense with the use of surplus feed grain for poultry in order to free poultry and eggs from the accompanying export restrictions. (Jer. Post, May 18)

On Nov 15, it was officially announced in Israel that £160 million was to be released for her 1961/62 development budget from funds accumulated in Israel by sales of US surplus agricultural commodities (DLF loans, Cooley Fund loans, and Government loans). (Jer. Post, Nov 16)

USOM Activities Nearing Conclusion. On Feb 7, at the closing ceremony in Haifa of an exhibition on ten years of US economic aid to Israel (which was displayed in various towns), S. Reed, head of the US Operation Mission, said that the termination of technical aid in June 1962 (see MER 1960, p 299) would not hurt Israel economically. Only two per cent of the $720 million she had received from the US in various ways during these ten years had come through the Technical Assistance programme. (Ha'aretz, Feb 9, April 2, 10)

According to a press survey of USOM activities issued in Dec, 360 experts had come to Israel and 587 Israelis had received grants for studies abroad during ten years of operations; investments had totalled £118 million and $15 million. (Compare with the figures in MER 1960, p 299). (Ha'aretz, Dec 18)

Tax Exemption of Donations to Jewish National Fund Reaffirmed. The US Treasury Department reconfirmed the exemption from taxes of grants and donations to the Jewish National Fund in the US. [All but a small part of these monies were spent in Israel]. The exemption was given on condition that the US National Committee of the JNF was authorized by the Treasury Dept. to supervise the expenditure of the monies. (Ha'aretz, June 28, July 3)

TRADE, INVESTMENTS

Trade. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israel-US trade in 1961 was: Israeli imports $173 million; exports $39 million, compared with $146 million and $29,363,000 million in 1960. (IFT, 1961) (The US was Israel's highest supplier and her best customer.)

In Jan the US World Fair Committee visited Israel to negotiate her participation in the New York Fair 1964/65, and met the President and FM Golda Meir. On Jan 8 the Cabinet decided that Israel would participate (Ha'aretz, Jan 9) [in 1962 however it reversed this decision]. Israel was represented at the New York World Trade Fair, which opened on May 3 (Ha'aretz, May 4), and at the Chicago International Fair, which opened on July 25. (Jer. Post, July 25)

Investments. In Jan the Kennedy, Cabbot and Partners investment company of California began selling Israel securities, in which, the company's president stated, interest had grown lately in the US because of the high profits they offered. (Ha'aretz, Jan 3)

On Feb 12 the Israel Cabinet decided to sell to a group of US investors 74 percent of the government's shares in Fertilizers and Chemicals, Ltd., Haifa. In the first stage they were to invest $6 million. (Kol Israel, Feb 12 [W 16])

The following joint enterprises and industrial cooperation agreements were reported:

The American-Israel Phosphates Company was granted exploration rights in the Negev and was to start prospecting in May. (Financial Times, May 18)

An agreement was signed between Negev Phosphates Ltd. and a major US concern (unnamed) for the manufacture of animal fodder additives; annual production was expected to total 40,000 tons. The US partner was to invest half the £14 million required in foreign currency. (Jer. Post, Sept 15)

A know-how agreement was concluded between United Carbon of Houston, Texas, and Petrochemical Enterprises, Haifa, for the establishment of a carbon black plant in Israel. This marked the final stage in the Israeli company's initial development of petrochemical industry. (Financial Times, Dec 13)

CULTURAL AND SCIENTIFIC RELATIONS, AID

Chairs in American Culture in Israel Universities. In March Robert Frost, the noted American poet, inaugurated the chair of American Culture and Civilization at the Hebrew University. He was received by President Ben-Zvi. (NYT, March 10; Jer. Post, March 12, 13, 14)

In June an agreement for the establishment of a chair of American Literature was signed between the US embassy and Tel Aviv University. (Ha'aretz, June 18)

Cultural Aid Funds. On April 29 the US and Israel governments jointly announced that the US Educational Foundation programme in Israel had been extended for a further five years. Its annual budget had been increased from $100,000 to $150,000. In four years the foundation, conducted by a board of six—three from each country—had enabled 53 Israelis to study for one to five years in the US, while 66 Americans had received grants to study in Israel. (Kol Israel, April 30 [W, May 4]; Ha'aretz, April 30)

In July the President of the Association of Universities in New York State visited Israel and met Abba Eban, the Minister of Education and Culture. He said that the Association intended to continue aid to institutes of higher education in Israel after the termination of the USOM programme in 1962 (see MER 1960, p 299). (Ha'aretz, July 27)

Nuclear Research. The US continued aid to Israel's atomic research reactor at Nahal Sorek (Rubin) which had been built with US assistance under the agreement on Cooperation on Nuclear Energy for Peaceful Purposes. (See also MER 1960, pp 287, 299.) On July 10 it was officially stated in Washington that the US would supply safety equipment for the reactor worth about $30,000, under the technical aid plan of the International Atomic Energy Agency (Kol Israel, July 10 [W, 20]; NYT; Ha'aretz, July 11). On Oct 11 it was officially announced in Washington that the US government had granted $350,000 towards the cost of the reactor. (Kol Israel in English, Oct 12 [W 19]; Ha'aretz, Oct 12)

On Oct 12 the Chairman of the US Atomic Energy Commission said that US scientists were to instruct Israelis in Israeli atomic installations (Ha'aretz, Oct 13, 15). Two American experts had spent four days advising on scientific problems at the Nahal Sorek reactor in Aug. (Jer. Post, Aug 17)

Desalination Plant. The Fairbanks Whitney Corporation of New York entered into partnership with the government of Israel to develop the Zarchin system of sea water desalination (invented by an Israeli engineer). (Ha'aretz, Jan 15, April 4; Kol Israel, March 29 [W, April 6])

Space Research. On Feb 13 it was announced that a satellite-tracking station had been set up at the Technion, Israel Institute of Technology, Haifa, and would operate in coordination with the Smithsonian Institute observatory in the US. (Kol Israel, Feb 13 [W 16]; Ha'aretz, Feb 14, 20)

On July 6 the US Government Space Agency and the US National Academy of Sciences expressed appreciation of the launching of the Israeli rocket (see p 223) and the hope that all the scientific information would be communicated to the international scientific community. (Ha'aretz, July 7)

US Studies in Israel. On June 9 the US Deputy Commissioner of Social Security told a congressional subcommittee that as there was probably less juvenile delinquency in Israel than in other countries, the Research and Training Branch of the US Social Security Administration was to spend $120,000 during the next two years on research into Israeli achievements in this field. (Jer. Post, June 11)

In April 50 US physicians began a clinical postgraduate course in tropical and regional diseases in Israel sponsored by the University of California (Los Angeles) School of Medicine. (Jer. Post, March 14, April 28)

In July-Aug 150 US dentists attended a dental seminar in Jerusalem. (Israel Digest, Sept 1)

Research Grants, Guest Lecturers. New research grants to Israel physicians by US public and private funds reported during the year in the press amounted to $253,400. (Jer. Post, May 25, Sept 13, Nov 21; Ha'aretz, Nov 15)

Many Israeli scientists were awarded grants for research in various fields under US Public Law 480. The grants reported in the press amounted to $257,000 and £12,669,300. (Jer. Post, Jan 20, Feb 7, 24, Aug 27, Sept 6; Ha'aretz, April 17, 30, Aug 14, Oct 31; JGPO/WNB, No. 25 Sept; Kol Israel in English, July 26 [W Aug 3])

A number of Israeli scientists were invited to lecture in US academic institutions. (See e.g. Ha'aretz, April 27; Jer. Post, June 11; IGPO/WNB, No. 26, Sept)

CONTACTS AND VISITS

Labour Contacts. US labour leaders visiting Israel included Joseph Curran, President of the American National Maritime Union and Vice-President of the AFL-CIO, to attend a meeting of the International Transport Workers Federation at Herzlia, in April (Jer. Post, April 10); Walter Reuther, President of the United Automobile Workers and Vice-President of the AFL-CIO, attended a cornerstone-laying of a youth centre to bear his name and was received by PM Ben-Gurion, in May. (Jer. Post, May 15, 16, 19)

George Meany, President of the AFL-CIO, and George Harrison, Vice-President, came in Sept. They were received by President Ben-Zvi and PM Ben-Gurion, met cabinet members and labour leaders, and attended the cornerstone-laying of a sports stadium at Nazareth to bear Meany's name. On Sept 17 the Histadrut announced that a donation of $25,000 had been received from an American labour union for the stadium and that its completion would be financed by US workmen (Ha'aretz, Sept 18). Meany said he was encouraged by the initial work of the Histadrut's Afro-Asian Institute (towards which the AFL-CIO contributed 60 scholarships—see also MER 1960, p 302), and the expansion of its activities would be discussed shortly. (Jer. Post, Sept 10, 13, 14, 15)

On June 4, at a dinner in Washington attended by 600 trade union officials, sponsored by the US National Committee for Labour to mark the Histadrut's fortieth anniversary, G. Meany received the Histadrut Pioneering Award. (NYT, June 5)

Gestures of Friendship; Various Contacts. The Los Angeles City Council declared Feb 9 Israel Day, to coincide with an Israel Bonds Committee occasion in the city (Jer. Post, Feb 9). The State of New York and New York City officially marked Israel Independence Day, April 20. Governor Nelson Rockefeller noted the friendly relations between Israel and the US, and Mayor Robert Wagner announced the ceremonies that were to be held. (Ha'aretz, April 14)

On June 10, Senators J. Javits, Philip Hart and Gale

McGee announced the formation of a committee to raise $2 million for the erection of a statue of liberty at Haifa Bay as a gift of the American people. (Ha'aretz, June 11)

In July five members of the Gadna Youth Corps air division left for the US as guests of the US Civil Air Patrol. A similar US unit visited Israel. (Kol Israel in A, July 19 [17]; IGPO/WNB, No. 18, July; Kol Israel, July 19 [W 27])

One hundred American scouts took part in the Eighth Israel Scout Jamboree in July. (Jer. Post, July 27, Aug 2)

Israeli Visitors to the US included: Binyamin Mintz, Minister of Posts (Jan) (Ha'aretz, Jan 8); Moshe Dayan, Minister of Agriculture, and Abba Eban, Minister of Education (March) (*Jer. Strong of the US State Department (July) (Ha'aretz, July 30); Phillips Talbot, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Oct) (Jer. Post, Oct 29); Senator Hubert Humphrey and a group of Congressmen (Oct); (For details see p 201b-IGPO/WNB No. 31, Oct); Senator Stuart Symington, member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Chairman of its ME subcommittee (Oct) (Jer. Post, Oct 30, 31); a group of 21 on behalf of the Fund for the Republic, headed by its President, Dr Robert Hutchins (Oct) (Jer. Post, Oct 30); Senator Estes Kefauver (Nov), who, at a press conference on Nov 22, supported the Johnston Plan for the diversion of the Jordan Waters (see MER 1960, p 206), and said that US Senate opinion generally was not satisfied with the continuation of UNRWA activity and thought a solution to the refugee problem should be found; he was also interested in Israeli experiments in water desalination (Jer. Post, Nov 20, 24; Ha'aretz, Nov 23, 24); Representatives William S. Moorhead and William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania, members of the House of Representatives Committee on Banking and Currency (Dec.). (USIS, Nov 29, Dec 5; Ha'aretz, Jan 7, 1962)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

COMMUNIST VIEWS ON ISRAEL

Israel's Elections and Mapai's "Militarist Policy." [Apart from sporadic references to the "bankruptcy" of the Ben-Gurion government, the Soviet press and radio paid little attention to the general elections to the Knesset in Aug. They figured prominently, however, in two critical articles.]

An article in New Times, entitled "Reactions in the Zionist Camp," attributed the elections to PM Ben-Gurion's "loss of influence," which was "a logical sequel to the widespread discontent with the policies of his Labour Party (Mapai)." Quoting Shimon Peres, the deputy Defence Minister, on Israel's need for a "psychological deterrent" vis-à-vis the Arab states, the article charged the Mapai leadership with having "set off a wave of war hysteria" that had "produced 20 incidents on the Israeli-Arab border in April-July, 17 of which had led to bloodshed." The Mapai leaders were fighting the elections "on a militarist and cold-war platform. War hysteria, they believe, will help their pre-election machinations. And that is understandable, for Ben-Gurion's support comes chiefly from quarters outside Israel, from the Western imperialists, who are utterly indifferent to the interests of Israel and to its people, both of which are regarded as pawns in an aggressive 'global strategy.'" (New Times, Aug 16)

Commenting in a similar vein, an earlier article in Krasnaya Zvezda linked the firing of the Shavit rocket (see p 223) with the forthcoming elections, "By timing the launching of the rocket for this period," declared the paper, "the Israel ruling group counted on raising the flagging prestige of the Mapai party," but the "militarist policy of the Ben-Gurion government, which is in the service of the imperialist forces, will be defeated... and cannot be saved by [such] sensational measures." (Krasnaya Zvezda, June 27)

"West German Aid for Israel's Expansionist Plans." In Sept Moscow Radio, in a talk entitled, "What Brings West Germany and Israel Close Together," referred to a "new financial agreement" concluded on Sept 3, which, although "primarily of a technical character... represents a new and serious threat to the Arabs." (The agreement abolished double taxation and included other fiscal provisions designed to encourage investments—Ha'aretz, Sept 4.) Describing West Germany as an "active partner in the arms race in Israel," the broadcast said that German reparation payments had contributed to the "rapid establishment of a vast Israeli industry, including the war industry." The Bonn government had a great interest in this, for it was equipping its army with Israeli arms, while the extremist, aggressive Israeli circles hoped to use the arms in carrying out their aggressive, expansionist plans against the Arabs. (R. Moscow in Arabic, Sept 5 [SU 8])

"NATO Encourages Israeli Production of Atomic Weapons." An article in Krasnaya Zvezda, which accused the Israel government of a provocative intensification of military preparedness—citing the holding of an army parade in Jerusalem (p 214) and other instances—referred to the construction of Israel's second nuclear research reactor, "which, according to foreign press reports, was intended for the purpose of work on the creation of atomic weapons." (See also MER 1960, p 89.) Israel, the paper said, was clearly unable to finance such an undertaking, and the financial sources were "in Washington, London, Paris, Bonn and other capitals of NATO member-states." "This senseless adventure," the article warned, "is extremely dangerous to the countries of Asia and Africa and no less dangerous to Israel herself." (Krasnaya Zvezda, June 21)

Links between Israel and NATO military objectives were also alleged in an article in New Times: "There have been more frequent border incidents since Ben-Gurion's visit to NATO countries [in May-June to Canada, the US, the UK and France] and more talk in Tel Aviv about producing atomic weapons. Secret work in that direction is being conducted in the Negev desert at NATO expense and with the help of NATO experts... Of course, the imperialists are pursuing their own aims in encouraging Ben-Gurion to intensify his adventurist policy. A short while ago Israel was visited by representatives of the US naval command. They inspected the construction of the new port at Ashdod Yam, near the UAR frontier, a joint Israeli-American project. The port will be used as a base for the US Sixth Fleet." (New Times, Aug 16) [Ashdod port was designed to serve as the commercial outlet for Israel's southern areas.]

Israel's Cooperation with Afro-Asian States. — "In the Service of Imperialism." The expanding scope of economic and technical cooperation between Israel and other new states in Africa and Asia continued to come under strong attack in the Soviet press and radio, with Israel invariably cast as the Trojan horse of "Western imperialism." (Compare MER 1960, p 89.) An article in International Affairs described Israel as "the servant of neo-colonialism in Africa" and maintained that, since her economy was severely strained, her leaders could only "impose their 'aid' on the African countries" because of the assistance they received from United States capitalism: "All the Israeli firms... operating in Africa are directly dependent on American capital. The US monopolists control their activities through the so-called Jewish Agency and the Histadrut, reactionary Israeli trade unions, which are holders of shares in... Israeli companies operating in African countries." Part of the aid received by Israel since 1948 "from United States capitalists... has passed through the hands of the colonialist henchmen in the Mapai Party, [and] was earmarked as bait for those who can be taken in by Israel's alleged anti-colonialism." (International Affairs, Moscow, Jan)

Similarly, an article in Trud, entitled "Colonizer's Bridge," cited Walter Reuther, the American trade union leader, as having declared that, since the new states in Africa and Asia did not suspect Israel and the Histadrut of colonialist designs, she should utilize this untainted image in order to build a "bridge" between the Afro-Asian world and the West. Western social democratic leaders had asked their Israeli colleagues, the article said, to assume the leadership of social democracy in Africa and Asia so as to "enslave these countries economically and to undermine the front of the liberation struggle." However, the article added, the resolution of the Casablanca Conference in Jan showed that the Afro-Asian nations were not deceived by Israel's protestations of friendship, but recognized her as an "accomplice of the colonial powers." (Trud, May 26)

The Eichmann Trial: "Israel Covers Up For Nazis in the GFR." No Soviet journalist attended the trial of Adolf Eichmann and it was only briefly noticed in the USSR press. Soviet reactions mainly emphasized the limited scope of the proceedings, which, it was claimed, merely indicted one man, while seeking to exonerate those of his former superiors and associates who now occupied important posts in the GFR. Israel's "ruling circles" in general, and PM Ben-Gurion in particular, were accused of having connived at the suppression of evidence that would have incriminated highly-placed persons in West Germany and revealed the "neo-Nazi character" of its government. "The arrest of Eichmann," declared the Pravda article, "caused serious concern in Bonn ruling circles, who fear that the trial... may expose many former Nazis who presently occupy responsible positions in the GFR and in NATO... And the ruling circles in Bonn spare no efforts to transform the trial of Eichmann into a farce. They have found allies among Israel's ruling clique."

As a result of a meeting between Ben-Gurion and West German representatives in Brussels in June, 1960, and "in order to avoid strained relations," the Israel PM had ordered a curtailment in the publication of material relating to the investigation and promised to acquaint the GFR government with this material in advance, the article alleged. The Israel government, it added, had thus "entered into collusion with revanchist circles in the GFR" and was trying "to protect other Hitlerite criminals from exposure" but "the agreement... will not escape attention. That trick won't work." (Pravda, April 28)

These charges were reiterated in the central and provincial press. (See Mizan, June.)

A cartoon in Pravda of May 5 depicted "Hitlerites under cover [of a judge's robe] in Jerusalem and in Bonn." In June, a Pravda article claimed that it was "no accident that both the court and the representatives of the bourgeois press prefer to speak only of the dead—the dead victims of Nazism and the dead Nazi Führers." The article repeated a Communist press charge that Ben-Gurion had assured Chancellor Adenauer in a personal letter that the Israel government would do "everything possible in order not to impair Bonn's prestige in the course of the trial." In return, Israel expected "to meet with understanding from the GFR in matters of economic aid and the supply of arms." But public demand in Israel was growing for the punishment of "Eichmann's accomplices who occupy leading posts in . . . West Germany," the article declared, and "neither the Israeli nor the Bonn defenders of Fascist criminals will succeed in shielding the Hitlerite murderers." (Pravda, June 23)

An article in Izvestia by an East German journalist who attended the trial, followed the general line of Soviet comment, but added that, "contrary to the wishes of its organizers and despite the efforts of Bonn," the trial had incriminated "the present German militarist state, which follows in the footsteps of the Hitlerite criminals." (Izvestia, Sept 3)

On Nov 28 the Israel Minister of Justice stated in the Knesset that the USSR had not responded to Israel's request for documentary material relating to the Eichmann trial; documents had, however, been received from Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland. (Divrei Hakeneset, Nov 28, p 471)

The "Pernicious Character" of Zionism and the Class Struggle in Israel. The fundamental Communist thesis on Zionism was recapitulated by Z. Sheinis in the Jan New Times. Recalling Lenin's opposition to the separatist aspirations of the Bund (the non-Zionist Jewish Socialist party), the author denied the national character of the Jewish people, and declared that Zionism, as "the ideology and political banner of the Jewish bourgeoisie," was unable to resolve class antagonisms. The notion of "a single world-wide Jewish nation is simply absurd," he declared, and "the Jews are not a homogeneous entity as to class character." Consequently, "it is not by assembling in a national 'home' that the Jewish people can break out of capitalist exploitation . . . but by fighting in labour's common ranks against the exploiters, for the final defeat of imperialism." This attitude was exemplified by the Israel Communist Party, which was "tirelessly combating Zionism and exposing its pernicious character." Israel's leaders, "who have the impudence to call themselves Socialists," were trying to delude the masses with talk about a chimerical national unity: "...unity of exploiters and exploited, are we to understand? But no sooner do the workers demand better conditions and back up their demands with strike action than these Zionist rulers call out the police to beat them up and throw them behind bars." (New Times, No. 4 Jan)

The alleged intensification of the class struggle in Israel, and such manifestations of it as strikes and demonstrations, received comparatively wide publicity in the Soviet press. In the words of one writer, "the strike movement in Israel is embracing wider and wider sections of the population and the consciousness and political maturity of Israeli workers is growing." (Aziya i Afrika Segodnya, May; see also Trud, July 4, 8; Izvestia, Nov 15)

USSR-ISRAEL RELATIONS

Israel Policy Statements; Ben-Gurion Advocates East-West Guarantee for ME Borders. Commenting on Israeli relations with the Soviet Union, the Israel Foreign Minister, Mrs. Golda Meir, declared in the Knesset on March 20 that it was precisely their "static" character which was undesirable. "For our part," said Mrs. Meir, "we shall spare no efforts to bring about mutual understanding, for we are firm in our desire for an improvement in the atmosphere." (Divrei Hakeneset, March 20, p 1363)

PM Ben-Gurion told the press, on May 26, during his visit to Canada, that Israel would welcome Soviet participation in a big-power guarantee of ME borders. (NYT, May 27; Ha'aretz, May 28)

[He was also reported to have raised such a proposal in his talks with President Kennedy and PM Macmillan. Ben-Gurion had advocated such a measure in 1960. (See MER 1960, pp 3-4, 88.)]

Russian Jewry and Israel. Speaking in the Knesset on Nov 15, the Israel FM, Mrs. Golda Meir, expressed the government's "deep anxiety" over the prison sentences imposed on six Jewish community leaders in Moscow and Leningrad on charges of espionage. "We were shocked to read the accusations levelled against these Jews," declared Mrs. Meir. She emphasized that Israel had always sought friendship with the USSR, as with all other states. Israel demanded the same of the USSR as of any other state, namely, that the Jews living in it should be accorded: "(1) the possibility of a free national-cultural life like all the other nationalities of the USSR, and (2) freedom to leave for every Jew who wishes to join his family and his people in the State of Israel." A resolution embodying these demands and expressing anxiety over the fate of the Russian Jewish community, following the prison sentences, was unanimously passed by the Foreign Affairs and Security Committee of the Knesset on Dec 5. (Divrei Hakeneset, Nov 15, p 364; Ha'aretz, Dec 6)

Justice Hayim Cohen of the Israel Supreme Court, who had been a member of the UN Human Rights Commission, stated in Tel Aviv that each year the Commission received thousands of complaints from Israeli citizens, charging the USSR with infringing human rights by refusing to allow their relatives to join them in Israel. (Ha'aretz, April 23)

Expulsion of Israeli Diplomat on Espionage Charges; Israel Reaction: "A Tissue of Falsehoods." On June 29 Tass announced that the Soviet government had demanded the recall of Ya'acov Sharett, First Secretary at the Israel embassy in Moscow, on charges of "espionage activity." Tass said that he had "established espionage contacts and illegally distributed anti-Soviet Zionist literature" in the course of visits to various regions of the USSR and had been "caught red-handed" while attempting to obtain secret documents. (Pravda, Izvestia, June 30)

An Israel Foreign Ministry statement of June 30 described the charges as a "tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end." It denied that Sharett or any other Israeli diplomat had ever engaged in espionage or the dissemination of anti-Soviet material in the Soviet Union, and declared: "This is a case of flagrant provocation by the secret police. The propaganda aims of the statement are obvious and it is unlikely to deceive anyone." (Jer. Post, July 2)

Sharett described his arrest as having been carried out "in classical style" in a Riga hotel where he was staying with his family. He and his wife had been taken to police headquarters and interrogated for approximately three hours. "We were given some rough treatment and my wife still has bruises," he said. He described the affair as "a complete frame-up." (Jer. Post, July 2)

[Ya'acov Sharett is the son of Moshe Sharett, Chairman of the Jewish Agency Executive and one-time Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Israel.]

Some months previously, another member of the Israel embassy staff in Moscow was attacked in Trud for having used "every opportunity to palm off on the Soviet people... the worst kind of anti-Soviet literature" and accused of disseminating hostile propaganda material in synagogues (Trud, March 16). A spokesman of the Israel Foreign Ministry denied the charges. (Jer. Post, March 17)

Cultural Exchanges; Visits. Three musicians from the Soviet Union gave a series of concerts in Israel between June 11 and July 6. The arrival of the musicians, who were the guest of the Israel-Soviet Friendship League, was widely greeted in Israel as the first such appearance of Soviet artists since the establishment of the State. An editorial in The Jerusalem Post referred to Israel's prolonged and hitherto vain efforts for cultural exchanges with the USSR, and expressed the hope that the present visit was the "harbinger of a new era of normal artistic exchanges between Israel and the Soviet Union." The artists were reported to have been greatly impressed by their enthusiastic reception by the Israel public. (Ha'aretz, June 12, July 17; Jer. Post, June 21)

In Nov a Kharkov Opera singer appeared with the Israel National Opera. (Jer. Post, Nov 6, Dec 4)

The import of Russian books into Israel had been rising constantly, it was reported, and Israel was believed to occupy third or fourth place among purchasers of USSR books (Ha'aretz, Sept 7). Israeli imports of Soviet books, newspapers and periodicals amounted to $53,600 in 1961 (IFT, 1961). [The Israel Programme for Scientific Translations was engaged in the translation of Russian scientific works into English.]

Israeli delegations attended international congresses in the USSR on irrigation and biochemistry. (Ha'aretz, July 26, Aug 24)

An Israeli official was to take part in a seminar for fisheries administration in the USSR organized by the Soviet government and the FAO. (Jer. Post, Sept 6)

Trade. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israel-USSR trade in 1961 was: Israeli imports $263,000 and exports $406,000, compared with $108,000 and $312,000 respectively in 1960. Israel's main import in 1961 was asbestos and her main export textiles. (IFT, 1961)

During the ceremony, Archbishop Makarios reiterated his policy of friendship with all nations, especially Cyprus' neighbours, and said that the establishment of diplomatic relations would be to the common interest of the two countries. (Cyprus Mail, Jan 21; see also MER 1960, pp 181-2)

ETHIOPIA

De Jure Recognition; Declarations of Friendship Between "Sister Countries." On Oct 24 it was announced that Ethiopia had extended de jure recognition to Israel. A cable from Ato Ketema Yifru, Acting Foreign Minister of Ethiopia, to the Israeli FM, stated: "...The Imperial Ethiopian Government has accorded full recognition to the State of Israel. May I on this occasion express... my conviction that the most cordial and friendly relations which characterized the relations between our two sister countries will be all the more strengthened by this recognition. It is also my hope that this will pave the way for closer and more fruitful collaboration between our two Governments in all fields of human endeavour."

Mrs Meir, in reply, expressed Israel's "profound satisfaction and sincere appreciation" of the Ethiopian step and continued: "I am convinced as you are that this recognition will further contribute to the most cordial and friendly relations which so happily exist between our two sister countries. The Government and people of Israel will make every attempt to deepen this relationship and to strengthen active collaboration between the two countries for their common benefit, in the spirit of their traditional friendship and their historic bonds. It is our sincere belief that such collaboration will serve the aims of peace, security and prosperity in our region." (IGPO/WNB, No. 10, Oct; L'Ethiopie d'Aujourd'hui, Oct 28)

An Ethiopian paper commented that Ethiopia, who was linked to Israel by ancient affinities as well as by economic interest, was guided by the principle of the interdependence of nations and the spirit of non-alignment and justice in international politics. She had also taken into account the problems of peace and security in a region constantly troubled by political and economic instability. Ethiopia had therefore finally normalized her relations with Israel, who was accepted by virtually all nations except the Arab states.

Ethiopia had been considering this step since 1956, when the Israeli Consulate was established in Addis Ababa, but had reserved her attitude because Israel was a new state which "had to prove herself" and, even more, because of the susceptibility of Israel's Arab neighbours.

Time had done its work, however, and Israel had won the admiration of the Presidents of Upper Volta, Madagascar and other African states, some of them Muslim, who had friendly and normal relations with her. The Africans, who, like the Jews, had suffered from discrimination, were struck by the admirable reconstruction work carried out by ex-inmates of Nazi concentration camps.

The paper mentioned the expanding commercial and shipping ties between the two countries, whose economies, it said, were complementary, the work of Israeli experts in Ethiopia, and the studies of Ethiopians in Israel.

The long time Ethiopia had taken to recognize Israel had not been without embarrassment for her, as a profound believer in international morality, the paper concluded. But this was rectified now. Ethiopia aspired to a durable peace between Israel and her neighbours, both of whom had everything to gain from cooperation in a spirit of coexistence. (L'Ethiopie d'Aujourd'hui, Oct 28)

Israeli Foreign Ministry officials regarded the Ethiopian decision as particularly significant in view of Arab pressure to prevent it. It was felt that the Ethiopian government's resistance to this pressure reflected its self-confidence and stability, as well as the close and many-faceted relations between Ethiopia and Israel. A number of Israeli missions in Ethiopia were working in agriculture, fishing, construction, education and public health; the Ethiopian Government Hospital at Massawa and the Technical College at Addis Ababa were under the direction of Israelis and commercial relations had been expanded. The hope was also expressed that Ethiopia's recognition might serve as an example for Greece and Iran, who had been hesitant to recognize Israel de jure. (Jer. Post, Oct 25) (Iranian papers, in fact, presented the Ethiopian step as an example to Iran; see below: Iran.)

It was assumed in Israel that mutual representation (hitherto by Consulates-General) would be raised to embassy rank. (Ha'aretz, Oct 26)

The Israeli press welcomed Ethiopia's step. (Davar; Al-Hamishmar; Omer; Hatzevo; Lamerhav; Jer. Post; Oct 25, 26, 27) (For Arab reactions see p 189 a.)

Economic Cooperation. According to Israeli statistics the volume of Israel-Ethiopia trade in 1961 was: Israeli exports $1,071,000 and imports $1,665,000, as compared with $1,003,000 and $1,822,000 respectively in 1960. (IFT, 1961)

The Israel deep sea fishing fleet in the Red Sea was reinforced, and by the end of the year six Israel trawlers and one refrigerating ship were based on Massawa. Yotvat, the Israel Red Sea fishing company, was also building a fishmeal plant in Massawa. The main reasons for the move to the Red Sea were the limited fishing grounds and the poor hauls in the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Aqaba; however, Moshe Dayan, the Minister of Agriculture, was reported to have stressed also its political importance for close contact with Ethiopia. (Ma'ariv, June 20; Jer. Post, Oct 12)

Following the 1960 proposal for cooperation in establishing industrial-crop farms in Ethiopia (MER 1960, p 307), the Israel government decided, on April 24, to guarantee the investments of Yakhin-Hakal (an agricultural contracting company) in Ethiopia, and ratified its agreement with the Ethiopian government for the establishment of a 10,000-hectare farm to produce peanuts, cotton, oil seeds and sugar beet. (Ha'aretz, Feb 6, March 8; April 26)

Following on the work in Ethiopia of Israeli advisors on public transport in 1960 (MER 1960, p 306), the Ethiopian National Transport Company agreed in June 1961 to buy 75 buses to be built in Israel on English chassis. Egged [the major Israel passenger bus company] undertook to supply experts for five years, and two of its experts left for Ethiopia. (Ha'aretz, June 7, 9, 12)

In view of Israel's ties with Ethiopia, the government opposed the proposed sale of the Israel-owned Incode meat freezing and canning factory in that country (MER 1960, p 307) to a British group. The company, in which the government had some investments, had undergone a series of financial crises in the ten years of its existence and its factory had been shut down for about six months for lack of funds. The government would not invest any more funds in the enterprise but agreed to cancel its claims on Incode to enable it to apply for an Ethiopian bank loan. (Jer. Post, Nov 1, 2, 8; Ha'aretz, Nov 1, 8)

On Nov 13 the Reynolds Company of New York, in which Soteli Boneh, the Israeli Histadrut-owned contracting company, was a partner, signed a $2.8 million contract for the construction of four airport terminals for the Ethiopian Air Lines at Addis Ababa, Asmara and two smaller towns. (Jer. Post, March 24, April 30, July 11, Oct 6)

IRAN

No De Jure Recognition But Close Ties. [In 1960 the question of Iran's recognition of Israel was given by the UAR as grounds for breaking off diplomatic relations—MER 1960, pp 216 ff.] On March 3 an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman denied Baghdad press allegations that Iran intended to withdraw de facto recognition of Israel (accorded in 1950). The situation remained as repeatedly stated by his government, he said. (Jer. Post, March 5)

Following Ethiopia's de jure recognition of Israel, announced on Oct 24, a number of Iranian papers called on the government to follow suit.

Israel was an obstacle in the way of Egypt's expansionist ambitions and a stabilizing factor in the ME, wrote Peygham-e Emruz. Iran was a Muslim but not an Arab country, and though friendly with the Arabs she could not sacrifice her interests to their inflexible policy. With the decline of Abdel Nasser's power, the Arabs would come to recognize Israel as an established fact, the paper believed. It asked the Foreign Ministry to consider all these factors and concluded that conservatism and irresolution on this question were detrimental to the national interest (Peygham-e Emruz, Oct 30); for similar opinions see also Poste Tehran, Ainyaye Javan, Oct 31). Kayhan said that the Ethiopian step was regarded by official and political circles in Tehran as an important development and a defeat for Abdel Nasser. It was believed that other countries might now follow suit. (Kayhan, Oct 30)

At the end of the year the Shah reportedly replied to a correspondent who asked why Iran did not grant de jure recognition to Israel: "Iran's relations with Israel are like the true love that exists between two people outside of wedlock. Iran is strengthening its ties with Israel, but for political reasons it cannot recognize Israel de jure." (Jer. Post, Dec 31)

Israeli Premier's Stopover in Tehran. On Dec 5 PM Ben-Gurion, on his way to Burma (see p 329), spent the night at the Shah's villa at Tehran airport and met senior government officials. There was no comment from the Iranian PM's office on rumours that he had met Ben-Gurion. (Ha'aretz, Dec 6, 7)

Economic Ties. No separate statistics for Israel's trade with Iran were made public. (IFT, 1961)

On Jan 2 the Director-General of Vared, the Israel Water Resources Development Company, said that the possibility of Israeli participation in large-scale water development projects in Iran were being examined (Ha'aretz, Jan 3). In mid-April Vared began installing a central sewerage system in Isfahan, assuming full responsibility for the first stage of the project, to cost $1.25 million. (Israel Digest, May 12)

Post, March 27*). In Nov the anniversary was celebrated in Tel Aviv. A telegram of congratulations was sent to the Shah, who replied with thanks for the good wishes. (Ha'aretz, Nov 21) (See also MER 1960, p 307)

Iranian Visitors to Israel included ex-Deputy PM Mustafa Alamouti, MP; Dr Mo'adel, MP; Dr R. Human, ex-Minister of Justice; Haji Nuri, a former member of the Senate and an editor of Kayhan (March) (Jer. Post, March 22; Ha'aretz, March 27, 28); Princess Safieh Firouz, President of the Iranian Council of Women (July) (Jer. Post, July 24, 26); Ebrahim Mahdavi, Governor of Khuzistan and former Minister of Agriculture (Oct) (Ha'aretz, Oct 19); and a troupe of musicians, for a week's performances (Nov) (Ha'aretz, Nov 7).

However, it was suspected that the Indonesian authorities would refuse to extend visas to the Israeli sportsmen. It was understood that in 1960 the Indonesian Foreign Ministry had promised the Iraqi Ambassador that Israel would be excluded from participation. (Jer. Post, Dec 17)

BURMA

PM Ben-Gurion's Visit to Burma; Friendship Reaffirmed. PM Ben-Gurion arrived in Rangoon on Dec 3 for a 16-day visit to Burma as the guest of the government. The first plans for the visit had been announced at the beginning of Nov. (Jer. Post, Nov 2, 17)

(PM U Nu of Burma had been the first PM to visit Israel, in May 1955. Gen. Ne Win also visited Israel as PM, in June 1959. President Ben-Zvi of Israel paid a state visit to Burma in Oct 1959.)

PM U Nu, welcoming Ben-Gurion at Rangoon airport, declared that the relations between Israel and Burma were based on "firm foundations of mutual trust and respect, of friendly and profitable cooperation"; the understanding and goodwill between the two governments were reflected in the friendship between their peoples.

PM Ben-Gurion replied: "There are much more than the ordinary bonds of goodwill and fraternal foreign relations between Israel and Burma. There is a profound affinity between the moral heritage of our ages and those of Burma." (Jer. Post, Dec 6)

On Dec 6, at a state dinner, U Nu, recalling his visit to Israel, said that it was "inspiring to see a modern nation spring out of the desert" and "impossible not to feel proud of the achievements of these fellow human beings." Both Burma and Israel, he continued, had emerged as independent states in the same year; both were democratic and under the imperative necessity of development; therefore both needed and fervently desired peace. (Jer. Post, Dec 7; Burma Weekly Bulletin, Dec 14)

In Rangoon Ben-Gurion had talks with government and opposition leaders, including President U Win Maung, Gen. Ne Win, the Chief of Staff, and U Ba Swe, leader of the Socialist opposition party. He also had conversations about Buddhism with Burmese religious leaders. (Jer. Post, Dec 7, 8)

The official visit ended on Dec 12 and Ben-Gurion started a week of Buddhist meditation as the personal guest of U Nu. (Jer. Post, Dec 12, 13)

At Rangoon University, on Dec 20 the degree of Honorary Doctor of Law was conferred upon Ben-Gurion, who delivered a lecture on "Israel Faces a World in Transformation." (Jer. Post, Dec 21)

Joint Communiqué: "Mutual Beneficial Relations." In a joint statement on Dec 21, Ben-Gurion and U Nu announced that Israeli agricultural experts would be sent to assist in the development of Burma's arid zone, at Israel's expense.

The two PMs noted with pleasure that the mutually beneficial relations "between Burma and Israel have grown steadily from year to year, both in scope and in spirit, on the basis of mutual trust and respect and in harmonious cooperation. They expressed their conviction that cooperation of this nature among nations large and small would be conducive to the attainment of a greater measure of peace and prosperity in the world.

"They affirmed their confident hope that these relations would continue to grow and that Burmese-Israeli cooperation would continue to expand in the near future in the context of Burma's developing economy. They also emphasized their desire further to encourage cultural exchanges."

"The two PMs reaffirmed their full support of, and adherence to, the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations," the communiqué continued, "They noted with satisfaction the great strides being made in the emancipation of subjected peoples from colonial rule. They also expressed their hope that the total emancipation of all colonial peoples would be achieved in the near future. They reaffirmed their resolute opposition to all forms of domination and to all manifestations of racial discrimination."

They expressed great concern at the continued world arms race and especially "at the adverse effects on human beings of radioactive fallout resulting from nuclear weapons tests, as well as the constant threat to the maintenance of peace which the continuation of such tests constitutes." They declared firm support for complete and early world disarmament under effective supervision, and appealed to all the nuclear powers "to work for an agreement on the prohibition of nuclear weapons tests under effective inspection and control, and pending the conclusion of such an agreement, to voluntarily suspend all such tests."

"The two PMs expressed their view that the wide gap in living standards between the rich and the poor nations of the world constitutes a perennial danger to world peace and called upon the wealthy and technologically advanced nations to work selflessly for the advancement of the less developed countries."

U Nu accepted Ben-Gurion's invitation to visit Israel again, at any convenient date. (Full text in Burma Weekly Bulletin, Jan 4, 1962; details of the visit in Nation, Rangoon, Dec 6, 7, 10, 12-14, 19, 21-25; Guardian, Rangoon, Dec 6, 7, 8, 10, 13, 21, 22.)

Burma and the Arab-Israel Conflict. On leaving Lydda airport for Rangoon on Dec 4, Ben-Gurion said that, while maintaining friendly relations with the Arab states, Burma was outstanding for her "courageous friendship" with Israel. (Jer. Post, Dec 5)

During the year, Premier U Nu twice made public statements on the Arab-Israel conflict.

At the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries in Sept U Nu strongly opposed an Arab proposal—backed by some other countries—to condemn Israel. (See p 192.) PM Ben-Gurion sent a cable to U Nu praising his stand "not only as a friend of Israel and a friend of the truth but as a true Buddhist." Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Nissim also cabled U Nu in this connection. (Jer. Post, Sept 8, Nov 2; IGPO, Sept 9)

On Dec 25, four days after Ben-Gurion concluded his visit to Burma, U Nu arrived in Cairo for a five-day visit. (p 670)

In a joint communiqué released on Dec 29 the paragraph on Palestine said: "President Gamal Abdel Nasser explained developments in the ME as well as different phases of the Palestine question.

"The President and the PM condemned the imperialist policies pursued in the ME and declared their support for the full restoration of all the rights of the Arab people of Palestine in conformity with the Charter and resolutions of the UN." (Eg. Gaz., Dec 30)

It was reported that this paragraph was received in Jerusalem with mixed feelings but it was later found to be a verbatim copy of the Palestine paragraph in the resolutions of the Belgrade Conference [compare p 192 b], which was formulated following U Nu's resolute pro-Israel intervention. It therefore did not signify any new departure in U Nu's position. (Ha'aretz; Jer. Post, Dec 31)

PM Ben-Gurion was reported to have told the Cabinet that the communiqué was an unpleasant surprise to him but did not change his esteem for U Nu and his confidence in U Nu's true friendship for Israel. (Ha'aretz, Jan 1, 1962)

On Jan 2, 1962 Ben-Gurion told the Mapai Central Committee that Abdel Nasser, who knew U Nu's sympathy for Israel, had apparently refrained from attacking Israel, concentrating his arguments on the refugee problem and the need to implement UN resolutions. As this was a mere repetition of the Belgrade Declaration U Nu could not but agree. (Ha'aretz, Jan 3, 1962)

At the end of Jan 1962 it was reported that Ben-Gurion had received a letter from U Nu explaining the paragraph. (Ha'aretz, Jan 29, 1962)

While attending the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries in Sept, Nehru declared at a press conference that it was "utterly difficult" for his country to recognize Israel. [He apparently referred to the establishment of diplomatic relations.] "Before Suez we had consulates and our relations were increasing, although no diplomatic relations had been established," he was quoted as saying. Political Developments. After the murder of Patrice Lumumba, the former Premier, in Feb, Israel refrained from any official comment on developments in Congo. Bitan was reported to have pointed out the contrast between the Casablanca condemnation of Israel and Ghana's pro-Israeli declarations at the UN shortly before (see MER 1960, pp 178, 311) (Ha'aretz, Jan 16). Nkrumah, it was reported, assured the Israeli Ambassador that there had been no change in Ghana's relations with Israel, but affirmed his support for the Casablanca resolution on Jan 18. (Ghana News, Accra, Jan 19)

While UAR sources said that Ghana was winding up her relations with Israel (MENA, Jan 25 [26], Feb 9 [10]), Israeli papers, not content with Nkrumah's assurances, demanded that Ghana define clearly her relations with Israel. (See e.g. Davar, Jan 18; Haboker, Jan 19.) Ma'ariv claimed that the Israel government was reconsidering her aid programme to Ghana, but Ha'aretz reported that the sending of Israeli experts continued as scheduled, and that the Foreign Ministry did not rule out the possibility of further Ghanaian requests even after the Casablanca resolution. (Ma'ariv, Jan 20; Ha'aretz, Feb 10)

Post, Feb 22*). He also said he was impressed with the Israeli government's role in the development of Ghana's air services. (Daily Graphic, Accra, Feb 22)

The Ghanaian Ambassador to Israel, Bediako Poku, said on Feb 22 that the government and people of Ghana had not changed their friendly attitude towards Israel. "We know what you have done for our young country and what you shall still do in the future," he said, adding: "We shall be the last to stand by and let Israel be destroyed." What Ghana wanted, he said, was "to be friends to all and enemies to none." (Jer. Post, Feb 23)

On March 9, an Israel Foreign Ministry source said that Israel's cooperation with Ghana was proceeding smoothly, although each country retained an independent point of view in choosing friends and in its approach to world affairs. (Jer. Post, March 10)

On July 4 at the opening of the second session of the Ghanaian parliament, President Nkrumah was reported to have praised Israel as one of the ten "friendly nations" that had offered Ghana financial aid, and to have made no reference to the Casablanca Conference or the UAR. [The plan was implemented during 1961-62, when two model farms were established in the area, and agricultural and irrigation surveys conducted.]

The Commander of the Ghanaian Builders' Brigade, Jones Ababio, visited Israel in Aug to study the possibility of adopting Israeli agricultural methods to the Builders' farming scheme (*Jer. A member of the Zim Israel Navigation Co. Board of Directors declared that relations with Ghana continued smoothly in accordance with the contracts signed. [Zim's shares in the Black Star Line were purchased in 1960 by the Ghanaian government, which retained Zim's services as managing agent; see MER 1960, p 310.] He said that most of the cooperation with the Black Star Company was now in the field of know-how and the maintenance of joint lines. At a special session of the Egyptian National Assembly in honour of Sekou Touré, on May 13, the Speaker, Anwar as-Saadat, spoke of Israel (as well as Algeria and Laos), as a springboard for imperialism. The two leaders also expressed their desire to "advance the principle of direct negotiations as the only means of solving quarrels between nations and governments," deplored arms races, and urged the nations of the ME, Africa and other areas to refrain from the use of force, abandon all "policies of systematic hostility" and resort to direct negotiations to settle outstanding problems.
